(38) The Empresse in his absence, had well fortified her selfe in Oxford, whom Stephen (using the benefit of Roberts absence) followed with an eager pursuite, and wanne the Suburbes even unto the City-gates; then girt hee the Empresse with so strait a siege, (meaning never to give over, till hee had now made her sure in his possession) that for two moneths whatsoever Strength or Strataqeme could performe in assault or defence, was there put in practise, till at length great penury enforced to thinke of a surrender: but shee, a woman (whose sexe hath often deceived wise-men) resolved once againe to overreach her foe by wit, whom shee could not by force: whereto the time did fit her wishes; for being a Winter, sharpe above measure, the River Thamisis that runnes by the City-wals, was then congealed with a strong crusted Ice, and besides a great snow did then continue, and had covered the ground. Maud upon these advantages, put in practise a most dangerous attempt: for cloathing her-selfe, and some choise of her company, in white linnen-garments, to deceive the eyes of the Sentinels, issued secretly by night out of a posterne-gate, and passing the frozen River, ranne on foote, through ice, and snow, ditches, and vallies, for five miles, even to Abington, the falling Snow still beating in their faces; and there taking horse, the same night got to the Castle of Wallingford to the great joy, and also admiration of all that were therein.

(39) In the meane while, Earle Robert, with Prince Henry, were arrived in England at Wareham haven, and presently besieged the Castle there, so to withdraw the King from siege of his sister; but hearing of the happy escape of the Empresse, came with young Henry unto his Mother, whose sight made her forget the griefe and sorrowes that she had long indured. Then was Oxford upon conditions yeelded to the King; and Wilton fired by the bastard Earle Robert: The Towre of London, with the Castles of Walden, Pleises, and Lincolne, yeelded to Stephen; the Castles of Warrham, and Portland, yeelded to Robert: The Earles of Chester, and Essex, surprized by the King; William Martell the great favourite, taken and imprisoned by the Earle. Thus sundry yeeres passing with variable successes to and fro, and every yeere heaping on each side fresh calamities, to the great ruine of the whole land; the Empresse, even wearied with those warres and uncertainties of successe, went into Normandy, chusing rather to bee under the protection of her husband in peace, then to raigne in England perplexed with troubles: and to the same end she had not long before, sent her young sonne Henry to his father, who desired to have him rather heire of a Dukedome with safety, then of a Crowne with daily hazard.

(41) But Henry Fitz-Empresse, growne now from a Child, thought it best a while to leave Mercury, (for it is said hee was Bookish) and to follow Mars; so knowing his presence would preferre much his purposes (for men would bee loth to hazard all for one, who himselfe would neglect all) hasteth againe into England, with an Armie of valiant and choise Souldiers; to whom joyned the discontented Earle of Chester, Roger the sonne of Miles deceased, with many more Knights and Gallants of the English: hee therefore tooke into the North, and met with David his cosen, King of Scotland, of whom hee was most honourably received, and solemnely sacred with the Military honour of Knighthoode: and thence forward sought all occasions to provoke both King Stephen, and his sonne Eustace against him: and having setled some courses with certaine Peeres for the pursuit of his designes in England, he returned into Normandy to compose and set forward some other businesses, which might bee availeable for these his ends.

(42) Where long hee staied not, but that Geffrey his Father deparred this life, and left him his Heire both of Anion and Normandy; and the yeere following, hee matched in marriage with Eleanor Duches of Guien and Aquitaine, lately divorced from Lodowicke King of France for consanguinitie, and adultery (saith Paris) after thee had borne him two daughters; Lodowicke fearing issue-male by this marriage, to the dis-heriting of his said daughters, greatly impugned Duke Henry; and Stephen, suspecting his greatnesse, now being Duke of Normandy, Anion, Aquitaine and Guien, both of them sought each way to impeach his peace: Lodowicke, with Prince Eustace, in the parts beyond seas, and Stephen in England, to make sure his succession, fought to invest the said Prince Eustace with the English Diademe; both to prevent, and utterly to deprive Henry Fitz-Empresse for ever: for calling a Councell at London, King Stephen commaunded Theobald Archbishop of Canterbury to consecrate Prince Eustace for their King; which hee refused to doe, and that by commandement from the Pope (whose holy See can deale on both sides, as makes most for their advantage) alleaging now, that his Father was an usurper, and perjured Intruder: whereupon the honest Archbishop fled into Normandy, and the King seized upon all his possessions. It may seeme, that one cause of the Popes inclining to young Henries title, was to strengthen him against his enemy King Lewis of France, who had highly offended his Holines, for casting the Popes Buls (whereby hee required the fruits of Vacancies of all Cathedrall Churches in France) into the fire, saying, hee had rather the Popes Bulls should rost in the fire, then his owne soule should frie in hell.

But Henry after hee had calmed the boisterous stormes of warre, in the parts beyond the seas, came over into England well appointed, unto whom also resorted many of the Nobility, who yeelded up themselves, and above thirty strong Castles to the young Duke; who now well furnished, hasted to raise the siege of Wallingford, and there undertooke a great enterprize, for hee incircled the Besiegers with a great and deepe Trench, whereby hee kept them from relief, as they did keepe the Besieged.

With these and the like allegations, at last Stephen began to bend, & a parley for peace was signified unto the Duke. Henry already warme for the battaile, and his thoughts fixed on nothing lesse then peace, could hardly moderate his youthfull affections; yet at his friends importunity, hee yeelded to conferre with King Stephen.

His wife.

(50) Maud, the Wife of King Stephen, was the daughter of Eustace Earle of Bulloigne, the brother of Godfrey, and Baldwin Kings of Ierusalem: her mother was Mary, sister to Maud Queene of England, wife of King Henry, her husbands Predecessor. Shee was crowned at Westminster upon Sunday, being Easterday, and the two and twenty of March, in the first yeare of her husbands raigne, and of Grace, 1136. and being Queene fifteene yeeres, shee died at Henningham Castle in Essex, the third of May, and yeere of Christ, 1151. and was buried in his Monastery at Feversham in Kent.

His Issue.

(51) Baldwin, the eldest sonne of King Stephen and Queene Maud (bearing the name of King Baldwin his uncle) was borne in the time of the raigne of King Henry his fathers uncle; and died in his infancy, during the raigne of the same King. He was buried at London in the Church of the Priorie of the Trinity within Algate, which was a house of blacke * Canons of the Augustinian order, founded by Queene Maud, the first wife of the foresaid King Henry the first.

* The first Canon Regular in England was of this place, Ann. 1108. and the Prior thereof was Alderman of London. Stowes Survay.

(52) Eustace the second sonne of King Stephen, and of Queene Maud his wife, being the heire apparant to them both; when his Father was King, was created Earle of Bolloigne, which dignity was the inheritance of his mother. Hee married Constance sister of Lewis the seventh King of France, daughter of King Lewis the Grosse: who afterward was re-married to Raimond the third, Earle of Tholouze: for Eustace died before her, without Issue by her, the tenth day of August, in the eighteenth yeere of his Fathers raigne, and of Grace, 1152. He was buried by his mother in his Fathers Monastery at Feversham in Kent.

(53) William, the third and yongest sonne of King Stephen and Queene Maud, married Isabel daughter and heire of William Warren, the third Earle of Surrey, with whom hee had that Earldome, he was in his Fathers life time Earle of Surrey, Lord of Norwich, and Pevensey in England, Earle of Mortayne, and Lord Eagle of Normandy. After his fathers death, King Henry the second made him Knight, resumed those things that hee held of the Crowne, restored him to all that his Father held before hee was King. And so hee was Earle of Bolloigne, Surrey, and Mortaine, and being with him in his journey to Tholouze, died without issue, in his returne homeward, in the Moneth of October, the seventh of King Henries raigne, and of Christ Iesus, 1160.

(54) Maud, the eldest daughter of King Stephen and Queene Maud, was borne before her father was King, in the raigne of King Henry the first, her uncle; in whose time also shee deceased, being but young, (though some report shee was wife to the Earle of Millen) and was enterred at London, with her brother Baldwin, in the Priorie of the Trinity aforesaid, then commonly called Christs Church, and now lately named the Dukes-Place within Algate.

Stowes Surv. p. 105.

(55) Marie, the younger daughter of King Stephen and Queene Maude, was a Nunne, and Abbesse of the Nunnerie at Rumsey in Hampshire; notwithstanding, when her brother William Earle of Bolloigne, was deceased without issue, shee was secretly taken from thence, and married to Matthew the younger sonne of Terry of Alsac, and brother of Philip Earle of Flanders, who in her right was Earle of Bolloigne. Shee was his wife ten yeeres, and was then divorced from him, by the sentence of the Pope, and enforced to returne to her Monastery, having had issue by him two daughters, which were Ide and Maude, allowed by the censure of the Church to be legitimate. Lady Ide, the elder, was married to Raymond of Damp-Martine, in her right Earle of Bolloigne; and Maud, the younger, to Henry Duke of Lorraine.

His Naturall Issue.

(56) William, the Naturall sonne of King Stephen, is mistaken of some to bee the same William, that was Earle of Bolloigne. Others, who know that William Earle of Bolloigne was lawfully borne, doe thinke that his father had no other son named William but him; wherein let William Earle of Bolloigne, the lawfull son of King Stephen, be himselfe a lawfull witnesse of the truth, who having best cause to know it, doth best proove it; and in an ancient Charter of his, being written in those dayes, and extant in these, doth name him for a witnesse, and calleth him his Brother.

(57) Gervais, another Naturall sonne of King Stephen, begotten on a gentle-woman named Dametta, and borne in Normandy, was brought into England by his father, the fifth yeere of his Raigne, Anno Dom. 1140. Hee was the same yeere, by his father meanes, made Abbot of Westminster, and so continued for the space of twenty yeeres: hee deceased there the twenty sixth of August, in the sixth yeere of the raigne of King Henry the second, the yeere of Grace 1160. and lyeth buried in the South part of the cloyster, within the said Monastery, under a flat stone of black marble, which is remaining there until this day.

CHAPTER VI.

HENRY, of that name the second, by the double interest of descent and adoption (as you have heard) succeeded in the Kingdome of England, whose Pedegree, (which Mathew Paris extendeth by the mothers side, in a right line up to Noah) and formerfortunes, having already beene touched, his counsels, acts, and other affaires of greatest importance, after the death of King Stephen, come now to bee handled.

(2) Hee came not to the Crowne unexpected, nor undesired; for the opinion of the man, and hope conceived of his future government, had the force to hold England in good obedience without the presence of a King, about sixe weekes, whose entrance like that of the Soule into the Body, did quicken, and enspirite the Realme, as then (in the person of England) this clozing verse, or Epiphoneme spake: *Spiritus es, caro sum: te nunc intrante revixi. (3) Sundry Castles (nests of Rebels) hee flatteth to the earth, some others hee fortifies or resumes at his pleasure; chiefly, such estates, as had beene alienated from the Crowne, as the hire and unjust reward of those who withstood his claime. Others write, that hee promiscuously tooke all such lands into his owne possession, as were by Iurors found upon oath to have belonged at any time unto the Crowne. forrain Souldiers; chiefly from the Flemmings, whose mercenary swarmes most pestered the same, and had most infected him. And because Government is the Soule of State, and Wisedome the Soule of Government, hee choosetth to himselfe a Body of Counsell out of the most eminent persons of both sorts: such was Theobald Archbishop of Canterbury; and for that selfe consideration, he laid the Chancellorship of England upon Thomas Becket, and held in speciall favour Iohn of Oxenford, with sundry other Prelates of chiefest note: of the Laity, hee had Robert Earle of Leicester, chiefe Iustitiar of England, Richard de Lucy, Iocelin de Bailull, Alan de Neuile and others: but for a Cabanet-Counsellour at all times, he had his owne mother, Matildis the Empresse, one of the most sage and experienced Ladies of the world. Thus then furnished, and assembling a Councell at Wallingford, hee as well for his owne securing, as for the assurance of his Children, sweares the Realme to the succession of his sonnes William and Henry, the one being in remainder to the other.

(4) But quiet consulation did not take up the most of his time, even in the daies of these Sunne-shining beginnings: for the raigne of Stephen, a most gentle Prince (who thought, out of the necessity of his owne estate, that it was not safe for him to be severe) having given way for many of the mighty to maintaine sundrie insolencies; these now feeling a restraint, began not a little to repine: but Hugh de Mortimer, wanton with greatnesse, and the most arrogant man alive, stuft his Castles of Glocester, Wigmore and * Bridge-north with rebellious Garrisons; which Henry notwithstanding reduced to subjection, though in the siege of the last-named, not without imminent perill of his person, had not Robert de S. Clare, cast himselfe betweene death and the King, taking the arrow into his owne bosome to preserve his Soveraignes life. It bound Tiberius to Seianus most of all, when a part of the banqueting Cave in which they were, suddenly falling, Seianus was found to have borne the ruine from the Emperour, with the perill of his life: but Seianus survived that adventure, which our Senclere did not, save onely in the better renowne thereof, which deserves to be immortall, being an Act of Piety, worthy of a Statue, with Codrus, Curtius, Manlius, or whosoever else have willingly sacrificed themselves for their Country, or for the Father of their Country, the King.

(5) Henry thus having in some sort setled England, hasteth into France to King Lewis, the first yeere of his raigne, and there did homage unto him for Normandy, Aquitaine, Anion, Main, and Lourraine, which partly were his patrimony, and partly the inheritance of Elinor his wife.

Roger Houed. Annal. pag. 2.

(6) His domesticke enemies being subdued, or appeased, hee put his brother Geffrey by force to a pension, the summe whereof (if it bee any thing to the purpose to know) was 1000. l. English, and 2000. l. Anion by yeere, wringing out of his possession all such territories, as by their Fathers last Will and Testament, were bequeathed to him in France. But Geffrey did not long enjoy the said annuity, or his brothers friendship: for in the third yeere, death brought a discharge, and Henry was disburdened of those paiments. For his violence in taking away those lands, King Henry might alledge he was eldest brother; but that allegation might bee avoided with his owne consent, which once hee gave: but the great Elixar, called Reason of State, (though falsly so called, unlesse it bee seasoned with Iustice, and Religion) hath so transmutative a faculty, as to make Copper seeme Gold, right wrong, and wrong right; yea, when all Pleas faile, it will stand for good, while thereare forces to support it.

(7) This accord betweene the two brethren, being thus (howsoever) established, the King repaires into England and at Chester enters amity with Malcolme King of Scots, on such termes, as his Grandfather had done, yet Salvis omnibus dignitatibus suis, saving to himselfe all his dignities: and the said Malcolme restored to Henry the City of Carleil, Newcastle upon Tyne, &c, and Henry restored to him the Earledome of Huntingdon in England. And so justly dreadfull did the growing puissance of this young Monarch appeare to his greatest enemies, that Hugh Bygod Earle of Norfolke, who had potent meanes to doe mischiefe, rendred his Castle to bee at his disposall.

(8) The Welsh notwithstanding forsooke not themselves, but did some memorable matters, under the conduct of the valiant Prince Owen, against the English, in defence of North-Wales, and their Countries liberty, to the losse of the English, and extreame danger of the Kings owne person, whose Standard-Royall was cowardly abandoned, and the King reported to bee slaine: for which Henry de Essex, the Kings Standard-bearer at that conflict, was afterward accused by Robert de Montford his neere Kinsman, and in single battaile within lists was vanquished at Reading, where the said Henry de Essex was shorne a Monke, and dyed. Mathew Paris relates the whole voyage of King Henry summarily thus: That Henry prepared a very great Army against the Welsh, with full purpose to overcome them both by land and Sea; that hee cut up the Woods and Forrests, and laid open a way; that hee recovered the Castle of Ruthlan, and other fortresses taken from his Ancestors; that hee repaired the Castle of Basingwerke, and that having brought the Welsh to his will, hee returned with triumph into England.

(9) After this, himselfe and his Wife Queene Elinor being openly crowned upon Christmas day, (* some say Easter day) at the Citie of Worcester; they both at the Offertorie laid their Diadems upon the high Altar, vowing never to weare them after; this being now the third time in which at three severall places, Westminster, Lincolne, and Worcester, hee had beene crowned. This devout act of his, did flow perhaps out of some such speculation as that of Canutus, who thought none truly worthy the name of King, but God alone; or that, upon which Godfrey of Bolloigne, refused to weare a crowne of gold in Hierusalem, where our Lord and Saviour had beene crowned with thornes. For this King had at times the pangs and Symptoms of mortification and piety, and did herein acknowledge the onely giver and taker away of Kiugdomes God-almighty; putting himselfe, and Realme, under the protection of that Majesty of whom he held paramount; and professing (as it were) that from thenceforth hee would direct his actions to the glory of his omnipotent Master, which is indeede the onely finall cause of all true monarchie.

(11) For after these accidents, began the famous controversie betweene the King and his Arch-bishop Becket, a man of an invincible stomacke and resolution in his life, and after death reputed by some for a great Saint or Martyr; as is likewise noted of Henrie * that he was the most politicke, martiall, rich, and honoured Prince of all his time. This Prelate, by birth a Londoner, (though his mother, a Sarazen, * say some) by profession a * Civilian, was by Theobald Archbishop of Canterburie, both made his Archdeacon, and also placed about the person of Duke Henrie, who being now King, advanced him in the very first yeare of his raigne to be Lord Chancellor of England, in which high honour he carried himselfe like another King, and afterward upon the death of Theobald, though the Monkes objected against Becket, that neither a Courtier nor a Souldier (as * he had been both) were fit to succeed in so high and sacred a function, yet the King gave him that Archbishopricke, partly in reward, and partly in further hope of his ready and faithfull service. Which to be true, a Legender of his Miracles can best relate. Nonnullis tamen, &c. Many (saith he) judged his promotion not Canonicall, because it was procured more by the importunity of the King, then by the voyces of Clergie, or People; and it was noted as presumption and indiscretion in him, to take upon him to guide the Sterne, who was scarce fit to handle an Oare; and that being skil'd onely in worldly affaires, he did not tremble to ascend unto that sacred top of so great dignity. Whereto agreeth the reports of two learned Monkes who then lived, (for such Authors only we will herein follow, as shall be unpartiall) * one of which testifies, that the Pope about that time calling a Councel at Tours (& the King giving Licence to his Archbishops and Bishops to goe thither) Becket secretly surrendered his Archbishoprick, which he had received from the Kings hand, into the Popes hands. The other saith, Becket himselfe confessed, that, not Canonicall Election did call him, but publicke power drove him in; nor the will of God, but mans pleasure, placed him in the roome. Howsoever, these being memorable arguments of the Kings exceeding love; let us now see how this great Prelate endevored to deserve it, or how he chanced to lose it.

(12) Great and flourishing was the state of the English Church and Common wealth at this season; the quiet of both which, the King studied and hoped to establish by the undoubted assistance of his great favorite Becket, whose counsell & authority he knew might much further his princely designes, especially touching affairs of the Church, & abuses of Churchmen, which then were grown to a dangerous height: whereof let us heare the Monk of Nuburough speake; It was declared in the Kings presence, how that Clergy men had committed above an hundred murthers under his raigne; wherewith the King highly offended, he was in punishing of them somewhat too vehement; but the blame of the Kings too much earnestnes, must lie on the Prelates, in as much as they gave the cause thereof: for, whereas sacred Canons ordaine, that Clerks found guilty, not onely of hainous and grievous sins, but also of lesser, should be degraded, and thousands of such were in the Church of England, like innumerable chaffe amongst a little good corne; yet very few such, for those many yeares have beene deprived. The Prelates forsooth, while they beeStirre themselves, rather to uphold the liberties and dignities of Clerks, then to chastise and cut off their vices, thinke they doe God and his Church good service, in protecting from publike Discipline such hainous offenders, whom (by duty of their places) they ought to correct according to the Canons censure, whereby they through their impunity, having liberty to doe what before secular Iudges. 5. That it should not bee lawfull for a Bishop to punish any one for periurie or faith-breach. 6. That the Laity, whether the King or other, should hold pleas of Churches and Tithes, &c.

(16) These points so neerely touched the Papall Soveraignty, and Church-Liberties, that the resolute Metropolitane mainely opposed his whole powers against them. Henrie also persisted, as his Grandfather Henry the first had done, who having a * like warre with Anselme his Archbishop, was so vehement therein, as hee would not suffer him to returne into England (though after some yeares banishment) unlesse he would absolutely binde himselfe to observe, not his Fathers customes onely, but his brothers also, who were the two fatall Williams, the Conquerour and Rufus.

* See before Henry the first.

Reasons moving King Henry to urge the Archbishop to assent.

(17) Many reasons moved Henry to attempt this businesse; as first, the enlargement of his Regall authority: Secondly, to exempt his State by degrees, from the dependency on any externall Government, as lineally claiming both from a Conquest, and from absolute-Soveraigne Antecessors; and so to introduce that free Empery, to which he saw no way lie open, but by subordinating the Persons and Causes of Church-men to the secular soveraignety, in a few points first, and then in other. And that this was the secret, will not obscurely appear in * that Article, which was summarily this: That appeales should be made from the Consistory to the Arch deacon, from him to the Bishop, thence to the Archbishop, and so to the King. Thus farre M. Fox; but Mathew Paris hath more: That the King should command the Archbishop to end the suit, and that it should proceed no further without licence of the King.

* Alls and Monum. pag. 167.

Matth. Paris.

(18) A third reason was, for that hee had by his owne perswasions, and by the Councell of one Ernulph a * Bishop, drawn unto his purposes the Archbishop of Yorke, and all the other Bishops in a manner, who were now sure unto him, and ready to yeeld to his demands, which they saw, did tend to the good of the State wherein they lived. Moreover, hee was perswaded of great facility in obtaining his desire, both in regard of the * advantage which the Schisme then upholden by Frederick the Emperour against Alexander the third did give, which might make the Pope afraid to leese or hazard his friends: as also for that the King, till he found the contrary, thought himselfe assured of his Thomas, whom (if * Gilbert Bishop of London said true) he advanced to that dignity against the will and liking, aswell of Matildis the Empresse his mother, as of the Clergy and people.

(19) Besides these and other reasons encouraging the King, Pope Alexander very desirous to keepe the Kings love (though secretly wishing well to *Becket*s attempts) sent one Philip his Almoner purposeles ie to compose the controversie, by whom the Pope and Cardinalls required the Archbishop to make promise unto the King to the keeping his said Ordinances absolutely, and without any favings or exceptions: whereupon Thomas seeing his scrupulosity thus disapproved by his Soveraigne, by all his Brethren the Bishops, and by the Court of Rome it selfe, hee rode to Woodstocke to the King, and there promised, that he would keepe his said lawes, bonâ fide, & sine malo ingenio, in good faith, and without mal-engin.

Nubrig. 2. c. 16 calls him Hominem Scrupulosum. Roger Hoved.

(20) The King afterward (supposing now all contradiction had end, and that Thomas would not waver in his faith) called an Assembly of the States at Clarendon (of which place in Wilt-shire and not in Normandie, as * some have mistaken, the said Customes called by the King, Auita, were denominated) to collect and enact those Lawes: where Iohn of Oxenford sitting President, Becket, relapsing againe from his promise given to the King, said, that he had grievously sinned in making that absolute promise, and that he would not sinne therein any more.

Matth. Paris. The Archbishop violates his promise.

(21) At which, the King was so vehemently stirred and inflamed, that hee threatned banishment and destruction to him and his. But the Archbishop, having definitely resolved to undergoe any peril, was yet so softned with the teares, prayers, and kneelings of so great and honourable personages, as the Bishop of Salisbury, and Norwich, the Earles of Leicester, and Cornwall, and two knights Templars, Richard de Hastings, and another, privately repairing unto him, that before the King, the Clergy, and people, hee sware in verbo Sacerdotali, in the word of a Priest, and de plano, sincerely, that hee would observe the Lawes, which the King entituled Auita, and all the Bishops, Abbots, Priors, and whole Clergie, with all the Earles, Barons, and Nobilitie, did promise and sweare, the same faithfully and truly to observe and performe, to the King, and to his heires for ever. But when the King, not so contented, would have him (as every one of the Bishops had done before him) to subscribe and affix his seale to an instrument, in which those Customes or Lawes (being in number sixteene) were comprehended; hee once againe starting from his faith, did absolutely refuse, alledging that hee did promise it, onely to doe the King some honour, verbo tenus, in word onely, but not with intent to confirme those Articles; neither could the example of the whole State moove him, nor the credit of Rotrod, Archbishop of Roan, (though sent from the Pope) compose the difference; because Henry would not otherwise agree then as the Pope did by his Bull confirme those Lawes, which would not be granted.

(22) Henry hereupon sent in Ambassage Iohn of Oxenford, and one Ridell, his Clerkes, to the Romane Bishop, praying that the Legatine power for England, might be committed to Roger Archbishop of Yorke, that so he might at last bring Thomas under; but neither did this plot thrive: for that the Pope (knowing that the cause was his owne more then Beckets) would not be an Author of any grievance unto him, (who in sorrow for that hee had so yeelded in promising, suspended himselfe from use of his priestly function, till upon sure hee was * repermitted) yet somewhat to gratifie the King, he by his Bull granted a sleight authority; which when the King saw to be but superficiall, and not well horned for his purpose, with great disdaine, he sent the Bull backe againe to the Popes stall.

(23) There followed now upon Thomas sundry molestations: for first, hee was * condemned in dammages for a Mannor, which Iohn de Marshall claimed; notwithstanding the Archbishop had enjoyed the same for a long time, without interpellation or disturbance. Then was there at Northampton, (where the king had summoned a Parliament) an account demanded of him for the king, to the value of thirtie thousand pound, which came to his hand during his Chancellorship. Whereunto his answere was, * That seeing he had formerly accounted, and that the kings eldest sonne Henrie, on his Fathers behalfe, and all the Barons of the Exchequer, and Richard de Lucie Iusticiar of England, had acquitted him toward the King of all accounts, and that hee came free from all actions and dangers to the Archbishopricke, that now therefore hee would not answere, as a Lay-man, having heretofore had so sufficient discharge: which refusall of his was aggravated with divers accusations layde upon him, as of contempt towards the King, in denying to come to his presence, being thereto commanded by him, and the like: whereto though he made excuses (reasonable enough, if true) yet the Peeres and the Bishops condemned all his moveables to the Kings mercy: and the Prelates perceiving the Kings displeasure to tend yet to some farther severity, premonished him to submit himselfe, for that otherwise the Kings Court intended to adiudge him a perjured person, and also a Traitor, for not yeelding temporall allegiance to his Temporall Soveraigne, as himselfe had sworn to due: and accordingly the Prelates themselves by joynt consent adjudged him of Perjury, and by the mouth of the Bishop of Chichester, disclaimed thenceforward all obedience unto unto him, as their Archbishop. The next day, whiles the Bishops and Peeres were consulting of some further course with him; Becket, not as yet daunted, caused to be sung before him at the Altar: The Princes sit and speake against mee, and the ungodly persecute me, &c. And forthwith taking his silver Crosier in his owne hands, (a thing strange and unheard of before) enters armed therewith into the Kings presence, though earnestly diswaded by all that wished him well: wherewith the King enraged, commanded his Peeres to sit in judgement on him, as on a Traitor and perjured person; and accordingly they adjudged him to be apprehended, and cast into prison. The Earles of Cornewall and Leicester, (who sate as Iudges) citing him forthwith to heare his sentence pronounced; he immediately appealed to the See of Rome, as holding them no Iudges competent: whereupon all reviling him with the name of Traitor, and the like; he replying, That were it not for his function; he would enter the Duell or Combat with them in the field, to acquit himselfe both of Treason and Perjurie, sped from the Court, and from thence without delay into Flaunders, disguising himselfe under the name of Dereman.

(24) The King on the other side, to leave nothing undone, whereby to atchieve his desire, forthwith dispatched away Gilbert, Bishop of London, and William, Earle of Arundel, to the French King, that he would not harbour nor cherish one that was fled as a Traitor; but prevailed not: for hee, upon the contrary dealt with the Pope, That as he loved the Romane Church, and the aide of France, so hee would support the cause of Thomas against the King: which whether he did it out of Faction, rather then Devotion, let others judge: for as we may easily thinke that the French would gladly incommodate the King of England: so this is not to be denyed, that Lewis was * often afterward a Mediator for Peace, and undoubtedly held the man himselfe in great estimation both alive and dead.

(25) The Archbishop growing thus in favour with the Pope, King Henry sends an Ambassage unto him of many great Personages, as Roger Archbishop of Yorke, the Bishops of London, Winchester, Chichester, Iohn of Oxenford, William Earle of Arundell, &c. whose whole imployment being breve vel precio, by requests and gratifications to procure disgrace unto Becket, their finall lute was, That the Pope would send two Cardinals into England, fully to end the matter; but the Pope denyed it, as holding it derogatory to his owne absolutenesse, saying, (like Gods Vice-gerent at least) * That is my own glory, which I will not give to any other; but when bee is to bee iudged, I will iudge him my selfe: For hee knew the King of England was mighty both in speech and meanes, and that Legates might easily bee corrupted, as being men more thirsty after gold and silver, then after justice and equitie: and the Pope and Cardinals wisely resolved (saith the Monke of Canterbury) that as, if this Archbishop were now upheld in his cause, it would be a patterne for others in like case to resist Kings; so, if he should sinke, no Bishops ever after would dare oppose themselves to their Soveraignes pleasures, and so the State of the Catholicke Church would bee shaken, and the Popes authority bee crushed.

The Archbishop relents in accent.

(26) The King having received this foyle, and impatient of repulse, where his owne subject was a party, thought the indignity offered by the Pope unsufferable, and to let him understand how hee tooke it, directs his Writs unto the Sheriffes in England, commanding them to attach such as did appeale to the Roman Court: the fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters, nephewes, and nieces of all such of the Clergy as were with the Archbishop; and to put them under sureties, as also to seise the revenewes, goods, and chattels, of the said Clergie men. Againe, by other his Letters to Gilbert Bishop of London, he sequestred the profits and livings, which within his Diocesse did belong to any of the Clergy, who were fled to Thomas, that (without the Kings leave) they might have no part thereof. Lastly, to his Iustices he signified; that they should safe keepe whosoever did bring any interdict into England, till the Kings pleasure were further known: he also caused the Church of Canterbury, and all the Archbishops goods to be confiscated, grounding himselfe (as may probably be suppofed, upon the judgement given against Becket at Northhampton, notwithstanding that the said sentence was expresly nullified by the Popes * Bull, and not onely by word of mouth, as * Matthew Paris seemes to mistake it. Neither was this all, for he banished out of the Realme, all the kindred of the Archbishop, man, woman, childe, and suckling babes, and forbad that he should be any longer publikely mentioned and prayed for in the Church as Archbishop of Canterbury.

The incensed Kings proceedings.

Matth. Paris. ad An. 1164.

(27) The Archbishop on the contrary part (the contention being now whether the power Ecclesiasticall or Secular, should worke most) did solemnely in France where hee abode, excommunicate all such as obeyed, defended, or had occasioned the saide Lawes and Avitall Customes, and some of the parties by name, as Richard de Lucie, Richard of Poictou, Iocelin de Bailull, Alan de Nevile, and other, who presently appealed; but the King having further notice, that Becket * after his publike Sermon, on a great Festivall day, had solemnely threatned the like Thunderclap against his Royall Person; either to terrifie his adversaries, or to revenge himselfe, if any such sentence should be against him, gathered a mighty Armie under pretence of subduing Wales, where yet he did little. The meane while Iohn of Oxenford (who not onely followed the Kings cause stoutly, but also * writ a learned booke in justifying of it against Becket) prevailed so farre at Rome, that two Legates à latere, should be sent into England, to reconcile the King and Thomas, but when they were gone, the pope hearing that they were resolved * utterly to confound the Archbishop, sent letters after them to rebate their absolute power, they being men (saith Gervasius) who two much thirsted after gold and glory.

(30) Howbeit, by mediation at length, the two Kings were againe reconciled, and at their friendly * enterview, Beckets well-willers advised him to submit himselfe, in the presence of both Kings, * without any more reservations; which hee seeming to yeeld to, presented himselfe very humbly, and referred the cause to the King, not now, Salvo ordine, suo, but yet on a new point, Salvo honore Dei, wherewith the King exasperated, told the French King, such was the humour of the man, that whatsoever disliked him, he would say it was against Gods honour, and so would be never the neerer to conformity; with which, and other speeches, King Lewis offended with Becket, asked him whether hee thought to be greater or holier then Saint Peter? and the Peeres of both Nations accused him of much arrogancy, as being of himselfe the wilfull hinderer of his owne, and the Churches tranquility.

(31) Notwithstanding, the Pope forgot not his faithfull Thomas, and therefore after hee had graced him with a confirmation of all the Priviledges, and powers, which any of his Predecessors in that See did injoy (to the daring and defiance as it were, of the Kings utmost indignation) the King sent a letter into Germany, declaring that hee would forsake Pope Alexander, and joyne with the Emperour, and Antipape. Whereupon, when the Bishop of Rome had commanded Gilbert Bishop of London, to admonish the King to give over his courses, and customes prejudicious to the Church, the said Bishop obeyed, and in his answere fought to persuade the Pope to a connivency, and forgets not to justifie his Soveraigne, as, That the King was ready to obey the sacred hests of the Church, saving to himselfe his owne and his Kingdomes dignity: That as for Appeales, hee and his Kingdomes dignity: That as for Appeales, hee and his Kingdomes dignity had ever reclaimed that honor by the ancient institution of his Kingdome, that is to say. That no Clerke should for a civill action depart the same, untill right could not be had in his Courts at home, and then he would hinder no man. That he did not banish the Archbishop of Canterbury, who might returne at his pleasure, so as he would observe all those his Grandfathers customes, which once hee had given his faith to doe: That the King thinkes himselfe greatly justified, in that hee is willing to stand to the judgement of the whole Church of his own kingdome, &c.

(32) But when mediations, letters, messages, or other wayes, would not prevaile; the Pope admonisheth the King, that hee meant no longer to restraine the Archbishop from revenging his owne, and his Churches injuries with the sword of censure, and thereupon (for a beginning) the Archbishop excommunicates Gilbert Bishop of London, and proceeded so farre with others, that there was scarce found in the Kings owne Chappell and presence such as might performe the wonted ceremonies.

(33) The King both touched with his owne wrongs, and tender of their case, who for his sake under-went that severity, animates Bishop Gilbert with most loving offers to beare the charges of prosecuting his appeale against Becket, and desires the Pope to send him Legates which might absolve his excommunicated Subjects, and settle a peace, or else hee should be compelled to provide otherwise for his owne security and honour.

(34) Two Cardinals therefore, Gratian and Vivianus, comming into France to end the contention, returne notwithstanding without possibility of doing good; for that Becket would not yeeld in any point those Customes, at which hee had once excepted, but with his ordinary limitations. At last yet by the Popes mediation, the two Kings of England and France met at Paris, whither the Archbishop repaired, and yet no peace ensued: for that the King refused the kisse of peace with him, and Becket would either have a found and full peace, or none at all; where, though the King of England refused to satisfie any thing under the name of restitution, as being against his honour (because all restitution implyed a wrong) yet in the other maine matter of his Avitall Customes, offering to stand to the judgement, not of his owne onely, but even of the Parisian Divines, and Church of France; hee came off from that conference with some advantage and favour, in the opinion of the hearers.

The King offers his cause to be judged by the Divines and Church of France.

(35) King Henry (for all this) seeing no issue of his long disquietnesse, and un-regall usages, understanding also that the Archbishop of Seins in person had solicited the Pope, to put the Kingdome of England under Interdict, (which is the prohibiting of the publike use of Christs Religion, and Christian Buriall throughout the whole land) he being then in Normandy, sends forth his Edict: That if any man bring from the Pope or Becket, any letters of Interdict, he should presently suffer as a Traitor to the king and the state. That no Clerke whatsoever goe forth of the land without a passe from his Justiciaries, and none returne againe without letters of licence from the King himselfe. That whose receives any message from the Pope or Becket, nor make any appeale unto them, nor hold any Plea by their mandates. That if any Prelate or Clerke, or Lay-man shall obey any sentence of interdict, hee and all his kindred shall be forthwith expulsed the land, and all his goods escheated to the Crowne. That all Clerkes who have rents in England, returne home within three Moneths, or else all their rents to fall to the King. That certaine Prelates specified, bee cited to answere in the Kings Courts for interdicting Earle Hughs lands. That Peter-pence be not paid to Rome, but reserved. Thus, (as Gervase the Monke lamentably complaineth) all from the eldest to the youngest throughout England, were made to abjure obedience to Pope Alexander and Becket.

(36) After all this, it came into King Henries mind, to sweeten these his many cares with some solace, and to crowne his Eldest sonne, young Henry, King of England, now in his owne life time: A counsell no more temerarious, then unfortunate: but of which he did hope to reape this consolation: that it was done in contempt of Becket, (whose office it was to have crowned the King, with some advantage also toward the perpetuation of the Avitall Customes, and that also without scruple of conscience, his sonne receiving the Crowne without caution, to preserve the churches liberty, either by him put in, or by others excalted. Yea rather, an Oath minisired, and by the yong King taken, to maintaine those Avitall Customes to the uttermost.

The King causeth his Sonne to be crowned King.

(37) This solemnity was performed, at Henrie the fathers commandement, by Roger Arch-bishop of Yorke, (the anciently rivall See of Canterbury) contrary to the Popes expresse Inhibition, the father himselfe King Henrie, being present thereat, though without any fortunate presage in comming, or cause of consolation in the action. For * he, in his inauspicious passage out of Normandy, arriving not without very great perill, at Portsmouth, the best and newest ship he had was suncke in the stormes, and therein, besides Henry de Agnellis and his two sonnes, Gilbert de Sullemni, Master Ralfe de Bealmont, the Kings Physitian and Favourite, with about foure hundred men and women more, were devoured of the working waves. And at the feast, the joyfull father himselfe, carrying the first dish, and the Archbishop of Yorke saying in pleasance of the young King: Rejoyce my sonne, for there is no Prince in the world, hath such a servitor attending at his table as you: The unnaturall young man answered; why? wonder you at that? my father knowes he doth nothing that misbecomes him, for so much as he is royall borne but of one side, but our selfe are royall borne both by father and mother.

Margaret should be honoured with like ceremonies. Thus the fathers patience was exercised on every hand, and worse things were feared.

(39) So now yet at last, in the seventh yeare of Beckets banishment, another meeting was had at Seins, whither, the two great Kings, and the Archbishop of Seins, and Bishop of Nevers, being together, the Archbishop of Canterburie repaired, and the treaty of peace was entred into, which at Ambois, in another meeting (at procurement of Rotrod Archbishop of Roan) was finished; and the Arch-bishop (knowing the King was terrified with the expectation of the foresaid imminent Interdiction) was restored to the Kings favour, and permitted to have full use of his Metropolitane See, and all the profits thereof with the arrerages. Which conclusion, the King signifies to his sonne into England, whither the Archbishop returnes, and lands at Sandwich: And thus the controversie betweene the King and his Archbishop seemed to be ended.

(40) But the Arch-bishop had not beene long in England, before he published the Popes Letters, by which, Roger Archbishop of Yorke, and Hugh Bishop of Durefme, were suspended from the use of their Episcopall function, for crowning the young King in prejudice of the See of Canterburie; and the Bishops of London, Exceter, and Sarisburie, cut off from the Church by censure, for assisting the said Archbishop at that Coronation, whom Becket would not, but under conditions, at the young Kings request, absolve. Whereupon a great complaint was carried into Normandy, to the father-King, * by some of the Bishops: and in the meane time, the Arch-bishop Thomas, putting himselfe upon the way to visite the young King, at Woodstocke in Oxford-shire, was commanded not to approach.

(41) At the newes of these late censures, the father-King was so sore displeased, that some words slipping from him, and arguing his great discontent, mooved Hugh Morvill, William Traci, Hugh Brito, and Richard Fitz-urse, knights and courtiers to post into England, and there in a furie, (without either warrant, or privitie of their Soveraigne) to murther the Arch-bishop (being then about * forty and eight yeares old) in his owne Church of Canterbury; which sacred Place, and Time, besides his high Calling, might have pleaded for pitry, had not the men beene wholly transported with barbarous rage. For howsoever wee are farre from their fancies, who, for his zeale to the Popes Soveraignty, have so mounted him to the top of Martyrs glory, that not onely the baseft part of his Shrine was pure gold, and * old Shoe was devoutly kiffed by all * passengers, but also shameleffe and numberleffe miracles are blindly ascribed unto him, and his * bloud almoft matched in vertue with our ever-bleffed Saviours: yet wee no leffe condemne their butcherly execution, who (how great foever his offence was against the King and State) had no lawfull authority to beare them out, or acquit them from the guilt of bloud.

(42) To shut up this long contention (which, as you see, would not be extinct but by bloud, nor take end but by his death, because any censure of our owne will be faid to favour of Time-serving, or State-pleasing, we will onely annexe the bare judgment of the fore-cited learned Monke of that time, who thus speakes: *Indeed though most mens custome is, in those, whom they love and praise, to extoll whatsoever they have done, (an argument of their great affection, but slender wisedome) yet in plaine truth, those things which the venerable Archbishop so acted, that no profit at all thence proceeded, but the Kings wrath onely was kindled (whereby so many mischiefes afterward arose) I doe not thinke to be praise-worthy, though they sprang from a laudable zeale, as it was in the blessed Prince of the Apostles, who attaining the top of Apostolicall perfection, taught the Gentiles by his example to Judaize; for which the Doctor of the Gentiles * declares that he deserved to be reprehended, though hee did it with a praise-worthy and pious intent.* And in another place: The Archbishop was hot in zeale of Justice, but whither fully according to knowledge, God knoweth, (for it is not for a man of my meane quality, rashly to judge of so great a mans Actions) but I thinke, the blessed Pope Gregory would have dealt more mildly, and winkt at those things which might have beene borne, without any hazard of the Christian faith, &c. and then concludes: Therefore, that which the venerable Archbishop then did, I neither judge that it is to be commended, neither presume I to condemne it, &c. For good men are so to be loved, or lauded by us, that wee neither love nor laud those acts wherein they shew themselves to be fraile men, but onely those things wherein without scruple wee ought to imitate them: and therefore they are wisely and warily to bee praised, that Gods prerogative may be reserved intire to himselfe.

Nubrig. l. 2. c. 24

(43) Some other learned men there were, who lived neere to that time, whose censure was farre sharper then that Monks: Such were some of those Divines of Paris, mentioned by * Cæsarius the Monke, who saith, The question was debated to and fro amongst the Doctors, in the universitie of Paris, whether Thomas were damned or saved: amongst whom, Rogerius the Norman avowed, that he deserved death and damnation, for his contumacie against his King, the Minister of God: but Petrus Cantor alleadged, that his miracles were signes of his salvation, &c. And indeed it all bee true which one man hath written in five bookes, containing his 270 Miracles, we cannot but acknowledge him, both the greatest Saint, and the merriest too, that ever got into heaven; so ridiculous are many things recorded of him. As that of Ailwardus, who for stealing of a great wheat tone (which the Author that writes it, best deserved) being deprived of his eyes and * Virilities, by sentence of Law; upon prayer to Saint Thomas he had all restored againe: Yea, even a * Bird having beene taught to speake, flying out of her Cage, and ready to be seized on by a Spar-Hauke, said onely, Saint Thomas helpe me, and her enemy fell presently dead, and shee escaped, and (belike) reported it. Of which great power in this Saint, how can we doubt? sith we read, that even in his life time the * Virgin Mary her self was contented to be his Sempster, and sowed his shirt with red silke? Many of which kind of follies, (if that word be sharpe enough) might be here inserted, were not our present argument more serious, and these forgeries fit onely for Monkes to indite, children to reade, and fooles to beleeve.

(44) The report of the tragicall outrage on the Arch-bishop comming to the old King, at Argenton in Normandy; there was no kinde of forrow, into which, (without respect to Majestie, or State) he fell not; and not without cause, as knowing how plentifull an Hydra of mischiefes (upon the opinion of his privity with the fact) would rise, if not prevented. But the murtherers, fearing least this their fact would displease the King, in whose revenge they did it, fled into the North, and abode one whole yeare in the Kings Castle at Knaresborough in Yorkeshire; perhaps by favour of the young King: none of them dying for the fact by way of Justice, because the Clergie exempting themselves from the bonds of civill Lawes, the punishment of a Priest-killer (as by some it appeareth) was not then the death of the Body by execution of capitall sentence; but of soule by excommunication, till about the twenty third yeare of this King, it was (at the instant suit of Richard Archbishop of Canterburie, and of the Bishops of Winchester, Elie, and Norwich) yeelded, that such persons should suffer losse of life.

(46) Henry

King Henry projects the conquest of Ireland.

(46) Henry therefore, among so many perplexities rising out of the Archbishops murther, saw no way so ready for the calming his owne perturbations, or for the averting mens thoughts from the consideration of that scandalous Tragedie, as to undertake some great and noble enterprise, which now offered it selfe very seasonably. For Ireland, a very spacious and plentifull Iland, and lying commodiously for the uses of the English, burned in it selfe with civill divisions, kindled among the petty Kings and Princes thereof: while Rhothericke the Great, called O Conor Dun, Prince of Connaught, abusing his power and the advantage of the times, to the oppression of his neighbours, sought to make himselfe the universall King thereof, having already invaded the Title and Stile of KING AND MONARCH OF IRELAD. And this his purpose was much advanced by the fatall and familiar errour of proceedings in like cases: for the Irish Princes, either through distrust or pride, forbearing to unite their forces against the common enemy, while each provides for one, they are all, as it were, overcome.

(47) Moreover, * Dermot Mac Murgh (in that time of the Irish Pentarchie, or five-fold Kingdome) having secretely stolne away the wife of Rothericke, (a light woman, and consenting or plotting rather, and urging the rape it selfe) added to Rothericks ambition, a just desire of revenge, for so notable, impudent, and publique injurie, so much the more odious in Dermots person, for that hee was old: neither was this all; for the causes of this change were higher.

* Matth. Paris.

An. Dom. 1053. Dermots sute for aids filed by Henry.

(48) The onely disposer and translator of Kingdomes is God; and in Ireland to move him to offence (without which no Kingdome is transferred) against the people thereof, all such sinnes abounded, as commonly forgoe the greatest changes: for not onely the manners of the Nation, were extreamely corrupted, but the Christian faith it selfe decayed; barbarisme over-running the one, and * more then superstitions the other. But it may seeme by some * Authors, that King Henries particular inducements to that Action, were both an ancient title unto that Kingdome, derived from his ancestors (the Kings of England) for many ages before him; and * many unsufferable wrongs (by their Piracies) unto the English Merchants, buying and selling their Captives, and using Turkish tyranny on their bodies: which made the Irish Clergie themselves confesse, that they had deservedno other, then that their land should bee transferred to that Nation whom they had so cruelly handled. Notwithstanding, King Henrie, who knew how great and dangerous tumults the Popes had raised on small occasions, thought his way would be much easier, if he went onward with the Popes good favour, which he easily obtained (so liberall is his holinesse of that which is none of his) for a fee; viz. a penny yeerely to be paid to Saint Peter of every house in Ireland. Touching which point, Rossus of Warwicke, (no Protestant, I assure you,) saith, That Englands King is not bound to relie on the Popes graunt for Ireland, nor yet to pay that Taxe, because hee had claime to that Kingdome by an hereditary right: and that the Pope had no temporall interest therein (as his favorites pretended) the often mentioned Monke of New-borough can tell us, who saith, that Nunquam externa subjacuit ditioni, Ireland was never subject to any forraine command.

(49) God Almighty therefore did now put it into the heart of Henrie, for the reforming of that Kingdome, to make a Conquest thereof, having in his infinite wisedome before-hand fitted all circumstances needfull to concurre, for inducing so wary and frugall a Prince to such an enterprise, which thus tooke beginning.

(50) Dermot Mac Murgh, being in possession of his fatall Helen (the adulterous wife of Rhotherick) was pursued so eagerly with the revenging sword of his enemy (who, howsoever wounded in heart with the abuse of his Bed, rejoyced in the colour and occasion ministred thereby, for him to seize upon the flourishing provinces of Leinster) as he was driven to flie from place to place, and at the length to quit his kingdome also, the subjects whereof his tyranny and vices had unsetled in their affections toward him. Thus desperate of helpe at home, his last deliberations were to draw in forraine aides, the necessitie of his case requiring it; and for that purpose, finally resolves to repaire to the court of the wise and potent Henrie, King of England, being then in Aquitaine: neither could Dermot but know, that it had heretofore beene in Henries desigues, at such time as he meant to subdue it for William of Anjou, his yongest brother, and also, because his present Dominions did halfe (as it were) environ it. In which hopes he was not deceived; for Henry listened thereunto very willingly, as to a thing which he had indeed * some yeares before projected.

Dermots sute succours.

(51) King Dermot therefore was heard in his suite. But, because the thing, as at that time, neither seemed great enough for such a Prince as Henrie to undertake directly, nor as yet was held sufficiently discovered to his hand; that therefore the Ice might be broken by inferiour meanes, and as well the conveniences, as inconveniences, founded to the depth, (without engaging his royall person, name, or power,) it was by the Kings letters permitted to Dermot (the exiled prince) to draw what * adventurers, or voluntaries, either the Commiseration of his estate, or other respects, of pietie, profit, or delight in armes, could allure to the action. Now whether it were, for that he, whose Countries lay toward the coasts of Wales, (and within ken upon a cleare day) by commodity thereof might entertaine intelligence, as well as trafficke, with the Inabitants of those parts; or, for that the fame of their Chevalry did invite; or, for that his acquaintance at his arrivall grew there first; or, for that these and many other circumstances met in this accident: sure it is, that Dermot raised his first and principall succours from among the English Colonies there.

Robert Fitz-Stephen * Ambires ill Iam Stephan-dus. * Camb. p. 738.

(52) The Welsh had then in their hands a valiant Gentleman of Norman race, one Robert * Fitz-Stephen, who by Gilbert de Clare was entrusted with the defence of the towne of Cardigan, but through * treachery the Towne being surprised, Robert was also delivered to Reese ap Griffin, Prince of South-Wales, who would hearken to no other endentments of his liberty, but onely, that hee should for ever abandon his possessions in Wales. Whereupon (the opportunity of Dermots quarrell giving hopes of new fortunes) immediately hee entred into contract with the Irish King, promising by a certaine day to come to his succour, with as many Voluntaries, as his remaining fortunes, or the hope of the Voyage could stirre: which hee * did accordingly performe, leaving it very disputable, whether with more sucesse or courage. But Dermot well knowing that the fortunes of this Gentleman (to whose valour nothing seemed impossible) were unable to undergoe the whole weight of the unknowne worke, had formerly dealt with the renowned Lord, Richard of the house of Clare, * Earle of Pembrooke, surnamed Strong-bow: the man whom the Fate of Ireland did expect.

My last offers now shall not shew a more "desire to use thy forces, then a love to thy person "and vertues. They are not trifles I propose, but that "of which God himselfe doth seeme to mee to have "laid the ground, seeing it is his holy will that thou "at this time shouldst bee without a Wife. Know "thou then, that I have but one daughter Eva, the "heire of my Crowne, and comfort of my age: let "thine owne eye tell thee how faire and worthy: "this I dare avouch, that thou wilt thinke far broa"der seas well crost, for view of so honest beauty: "she in the first blossome of her youth, a virtuous "Virgine, and by both Parents borne of Princes, shall "at thine arrivall, with this right hand, bee made "thine, and with her, after my death, my whole "Realme, and other my rights whatsoever: which "were they infinitely more, (despise not such love, "nor the alliance of one distressed, but nevertheleſſe "a King,) I would repute them farre too little for "such a sonne in law: who though thy selfe as yet "no King* art come of Kings, and it is my whole "and last ambition, that I may live to make thee "one. The Earle accepted the conditions, resolute to set up Dermot againe, and for that purpose bound himselfe by solemne contract, to the full performance of his part within a certaine time.

(53) Dermot having thus negotiated his affaires and set it in so good forwardnes, while his friends in England prepared themselves and their Forces, lest hee should seeme to relie upon forraigne aides, and so to diminish with them the reputation of his owne valour and alliances at home; hee sayles backe into his Countrey; carrying with him the promises of confederates, and there both by his presence and perswations did the best hee could to facilitate the entrance of the English; whose honourable entertainements, devotions, civility, riches, valours, wisedome, and victorious greatnesses he spared not to celebrate, as instruments advancing his owne designes: which raysed no little expectation, mixt with contrary affections of desire and feare.

He marrieth the Lady Eua.

(57) But Dermot, Authour of this calamity to his Nation, reſolute in his purpoſe, in full complement of his Contract, doth openly in ſolemne manner beſtow his promiſed daughter Eva, upon the Conquerour in marriage, with his owne right hand giving her in the Church: at which time the famous Stronghow did not celebrate his particular Wedding-day, but the indiſſoluble knot of the Iriſh allegeance to the Engliſh Soveraignty, with the ſame Ring which circuled his wives finger, affiancing that Iland to this our Countrey.

(58) The marriage performed, it was farre from the mind of the Earle to ſpend much time in revels and feaſts, but conſults with his men of warre what was next to be done for the ſetling his Father in law King Dermot, and for finiſhing the Conqueſt which was now ſo happily begun, in two ſeverall parts of Ireland at once. Leaving therefore a ſufficient Garriſon to make good the places already gain'd, and to ſecure the landing of freſh ſupplies, he ſets forward with his ſelected Companies, to whoſe victorious weapons the whole Realme lay open, ſo farre forth, that Rotherick himſelfe was very well contented (notwithſtanding his lately uſurped, and ſwelling title of Monarch of Ireland) to hold himſelfe within the bogs and faſtneſſes of his peculiar Realme, the wilde, and mountainous Connaught; meane while, Strong-bow keeps on his way over the boſome of Ireland to the principall Citie thereof, Dublin, taking in (as he marcheth) all the places about, and ſecuring himſelfe by pledges, of their loyalty, or otherwiſe as he ſaw moſt fit. In which journey pleaſed with the delight and fertile ſituation of * Kildare, there reſolved to ſettle his abode, and to erect a ſeat to his poſterity.

(59) The fame of theſe ſucceſſes wafting over the Iriſh Seas, and comming to the King, made him reſolve to paſſe in perſon thither, that hee might have the honour of the Conqueſt: and not approving ſuch forwardneſſe in the Earle, who (as ſome * ſay) were againſt his expreſſe Commandement, (and indeed * Giraldus who lived at that time, calls his leave no better then an Ironicall leave) and for that hee knew not to what inſolency ſuch faire fortune might in time allure, as alſo for that they ſeemed to handle the Natives too rigorouſly; * thereupon hee forbids by his Proclamations, any Veſſell to carry any thing out of his Dominions into Ireland, and commands all Engliſh to returne before Eaſter, and leave off their attempts, or their eſtates in England ſhould bee ſeized for the King. By which Edict theſe affaires were brought into fearefull extremity, which was changed into better condition by the travell of Herveius de Monte Mariſco, on the behalfe of the Earle, and the adventurers, who finding the King in Glouceſterſhire, with an Army for Ireland, appeaſed his diſpleaſure upon theſe termes: That the King ſhould have the head Citie of the Kingdome, Dublin, with the adjacent Cantreds, with all the Coaſt-Townes and Caſtles, the reſt to remaine to the Conquerours to hold of the King, and of his Heires, and ſo to be under his protection, as Subjects ought, and as they were before; which ſubjection it ſeemed to the King they meant to have renounced.

(60) The Kings goodly Navy lay in Milford-haven, to which as he journeyed, hee thundred againſt the Welſh Nobility, comming to entertaine him, for ſuffering Strong-bow to depart: At laſt being imbarkt, he had a faire Gale which ſet him ſafe in Ireland with all his Forces at Waterford, where firſt hee commits to priſon Robert Fitz-Stephen, whom the Citizens preſented bound, having held him in cuſtody, under colour of doing good ſervice, becauſe he had entred Ireland without the Kings particular leave; yet ſoone after the King releaſed him, but deprived him of Weiſford, and the Territories. Then takes he the homages of ſuch petty-Kings, and principall perſons of the Iriſh as repaired, diſmiſſing them in honourable ſort, meaning to winne them by gentle, and not exaſperating courſes; and marching through Oſſyrie to Dublin, he takes O Rotherick the King of Connaughts homage by Hugh Lacie, and William Fitz-Aldelm: Laſtly, at Dublin he kept his Chriſtmas in Royall ſtate, which to behold, very many of the Iriſh Princes came thither.

writes, God ſtirred up the Kings owne bowels againſt himſelfe. Cauſes of this unhappy diſſention, there were many: Firſt, a Queene and Wife, violently vindicative for wrong done unto her Bed by the King, who was immoderately addicted to varietie of loves: then Ambition in an evill-natur'd Child; and laſtly, pernicious Actors and inſtruments, who, for their owne ends, nourished this curſed miſchiefe; ſo as if we ſhould out of our ſtories re-capitulate the ſeverall occaſions taken by the ſonne againſt the father, wee ſhould rather ſhew you the colours, then the cauſes: For none of thoſe cauſes which his Sonne pretended, ſeemed great enough with men that feare God, to beare out ſuch continuall diviſions as followed.

(65) The head of this conſpiracy was very great, and juſtly very terrible: for on the ſide of King Henry the ſonne, there were the Kings of France and Scotland, * Richard and Geffrey, two yonger ſonnes of the King of England, whom by their mothers perſwaſions they forſooke, to follow the young King; David the Scottiſh Kings brother, Philip Earle of Flanders, (a Peere of France, and a potent Prince,) Matthew Earle of Boloigne, Theobald Earle of Blois, Hugh Earle of Cheſter, Robert Earle of Leiceſter, Hugh Bygod Earle of Norfolke, Roger Mowbray, and other great ones, in great numbers, ſo as nothing ſeemed wanting, but onely a good cauſe, which (ſuch as it was) Queene Elianor, like an Alecto, kept alive, ſo much as lay in her, with perpetuall fomentations. And indeed the ſcope of theſe confederats did require no leſſe a combination, it being to depoſe the Father, whom it pleaſed them (for countenance of their ungodly armes) to repute no King, becauſe hee had crowned his ſonne.

(66) Though nothing then could come more grievous, to the bleeding heart of a moſt loving father, then ſuch a warre; yet not to be unprovided, hee (like a Souldier) prepares himſelfe, when faire meanes failed, and found multitudes ready to live and dye with him; the indignity of the unnaturall revolt, did ſo much inflame all honeſt courages, which acknowledged him their Soveraigne.

(67) The particular accidents of the wars would fill a volume. At one time Normandy, Guyen, and Britaine were invaded by the confederates in France, and at the ſame time Cumberland by the Scots. But the King of England had friends in all thoſe parts, and himſelfe hearing that Vernuill was * beſieged by the French King in perſon, hee began at laſt to kindle, having, like a ſleeping Lion, ſitten ſtill all that while, and for that the place had (upon parlea) agreed to render if ayde came not by a day, hee arrived to their ſuccour within the time, * ſending King Lewis word that hee ſhould get him forth of Normandy with ſpeed, or he would without faile, come, and ſee how hee did upon that very day. Lewis, meaning nothing leſſe then to put his owne Crowne in danger, while he ſought one for his ſonne in law, (and therefore in all the warre-time would never ſet up his reſt upon a battell,) but willing otherwiſe to doe to King Henry the father, all the harme he could, by countenancing the faction, and ſupporting the revolted male-contents with his beſt meanes, and knowing King Henry was a ſowre and terrible Prince when he came indeed to fight, immediately raiſed his ſiege, and with as much haſt as he might, abandoned the place, * leaving his Campe, Tents, and warlike proviſions behind, and retired into France.

Roger Hoved. Matth. Paris.

(68) And though King Henry, beginning now indeed to ſhake his dreadfull ſword, had many faire dayes of his enemies, mixt with ſome loſſes both of men and other ſtrengths, though not great, nor many, in regard of the overthrowes which on his behalfe were given: For that in Britaine his forces had in battell vanquiſhed * Hugh Earle of Cheſter, and Ralph de Foulgiers, and ſlaine about one thouſand and five hundred of their army; and in England, Reignald Earle of Cornewall, and Richard de Lucy, had in bloudy battell * overthrowne the inſolent Earle of Leiceſter,

* entred the Towne of Leiceſter by force; and that he had the perſons of the ſaid * Hugh Lupus Earle of Cheſter, Ralph de Foulgiers, and very many other priſoners of eſpeciall note and Nobility; yet Lewis the French King mooving a parlea, the father deſirous to uſe the good fortune of warre, to reclaime his rebels, was ſo willing to make peace, that hee might ſeeme to have out gone expectation in the quality of his offers, but through ſuch wicked perſwaſions as were uſed, prevailed not.

(69) A violent fire-brand in this diviſion, was Robert Earle of Leiceſter, being matched with a Lady no leſſe proud, and ſtomachious then himſelfe; who at this meeting, was not contented to have affronted King Henry the father, on the behalfe of his young Lord and Maſter the ſonne, but (after many words of reproach) is ſaid to have laid his daring hand upon his ſword, with purpoſe to have ſtrucken the King, had he not beene withholden: (and where ſuch ſpirits had to doe, it is eaſie to gueſſe what kinds of counſell were like to be embraced and purſued;) having forſaken the father, not for that the others cauſe was more honeſt, but for that (ſaith Thomas Walſingham) the father King, labouring to enlarge the Regall-power, ſought to ſet his foote upon the neckes of the proud and haughty.

(70) But God, who meant to chaſtiſe the King, and not to deliver him up into his enemies hands, deſtroyed thoſe hopes that mooved the ſonnes to their unnaturall attempts; for it was not long after, when newes came into Normandy, that his faithfull friends and ſervants, * Richard de Lucy, and Humphrey de Bohun high Conſtable of England, together with the powers of Reignald Earle of Cornewall the Kings Vncle, Robert Earle of Glocceſter, and William Earle of Arundell, not farre from Bury, couragiouſly encountred with the Earle of Leiceſter, and his * Flemmings, of whom above * five thouſand were ſlaine, or taken, and among the priſoners was the Earle himſelfe, and * his Amazonian Counteſſe, whoſe perſons at his Commandement were not long after brought over into Normandy.

(73) Thither * came unto him out of England, Richard (the Elect of Winchеſter) ſent with all haſt by the Kings Iuſticiaries, to lay open unto him, the dangerous eſtate wherein the Realme at that time ſtood. For after that Philip Earle of Flanders had ſolemnely ſworne to invade England, in ſupportation of young Henries quarrell, fundry forces arriving and joyning with Hugh Bygod Earle of Norfolke, had taken and ſpoyled the City of Norwich, and done otherwiſe much harme, whereby the young King and his faction had taken great encouragement, as if the dye of Warre were turned, and aſwell the young King as the Earle of Flanders, were come with forces to the Coaſts, there to tranſport for England: * Moreover, Robert Earle Ferrers of Derby (who was ſalne from the father.) had suddenly entred upon Nottingham, burnt the Towne, beaten out the Kings Garrison, slaine the people, and (enricht with spoyle) retired to Leicester, whither about the same time, Anketill Malorie (Constable thereof) had also brought about two hundred prisoners, taken at Northampton, which he (with slaughter of the like number of the Towns-men) had also suddenly surprized and taken: so that the Realme stood doubtfull, and in extreame perill; to the encrease whereof, William King of Scots (being deepe in the confederacy) invaded England, dividing his Forces, himselfe with part wasting Northumberland, and Duncan (a very cruell Captaine) with the other destroying the Westerne Borderers.

(74) The Father wonderfully stirred heerewith, leaves Normandy in as good assurance as the time would permit, and sends before him to the Ships, Eleanor his owne Queene, and Queene Margaret his sonnes wife, his sonne John, &c. the Earle of Leicester and his Countesse, with many other prisoners, and a mightie Armie; but the winde changing, and hee compelled to stay in Harbour at Barbefleet in Normandie, where hee had taken shipping, hee is said (GOD touching his heart) to have utrered these words with much remorse, in the presence "of all; If my purpose in this voyage be for the "peace of the Clergy and people, and if the King "of Heaven shall vouchsafe to quiet and calme these "troubles at my arrivall, then for his mercies sake "wee beseech him to send us a prosperous winde: "But if he be against it, and hath resolved to visit the "Kingdome of England with the rod of his fury, let "him grant mee never to touch the shore of that "Country more. His prayer thus utrered from the depth of soule, was seconded with a fresh perie of winde: whereupon setting sayle, hee arrived safe the same day with all his Navie at the Port of Hampton in England.

King Henry sailes into Normandy.

(75) The next day he tooke his journey towards Canterbury, where (as it appeareth) the residue of his penance enjoyned him at his Absolution, was to be performed. For, besides the fore-mentioned conditions, the Legates enjoyned him (saith the * Author of Beckets life) some other thing secretly, which came not to our knowledge; yea the * Legates themselves wrote in their owne letters, that he then promised to doe (voluntarily, if ye list to beleeve it) some things which was not fit for them to lay open in writing. And well might they be ashamed thereof; but if it were so unfit to be written, how unfit was it to be imposed on such a Soveraigne Prince? what it was, let * Hoveden report. The King comming towards the Church, where the late Archbishop was buried, clad all in woollen, went three miles bare footed, insomuch, that the very ground where he went, was bloody, as was evidently seene, much blood running from his tender feete which were cut with the hard stones. Neither yet was this the worst; for after all this, Hee received Discipline at the hands of the Bishops, of a great many Priests, and of the Monks. Gervasius names Abbots also, whereby appeares, that every severall sort were to have a hand in that service. Matthew Paris can tell you more plainly what that Discipling was: viz. hee received the discipline of rods on his bare flesh, receiving of every religious man, (a great multitude of them being there gathered) 3. or 5. jerkes a piece: whence we may easily beleeve, Baronius and his * Author spake within compasse, who acknowledge hee received 80. lashes. To such height was the Papall tyranny and pride growne towards those, of whom God had said expressely, Touch not mine Anointed.

(76) Yet some Monks of that age, attribute the happy and great successe which ensued, to the reconcilement which King Henrie thus made with GOD for the blood of Thomas, because it pleased God to deliver his enemy William King of Scots into the hands of his souldiers about that very time, and did also with stormes beate backe into France his disobedient sonne the young King, being now under saile for England, scattering the whole Fleete, and almost sinking it with tempest.

armes being laid apart upon all hands. The chiefe points of that wished peace were: 1. That Henry the young King, with Richard and Geffrey, his Brethren, should returne, freed from all oathes of confederation, to the King their Fathers obedience, as to their Lord and Father. 2. That Prisoners should be set at large without ransome on all hands. 3. That William King of Scots, the Earle of Leicester and Chester, Ralph de Foulgiers, and other, who had compounded for their ransome, before this conclusion, should have no benefit of this exemption. 4. That King Henry the Father should take assurance of loyalty toward him by hostage, or oath of such as were enlarged. 5. That King Henry the sonne should ratifie that Grant which his Father the King had made to his son John, of some Castles, and yeerely rents in England, &c. The Scale it selfe, wherewith the yong king made this mentioned Ratification, we have here annexed.

(80) Touching King William of Scotland, his fore-mentioned compounding, our Historians all agree not, some saying more, * some lesse: but * Hector Boetius (a Scotish Historian of some credit with that Nation) writes; 1. That King William was to pay 100000. li. Sterling for his ransome, the one halfe in present coyne, the other 50000. li. upon time. 2. That for assurance of that summe the Earledomes of Northumberland, Cumberland, and Huntington should rest in morgage. 3. That King William should move no warre against England for the retention of those lands. 4. That, for the more security of the premises, the castles of Berwicke, Edenbrough, Roxbrough and Striveling should be delivered to the English.

(82) The face of England at this present, was like that of a quiet skye and sea, no blast, no billow, no appearing signe of discontentment; which the better to continue, King Henry the Father accompanyed with the King his sonne, omitted no office of a iust and prudent Governour, visiting a great part of his Realme in person, consulting, ordering and enacting such Lawes and courses, as might most establish the good of Peace. Hence it came, that at London both the Kings were present in a Synode, in which Richard lately chosen Archbishop of Canterbury, did publish (* with the Kings assent) certaine Canons for the better governement of the Church of England, beginning thus; At the true fountaine of all happy rule, that is to say, at the honour of God, and establishment of Religion and Discipline, &c. and amongst the rest, this one Canon in especiall words is enacted, both by authority of the King and Synod, (and indeed worthy for ever to bee in force) That every Patrone taking reward for any presentation, should for ever loose the Patronage thereof. And the same King not long after being at Woodstocke, in accomplishment of such holy purposes, by advise of the Clergy provided men to such Bishoprickes, Abbacies, and principall Cures as were vacant, where King Henry the Father forgat not his true friend Iohn of Oxenford, whom he preferred to the See of Norwich.

(83) From hence comming to Terke, he set those parts in peace; whither William King of Scots * repaying, sundry matters of importance were handled betweene the two Kings: as likewise afterward at Windsor (where the King had called a great assembly of the Lords Spirituall and Temporall) Rotherick King of Connaughs in Ireland (at the suite of his Ambassadors, the Archbishop of Thuamon and Toomund, and others of that nation, subjects to Rotherick) was received into protection and favour, and became Tributary: King Henry being unwilling * to fish with an hooke of Gold, which in warring upon Ireland hee should feeme to doe. In an other Parliament, not long after, at Northampton, he caused England to be divided into sixe circuits, and to each Circuit three Iusticiars Itinerants deputed; and as well to give his Lawes more free passage, as also the better to secure himselfe hee threw to the Earth sundry * Castles which had bin formerly kept against him, as Leicester, Huntington, Walton, Groby, Stutesbury, &c. and had the rest both in his English and in his French Dominions committed to his disposition.

(84) The young King * about these times discovered fresh alienations in his mind against his Father; who yet dissembling all, did arme notwithstanding upon the defensive, and replenished both England and Normandy with Garrisons, which drew the sonne the sooner to come in.

(85) But the old King not unwilling perhaps (lest the Brethrens concord might proove no better then a conspiracy against the Father) that his warlike Children should contend, * did nourish debate among them: Certaine it is, that to divert the warre from himselfe, hee appeased his sonne the King with an encrease of maintenance for himselfe, amounting in the whole to an hundreth pounds of Anjouin by the day, and ten pounds of the same money for his wife the Queene: and whereas Alice (daughter of Lewis then King of France, who was married at three yeeres of age to Richard (second sonne of King Henry) when he was but seven, and now demanded of King Henry the Father, to the intent that Richard her husband might enjoy her, the old King who was

(86) But while the young King by his Fathers * inſtigation ſought by force to conſtraine young Richard to doe homage to him for Aquitane, and King Henry the Father for the ſame cauſe commanded Geffrey his third ſonne, Duke of Britaine (whom ſome for his extraordinary perfidiouſneſſe in this ſervice toward his Father, and manifold Sacrileage, cals the * Child of Perdition) to ayde and aſſiſt his ſaid elder brother; while alſo the jealous Father (out of the ſtrife of his ſonnes) ſought his owne ſafety, and in nouriſhing it, had by the treachery of the ſaid ſonnes bin twice endangered, and had at both times beene wonderfully preſerved; and while the young King by profound diſſimulations, plotted to bring both his Father and Brother Richard into ſubjection; behold the hand of God by taking away the young King at Martell not farre from Linoges, where his Father lay at ſiege, gave an end to this odious, foule, and intricate contention.

(87) Thus was his life cut off like a Weavers threed (ſay * Authors) who had by dying cut off the hope of many: But whatſoever his life was, which God thus ſhortned at his age of twenty and eight yeares; certainely his death was not inglorious, but worthy to be ſet out in Tables at large as a patterne to diſobedient Children: for his Father refuſing to viſite him (fearing his owne life,) but ſending his Ring in ſigne of forgiveneſſe; the dying Prince moſt humbly with floods of teares kiſſing the ſame, made a moſt ſorrowfull confeſſion of his ſinnes, and feeling death approach, would needes be drawne (as an unworthy ſinner) out of his owne bed, and laid upon another, ſtrewed with aſhes, where his ſoule departed in a moſt penitent manner from his body; which being related to the Father, he fell upon the earth, weeping bitterly, and (like * another David for his Abſolon) mourned very much, O quam nefandum eſt! ſaith "one moſt gravely; O how hainous a thing it is for "ſons to perſecute the father! for neither the ſword of "the fighter, nor the hand of an enemy, did avenge the "fathers wrong, but a fever and a flux with excoriation "of the bowels. His body was buried (by his owne deſire) at Roan; (which yet was not done without trouble, as if the factions, of which he was the cauſe in his life, did by a kind of Fate, not forſake him being dead; for the Citizens of Mauns having interred it, they of Roan without menaces, and the fathers expreſſe Commandement, could not obtaine it, who thereupon was taken up againe,) but his wife Queene Margaret was ſent backe into France, and his ſurviving ſonnes were once againe reduced to due obedience, not any enemy dating to appeare.

(88) Who would not have thought, that this ſtirring Prince, ſhould have had opportunity to end his dayes in peace and glory? but it was otherwiſe ordained by God, and ancient Writers hold, hee was principally ſcourged, for being drawne, by ſeeming reaſons of State, to put off an holy enterprize, the occaſion whereof, was laid as it were at his foote. For Heraclius Patriarke of Ieruſalem, drawne with the ſuper-eminent fame of King Henries wiſedome, valour, riches, and puiſſance, travailed from thence into England, where, * at Clerkenwell by London, in an Aſſembly of the States purpoſely called, the King made knowne to them: That Pope Lucius had by earneſt Letters, commended the lamentable ſtate of the Holy-land, and the Patriarke Heraclius unto him: That Heraclius (there preſent) had ſtirred compaſſion, and teares, at the rehearſall of the tragicall afflictions of the Eaſterne World, and had brought with him (for memorable * ſignes, that the ſuite was by common conſent of the Countrey) the Keyes of the places of Chriſts Nativity, Paſſion, and Reſurrection; of Davids Tower, and of the holy Sepulchre; and the humble offer of the Kingdome of Ieruſalem, with the Enſigne or Standard of the Kingdome, as * duely belonging to him, who was right heire thereunto; to wit, the ſonne of Geffrey Earle of Anjou, whoſe brother Fulke was King of Ieruſalem.

(89) Nevertheleſſe, (the King having, at leaſt-wiſe formally, adjured the Lords to adviſe him, that which ſhould bee moſt for his Soules health) it was thought fit, to ayde the cauſe with money, but not to employ his perſon, nor the perſon of any Child hee had, which was the Patriarks laſt requeſt; and thereupon (to the unſpeakeable griefe of the ſaid Patriarke, and of the whole Chriſtianity of the Eaſt) hee refuſed the ſaid Kingdome, and abandoned as noble an occaſion of immortall renowne, as ever any King of England had beene offered; but gave leave * to all ſuch as would, to take upon them the Croſſe and ſerve. This Heraclius is hee who dedicated the Temple-Church in London, as by this Inſcription over the Church-doore in the Stone-worke doth appeare.

(90) Thus the forrowfull Patriarke being diſmiſſed (not forgetting as * ſome doe write, to thunder againſt the King for abandoning the cauſe) brought backe nothing but diſcomfort and deſpaire, the Weſterne Princes (by the Divels malicious Arts) being wrapt and knotted in mutuall ſuſpitions and quarrells indetermined; whereupon ſhortly after enſued, with the loſſe of Ieruſalem, the captivity of Guido King thereof, and of innumerable Chriſtians beſides; whom Sultan Saladin, Prince of the Muſſulmans or Saracens, to the griefe and diſgrace of all the Chriſtian world, did vanquiſh.

(91) But, King Henries mind was more fixed on ſetling the State of his already-poſſeſſed Kingdomes, and therefore in a great Parliament, held at Oxford, (unto which came Rheſus and David, Kings of South-Wales and North-Wales, with other their chiefe Nobles, which all did there ſweare fealty to the King) he being deſirous to advance his ſonne John (whom he exceedingly loved, and commonly in ſport, he called Sans-terre) having aſſured upon him certaine Lands and Rents in England and Normandy, did there very ſolemnely give him alſo the title and Kingdome of Ireland: for, (beſides the foreſaid Bull of Pope Adrian the fourth, who for ſigne of inveſtiture had alſo ſent a * Ring of Gold, which were laid up in the Records at Wincheſter) Giraldus (who lived in that age) tels us, (to omit what hee writes of one Gurguntius) that Guillomar King of Ireland, was tributary to the famous Arthur: that Baion (whence (ſaith hee) the Iriſh came) was at that preſent under King Henry the ſecond; and that the Iriſh Princes had voluntarily ſubmitted themſelves, as unto him who by the * Law of a Sociall warre, was become their Soveraigne. But that Author had not ſeene belike, or did not remember (when thus hee went about to proove a legall right in the King) what others write of * Egfrides ungodly ſpoiles in Ireland, or of * Edgars Charter, in which is ſaid to bee contained, that he had under his rule the chiefe city of Ireland, Dublin, and the greateſt part of the Kingdome alſo. But King Henry ſtrengthening his other rights with Grants of the Popes, Adrian, and Alexander, obtained alſo of Vrban the third (for Lucius the third, who was Alexanders ſucceſſor, would not gratifie the King therein) that it ſhould bee lawfull for him, to crowne which of his ſonnes hee would, King of Ireland, to whom he ſent a Crowne of Feathers woven with Gold, in all their Grants reſerving to the Roman Roman See, the Peters pence, and rights; whereupon the King gave the ſame to his ſonne John, whoſe Coronation (ſtung with the like before) his father only did delay, at ſuch time as two Cardinals offered to celebrate that ſolemnitie.

(92) At Windſor therefore, his father giving him the * Order of Knight-hood (at which time hee was about * twelve yeeres old) ſent him forthwith into Ireland, where the Arch-biſhop of Dublin and the State, entertained him, but (by reaſon of ſuch parſimony toward his ſouldiers as was uſed) he returned the ſame yeere without doing much, but not without having waſted the moſt part of his Armie, in skirmiſhes with the Iriſh. His Stile in his ſeale of Ireland (though Hoveden faith, his father made him Regem, a King) was onely, Sigillum Iohannis filii regis Angliæ Domini Hibernie, Lord of Ireland.

(93) King Henry, hearing now that his martiall ſonne, Earle Richard, had fortified in Poictou againſt him, and vanquiſhed Geffrey Earle of Britaine, * prepares a puiſſant Army, upon terror whereof, Richard came in, rendring up Poictou to his mother Eleanor, (whoſe inheritance it was) at his fathers commandement. The ſame yeere wherein the Weſt was thus defiled with unnaturall diviſions, the Eaſt was likewiſe polluted with the curſed Apoſtaſie of one Richard de S. Albane (whom we ſhame to thinke was Engliſh) who renouncing the Chriſtian beleefe (upon the Patriarks diſcomfortable returne) became a principall Commander under the Sultan of Babylon, Saladine, whom the Chriſtians drave, with loſſe and ſlaughter of his Army, from Hieruſalem. But on the other ſide, revenge of diſobedience ſtill purſued Geffrey, ſonne of King Henry, who was in a * Turnement at Paris troden to death under the Horſe feete. A miſerable end, and a fearefull.

* Iam bell. ſacr. lib. 2. cap. 18. cont. Hoveden.

(94) About which times, betweene the French and Engliſh all things ſtood unſure, now Warre, then Peace, and warre againe, by reaſon that Philip (who had beene crowned King ſome 3 yeeres before, during the life of Lewis) challenging the cuſtodie of Arthur, the Poſthumus ſonne, and heire of Geffrey Earle of Britaine, and ſometimes one thing, and ſometime another, could not have his will: Whiles Earle Richard turning to Philip againſt his Father, but obtaining a truce for two yeeres, ſuch amitie (if there be any amitie among mightie Princes) grew betweene King Philip and Earle Richard, Heire apparant of England and Normandy, &c. that one bed and boord ſerved both. The Father perplexed, cals his ſonne home, who pretending many griefes, as the detention of Alice his Spouſe, the doubt of diſ-inheriſon, and other things, ſtood out againe; and againe after a while ſubmits to his Father. Then burſts forth Philip into Armes; and things ſo ſtanding, the heavy newes of Ieruſalem loſt, flew into Chriſtendome. When this Citie was formerly recovered by Godfrey of Boloigne, an Vrban was Pope, a Fredericke was Emperour, an Heraclius Patriarch; ſo now when it was loſt, an Vrban was Pope, a Fredericke was Emperour, and an Heraclius Patriarch.

(95) Vpon theſe newes Henry and Philip meete, and for the honour of God, laying down diſpleaſure, in preſence of William Archbiſhop of Tyre, at which time ſome ſay a Croſſe appeared in the aire, take upon them, as Souldiers of Chriſt, the badge of the Croſſe, and there the better to diſtinguiſh themſelves, it was agreed that the * French ſhould weare Red Croſſes, the Engliſh White, and the Flemiſh Greene. And this determination was ſeconded with warlike preparations, levies of moncy, and inſtitution of martiall Diſcipline: all which notwithſtanding nothing went forward.

* Roger Hoved. fol. 361. Matth. Paris.

(96) At Richard began the breach of this honourable confederation, who taking revenge upon certaine Rebels of his in Poictou, who brooked not his hard hand; one miſchiefe drew another, and at the laſt both the Kings of England and France became parties to the quarrell, greatly againſt the minde of K Henry, whoſe heart was firmely ſetled (as it ſeems) to revenge the cauſe of Chriſt upon Sultan Saladine: for that in his * anſwere to the Patriarch of Antioch, "imploring ayde, hee concludes, That among o-"ther Princes, himſelfe and ſonne, rejecting this "worlds glory, and deſpiſing all pleaſures whatſoe-"ver, and ſetting behinde all things which were of "this World, would in their owne perſons with "their whole Forces by the favour of the Lord "ſpeedily viſite him. And ſure the ſtate of thoſe parts required it, Saladine having ſlaine many of the Knights, Templars, and Nobles, and above thirty thouſand foot-men, with innumerable other in Cities and Townes by him ſubdued. Among all which grievous accidents, wee cannot (to ſeaſon ſowre thereby with ſweet) omit one noble proteſtation made by the chiefe croſſed Lords, Philip Earle of Flanders, the Earle Bloys, and other, who being required to "take parts, made anſwere; That they would not "contrary to their promiſe to God, put armour on "againſt any Chriſtian, till they had done their de-"vour againſt Saladine.

* Epiſt Hen. 2. ad Patriar. Antioc. apud Roger Hoved. pag. 367.

(97) In the treaties therefore betweene Henry and Philip; the demands of Philip on the behalfe of Richard were ſuch, and ſo unſafe for the King (as that all his ſubjects ſhould ſweare fealty to Richard during the Fathers life; but yet reſerving their allegiance to the Father) that Richard apparantly fell off, and became Liegeman for Normandy, &c. to Philip King of France; and at a new Treaty (by mediation of a Cardinall Legate) the demands of Philip being more hard then before, as that King Henry ſhould not only ſettle the Kingdome upon Richard, but take John alſo with him into Paleſtine, or that other wiſe Richard would norgoe (being jealous of his brothers grace with his Father:) Henrie would conſent to none of thoſe inſolent propoſitions, but diſdaining to ſeeme to bee inforced, they betooke themſelves on all ſides to their ſwords.

An. Dom. 1189. A. Reg. 35.

(98) The effect whereof was, that former good fortunes forſaking King Henry, hee ſuſtained many loſſes by the Armies of King Philip and Richard, and was driven out of Mentz in Main; (the city where hee was borne, and which he loved above all other places) by firing of the Suburbs before the enemy came, being caſually conſumed, hee was glad to yeeld to ſuch conditions as it pleaſed Philip to preſcribe. It is written * that at the meeting of theſe two Kings, the Skie being cleare, a thunderbolt ſtroke betweene them, and after a little pauſe comming together again, it thundered more terribly, ſo that Henry had falne off his horſe, but that his people ſuſtained him; whereupon he came preſently to an end, though it were to his unſpeakeable griefe; his Kingly heart being uſed to give, and not to take conditions.

* Roger Hoved.

King Henries death.

(99) Fearfull was the ſpeech which King Henry, when hee abandoned Mentz by reaſon of the fire, "uttered againſt Richard; which was, That ſich he "had taken from him that day the thing that he moſt "loved in this world, he would requite him, for af-"ter that day hee would deprive him of that thing "which in him ſhould beſt pleaſe a Child, to wit, his "Heart. But after the peace concluded, (upon mediation) betweene the ſides, another thing ſtracke neerer; for finding the name of his ſonne John firſt in the Catalogue of the Conſpiratours againſt him in that action, hee bitterly curſed the howre of his birth, laying Gods curſe and his upon his ſonnes, which hee would never recall, for any perſwaſions of the Biſhops and others: but comming to Chinon, fell there grievoully ſicke, and feeling death approach, hee cauſed himſelfe to bee borne into the Church before the Altar, where after humble confeſſion, and ſorrow for his ſinnes, hee departed this life.

His Wife.

(101) Eleanor, the Wife of King Henry, was the eldeſt of the two Daughters, and the ſole Heire of William Duke of Aquitaine, the fift of that name, and the ninth in ſucceſſion, ſonne of Duke William the fourth, her Mother was Daughter to Raimund Earle of Tholouſe, and her great Dowrie was motive firſt to Lewis King of France, (who had two daughters by her, Mary and Alice) and after to Henry King of England, to marry her. There are of the * French Hiſtorians who report that King Henry had a former wife, and that ſhee bare unto him Prince Henry: but Writers of our owne (and * ſome alſo of the French,) acknowledge but onely Eleanor for his wife. Certaine it is, that King Henries times were much famouſed by two Women of much differing qualities; the one was his renowned Mother Matildis, whoſe Epitaph thus compriſed part of her glory.

(102) Roſamund, ſo called for her ſurpaſſing beauty, was the Daughter of Walter Lord Clifford: whoſe face and feature ſo dazeled King Henries eyes, as by gifts he got this Paragon to his bed, and to hide her from his Iunoes eye, hee built (as our hiſtorians report) an intricate Labyrinth at Woodſtocke, and therein beſtowed this his pearle of eſteeme, unto whoſe cloſet (for the inexplicate windings) none could approach, but the King himſelfe, or ſuch as hee inſtructed. Notwithſtanding his jealous Queene Eleanor by a clew of ſilke, fallen from Roſamunds lappe, as ſhee ſate to take ayre, and ſuddenly fleeing from the ſight of the ſearcher, the end of the ſilke faſtened to her foot, and the clew ſtill unwinding, remained behind: which the Queene followed, till ſhee had found what ſhee ſought, and upon Roſamund ſo vented her ſpleene, as the Lady lived not long after. Her body was buried at Godſtowe neere Oxford, a little Nunnery in the rich Meadows of Evenlod, with this Epitaph in olde ryme upon her Tombe.

But afterwards thoſe chaſte ſiſters gathered her bones, and put them in a perfumed lether bagge, incloſing them ſo in Lead, and laid them againe in the Church under a faire large grave-ſtone; about whoſe edges a filler of braſſe was in-layd, and thereon written her name and praiſe. His Iſſue.

(102) William, the eldeſt ſonne and firſt childe of King Henry, and Queene Eleanor his wife, was borne before his father was King, and while he was but Duke of Normandie, in the eighteenth yeere of the raigne of King Stephen, 1152. and the fourth yeere after, (his father being then King, and in the ſecond yeere of his raigne) the Nobiliatie of England ſware unto him their fealty, as to the heire apparant of the Kingdome, at the Caſtle of Wallingford in Barkſhire; but he deceaſed the yeere following, being the third of his fathers raigne, and the fift of his owne age 1156. Hee was buried in the Monaſtery of Reading at the feete of his great Grandfather, King Henry the firſt.

(103.) Henry, the ſecond ſonne of King Henry, and Queene Eleanor, being borne the laſt of February 1156. was their heire apparant, after the death of his brother William; was Duke of Normandie, Earle of Anjou and Maigne; and was crowned King of England at Weſtminſter, by Roger Arch-biſhop of Yorke, the fifteenth of July 1170. He proved a Prince of great valor, and was therefore ſurnamed in French Cuer-de-Lion; in Engliſh Lioni heart: he was created Earle of Poyctou, and had the whole Dutchie of Aquitaine, for which he did his homage, to King Lewis the Tonger of France, in the eighteenth yeere Yeere of his fathers raigne 1170. yet afterward hee conceived ſome diſcontentment againſt his father, and maintained warres upon him, but was reconciled againe into his love, and ſucceeded him in his Kingdome.

(106) Geffrey, the fourth ſonne of King Henry, and of Queene Eleanor, was borne the twenty third of September, in the fifth yeere of his fathers raigne 1159. Hee married Conſtance, daughter and heire of Conan Duke of Britaine, and in her right was Duke of Britaine, and did his homage to his brother Henry for the ſame Dutchie, and received the homages of the Barons of the ſame: he died at Paris, in the 32. yeere of his fathers raigne 1186. the nineteenth of Auguſt, and is buried in the Quire of our Ladies Church there: he had iſſue Arthur Duke of Britaine, borne after his fathers deceaſe, the heire apparant of King Richard, and by ſome ſuppoſed to be made a way by King Iohn; and alſo Eleanor called the Damſell of Britaine, who died in priſon in the raigne of King Henry the third.

(107) Philip, the fifth ſonne of King Henry, and Queene Eleanor, may be miſtruſted, to be miſtaken by Antiquaries of our time, as miſ-underſtanding the ancient Writers, who mentioning the birth of Philip the Kings ſonne, might by good likelihood, be thought to meane Philip ſonne of Lewis the Younger, King of France, who was borne about this time, and was after King of the ſame Countrey. But M. Thomas Talbot, an exact traveller in genealogies, hath not onely ſet him downe in this place, amongſt the children of this King, but alſo warranteth the ſame, to be done with good authoritie: howſoever, it is apparant, his life was very ſhort.

(108) Iohn, the ſixth and youngeſt ſonne of King Henry, and Queene Eleanor, was borne in the thirteenth yeere of his fathers raigne, in Anno 1166. he was ieſtingly ſurnamed by his father Sans-terre, in Engliſh, without Land, becauſe he was borne laſt, as if there had beene nothing left for him: Notwithſtanding ſoone after, he was created Earle of Mortaigne, and had moreover by degrees, the Earledomes of Cornwall, and Glocester, the Counties of Derby and Lancaſter, the Honours of Wallingford and Nottingham, the Caſtles of Tikhill, Marlborow, and Ludgarſall, with many other great Seigniories, and (above them all) was alſo Lord of Ireland, and at the laſt ſucceeded his brother Richard in all his Dominions, and was King of England.

(109) Maud, the eldeſt daughter of King Henry, and Queene Eleanor, borne in the third yeere of her fathers raigne, married to Henry, ſurnamed the Lion, Duke of Saxonie, had iſſue by him Henry Duke of Saxonie, Lothar that died young, Otho the fourth German Emperour, and William borne at Winchester, progenitor of the Dukes of Brunſwicke, who bare for their Armes, the Coat of England, with the two Lions, as King Henry his Grandfather bare, before the march with Queene Eleanor, and Maud married to Geffrey Earle of Perch: Shee ſurvived him, and died in the firſt yeere of the raigne of her brother King Richard, and was buried by her husband, in the Church of S. Blaſe at Brunſwicke. *

(110) Eleanor, the ſecond daughter of King Henry, and Queene Eleanor, was borne at Roan in Normandy, in the eight yeere of her fathers raigne, 1162. She was married to Alfonſo, the ninth of that name, ſurnamed the Good King of Caſtile in Spaine, and had iſſue by him Sanches, that dyed in his infancy; Ferdinando that died in his youth, Henry King of Caſtile after his father, Blanch Queene of France, wife to King Lewis the eight, and mother of S. Lewis. Berenger married to Alfonſo King of Lion: Vrraca Queene of Portugall, and Eleanor wife of James King of Arragon.

(111) Ioane, the third and youngeſt daughter of King Henry, and Queene Eleanor his wife, was borne at the Citie of Angiers in France, in the moneth of October, the 13. yeere of her Fathers raigne, which was the yeere of our Lord, 1166. When ſhe was eleven yeeres of age; ſhee was with great honour conveyed to the Citie of Palermo, and there married to William the ſecond of that name, King of Sicil, Duke of Apulia, and Prince of Capua, upon Sunday the 13. day of February, 1177. and was crowned Queene the ſame day, at the ſame place. Shee had a ſonne by him named Boamund, whom his Father when he was returned from his Chriſtning, created Duke of Apulia: but the child died firſt, and the Father after, leaving no iſſue. And ſhee ſurviving, married againe, and was the third wife of Raimund the fourth of that name, Earle of Tholouze: By him ſhee had iſſue Raimund the laſt Earle of that houſe, Bertrand Lord of Branquel, Montelore, and Saluiac, and a daughter married to Berald of Elbeine, Prince of Orenge.

(112) William the Naturall ſonne of King Henry, borne of Roſamund, was ſurnamed in French, Longeſpee, in Engliſh Long-Sword. He was Earle of Salisbury, in right of Ela his Wife, Daughter and heire of William Earle of that County, ſonne of Earle Patrick; by whom he had iſſue William Earle of Salisbury, Stephen Earle of Vſter, Ela Counteſſe of Warwicke, Ida Lady Beuchum of Bedford, and Iſabell Lady Veſcie: his ſonne Earle William the ſecond, had Earle William the third, Father of Margaret, Wife of Henry Lacie Earle of Lincolne: he died in the Caſtle of old Salisbury, and was buried in the Cathedrall Church of the New Citie, in the ninth yeere of the raigne of King Henry the third.

(113) Geffrey an other Naturall ſonne of King Henry, was borne of the Lady Roſamund aforeſaid: This man in his tender youth, was (by his Fathers procurement) made Arch-deacon of Lincolne, and after biſhop of that See; which hee held above ſeven yeeres without conſecration, and then reſigning it, in the yeere, 1081. into the hands of Richard Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, and his Father; he was made Chancellor of England, and afterward by his brother King Richard, he was advanced to the Archbiſhopricke of Yorke, (being conſecrated at Tours in France, Ann. 1191.) which See he governed with good approbation. But in the time of his brother King Iohn, he under-went many difficulties, by oppoſing the Kings purpoſes, who therefore made ſeiſure of his whole ſtate; and Ann. 1207. he left the Land, and after five yeeres baniſhment, died, viz. Ann. 1213.

(114) Morgan, another Naturall ſonne of King Henry, is thought by * ſome (becauſe ſo ſmall mention is made of him) to have beene of no long life after his birth, and to have beene borne of ſome woman in Wales, where this Chriſtian name is moſt commonly uſed, and whither this King upon many occaſions, ſometime reſorted. But ſometime * others (whoſe ſtudious paines, deſerve much thanks of poſteritie) report, that he was gotten on the wife of one Rodolph Bloeth (or Blewet) a Knight, and lived both to be Proveſt of Beverley, and to be elected to the Biſhoprick of Durham, when comming to Rome for a diſpenſation (becauſe his Baſtardie made him otherwiſe uncapable) the Pope willed him to profeſſe himſelf Blewets lawfull ſonne, and not the Kings Naturall, promiſing to conſecrate him on that condition: but he, uſing the advice of one William Lane his Clerke, told the Pope, that for no worldly promotion he would renounce his father, or deny himſelfe to be of Royall blood: ſo blind were ſome Prelates of thoſe times, who eſteemed ſpirituall functions, to bee but worldly promotions.

Richard I.

RICHARD THE FIRST, DVKE OF NORMANDY, GVYEN AND AQVITAINE, &c. THE FORTIE FOVRTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH-MEN, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, WIVES, AND ISSVE.

Monarch 44.

CHAPTER VII.

An. Dom. 1199.

RICHARD succeeding to his deceased Father Henry, brought forth that wonder, which a Writer of that age thus celebrated,

Mira cano; Sol occubuit Nox nulla secuta est.
A wonder strange I write, the Sunne did set,
yet was no night.

* Roger Hoved. Matth. Paris &c.

Meaning, that though Henry were dead, yet the glory and happinesse of the Land was not thereby clouded, for that Richard was another Sunne, and in some respects farre the more bright, and farther shining of the two; as having for honour of Christian Chevalrie, wholly consecrated his warlike minde and actions to the service of God, and re-advancement of the Crosse of Christ, dishonoured by the Infidels in Asia: in which enterprise he was so fervently zealous, that from the time of his Fathers death (in whose vowes it had beene) he meditated scarse any thing else, disposing the affaires of his Estate (but not * carelesly, as some would impose) as of things which did but onely under-serve, and conduce to the maine and principall end of advancing his Saviours glory, whereunto he judged that action did tend.

King Richard orders his Estate. * Read High in Rich. 1.

(2) Having therefore ordered his weightier businesses in Normandy, and other his transmarine Dominions, and in England by his Letters, see * the Queene his Mother at liberty from that captivitie, wherein her late husband the King had long detained her, (who sensible of others woe by her owne, did afterward exercise many workes of mercy in that kinde) he cuts over hither, aswell to receive all the rights of Soveraigntie, and to settle the same; as also to levie meanes for proceeding in his intended holy voyage, together with Philip King of France, and other Christian Potentates.

* Gir. Pro.

(3) And though before his Coronation, most Writers doe not call him a King; yet sure it is, that he

he and others did immediately, and unquestionably, from the first accruement of the intereste, (which was at his Fathers last gaspe) exercise all the offices of the royall power; for so hee restored Robert Earle of Leicester to his whole estate: So plaine it is, that our Government allowes not the dangerous convulsions, and empty spaces of an Interregnum, such as in meere elective States are common, if not continuall.

King Richards choice of friends and favrites.

(4) But in nothing more could this noble Prince shew his judgement (though he were otherwise Sagacis ingenii, of a sharpe and searching wit) then in this: That hee banished from his familiarity, and (as my * Author saith) hated all those of what profession soever they were, who had forsaken his Father, and both retained, and enricht those other, who had loyally stood for him against himselfe in all affaires.

* Gir. Dimoch.

Chiefe matters at the Coronation of Richard.

(5) At his Coronation, which was most magnificently performed at Westminster, by Baldwyne Archbishop of Canterbury, the points of the Oath which hee made to God, and the Kingdome of England, at the Altar upon the holy Evangelists, before the Prelates, Nobles, and whole people * were these: 1. That all the daies of his life he would beare peace, honour, and reverence to God, and holy Church, and the Ordinances thereof: 2. That in the people unto him committed, hee would exercise Right, Justice, and Equitie. 3. That hee would blot forth naughtie lawes, and perverse customes, if any were brought upon his Kingdome; and would enact good lawes, and the same in good faith keepe, and without mal-Engyn. Which oath being most solemnely taken, and the sacred unction performed; the Archbishop standing at the Altar forbade him, on the behalfe of Almightie God, to assume that honour, unlesse he had a full purpose to keepe what hee had sworne: whereto Richard assenting, and with his owne hands, humbly taking the ponderous Crowne Imperiall from off the Altar, in signification, as is probable, that hee held it onely from God; he delivers it to the Archbishop, who thereupon accomplished all the Ceremonies of Coronation.

Jews slaine at the Coronation.

(6) Which Act was accidentally hansfield, and auspicated with the bloud of many Iewes (though utterly against the Kings will) who in a tumult (raised by the * Ocean) were furiously murthered, which (though it were afterward punished by the Lawes) might seeme a presage, that this Lion-hearted King (as his byname Cœur-de-Lion did import) should be a speciall destroyer of the enemies of our Saviour.

* So Marshall calls the multitude.

(7) After counsell therefore (first moover in all worthy enterprises) Money was in his first and chiefest cares; for raising whereof, to furnish the intended pilgrimage, he sold, morgaged, estated, and (by a thousand princely skils) as if he should never have come againe, added incredible heapes to those huge sums, which he had scruzed out of Stephen de Turnham, his fathers Treasurer, (amounting to eleven hundred thousand pounds sterling, if some say true) all horded by King Henry. What could indeed be said enough for such a voyager and it was a cogitation worthy so glorious a purpose, so to order his estate, as if hee were not to returne at all; because, looking backe doth un-bend and soften resolutions.

Riches & pompe in the Holy Land.

(3) As for men and souldiers, the Prelates, Friars, and other Preachers, had stirred up innumerable, by their manifold exhortations (the Archbishop of Canterbury having * travelled thorow Wales in person for that purpose, going afterward with the King to Palestine, where also * he died) in pulpits and private conferences, sounding nothing but the Crosse and Passion of Christ, calling the world to revenge his cause upon the Pagans, and setting soules on fire with vehement gestures, actions, and perswasions. But the kingdome of England he ordered thus.

His provision for England.

(9) The onely maine danger of the State in his absence, was in his brother John Earle of Mortaine, of whose ambition hee was somewhat jealous, as * knowing that King Henry, not long before his death, had intended the Crowne to him: to conquer therefore his appetites, with bounty, and munificence; and to take away all murmuration in him, for want of Princely competencies, King Richard did as it were share the Realme with him, giving him sixe Earledomes, Cornwall, Dorset, Somerset, Nottingham, Derby, and Lancaster, besides Castles, Honors, Manors, Forrests, and much other Riches, and finally the Earledome of Glocester, with the Heire of that Countie to be his Wife, though the Arch-bishop of Canterbury forbade the Nuptials, alledging shee was within the degrees of consanguinitie.

* Gervasius.

(10) But lest, through evill nature or advise, Earle John should convert those so great gifts to the subversion of the bestower, He entrusted him with no part of the Regall power, as the Key, and secret of his proper fatetie: but laid the maine burthen of Government upon William Longchamp Bishop of Ely, * chiefe Justiciar, and Lord Chancellor of England, and Papall Legate, (a person out of all suspicion for aspiring to the Crowne) whereby was conferred upon him, whatsoever King or Pope could grant, for accomplishment of his authoritie; so that hee might well be stiled * Prince and Priest of England; as he was one, the most powerfull subject for the time, that perhaps this Realme hath had: for, though the King had (as it were) joyned with him in Commission, one Hugh Bishop of Durham, for the parts of England beyond Humber; yet, as it * hapned in the Consulship of Cæsar and Bibulus, that nothing was reported of Bibulus, but all of Cæsar; so did Longchamp in a short time easily make himselfe sole and absolute, his sway burying in silence, the name and endeavours of his Colleague.

* Roger Hoved. Matth. Paris. & alii.

* Swet. l. 1. c. 2.

(11) Thus the summe of command, or the Soveraigne power it selfe, was in the Chancellor as Viceroy, but for defence and preservation of his justice, he * did subordinate or associate to those Bishops, William Earle of Arundell, Hugh Bardolfe, William Marshall, Geffrey Fitz-Peter, William Bruwer, Robert de Whitfield, Roger Fitz-Remfrey, wherein hee did shew his love and care of the English Nation, as also of Iustice it selfe: for that many of these were of the most honourable Peeres of the Land (and not men bred up or formerly enured to make Iustice, or their owne Tongues venall, for a fee:) honour being the rule of their proceedings, and strength of private fortunes, with their Princes favour, the pillar to sustaine that honour.

* Reg. Hoved.

Iustice is best where it brings Honour rather then Riches.

(12) There remained to provide for (before hee left England) the neighbour-hood of Scotland and Wales, which might otherwise make use of his absence, to his prejudice: But Rhese ap Gruffith (of whom there is extant a short but elegant Panegyris) Prince of South-Wales (being already in amity) came as farre as Oxford toward him; but because the King (who was there) came not in person to meete him (as his father King Henry had done) the Prince (notwithstanding Earle John the Kings onely brother, had conducted him from the Marches with speciall honour) tooke it in so high scorne and indignation, (for even the meanest, from whom service or love is expected, will againe expect regard) that hee forthwith returned into his Countrey, without once saluting the King; who by this neglect, lost Rhese's love, as upon the like omission, and unrespectivenesse, Augustine (the too supercilious Monke) did lose the affections of the Monkes of Bangor, Rhese's owne country-men, in another part of Wales.

(13) As for William King of Scots (a very worthy Prince) hee journyed hither to King Richard into England, and heere concluded a firme friendship, which hee kept very religiously, even in the greatest troubles of King Richard, to the glory of himselfe and his Nation; and as some write, sent his Brother David with 5000. Scots, to serve him in the sacred warres. The chiefe points of their convention were: 1. That for tenne thousand Markes Sterling, (then paid) the Castles of Rockesbrough and Berwicke (cautionarie Castles, or gage-places, for part of his ransome) should be restored. 2. That hee should have all such deeds, instruments, and charters, made by him to the late King Henry, which had by constraint or duresse beene obtained, and himselfe to be freed from all encumbrances, claimes, or pretensions whatsoever. 3. That he should have all such dignities, as his brother Malcolme held in England,, (for which King William did there make fealtie) and all such Lands as his Ancestors did hold of the English Crowne.

Hoveden.

The agreement betweene the Kings of France and England.

(14) The State of England being thus in the maine, and other meane points established, King Richard crost the Seas into France to Philip King thereof, according to appointment, that from thence, with minds and forces united, they might set forward with the Ensigne of the Crosse; which after some stay (occasioned by the * death of the French Queene) they did, upon these Christian and friendly termes; 1. That each of them preserve the others honour, and beare faith to him for life, and member, and earthly dignitie. 2. That neither of them shall faile the other in their affaires; but that the King of France shall helpe the King of England to defend his land, even as he would defend the Citie of Paris, if it were besieged; and Richard King of England, shall helpe the King of France to defend his land, even as hee would defend his Citie Roan if it were besieged. This * being fairely engrost, and afterward ratified with oath, and sent by the Kings themselves in person, the Earles and Barons sware in solemne manner, that they would not trespasse against their fealty, nor stirre any warre in either of the Kings Dominions, so long as they were in that pilgrimage: on the other side, the * Archbishops and Bishops did firmely promise (in verbo veritatis, in the word of truth) that they would accurse and excommunicate all such as did transgresse this agreement.

(15) Thus (after some necessary staies) these two the greatest Monarchs of the West, set forward over land (toward the publike service of Christianity) with such numbers as themselves thought best; which were so great, that having advanced (not without some little losse of people by the * fall of the Bridge over the river Rhene at Lions, which brake by reason of the throng,) beyond the said violent streame they parted company; Philip passing over the Alpes into Italy, and Richard to the Sea-side at Marsilia, there to meet with his Navie, which being compact of all the chiefe Ships in England, Normandy, and other his French Dominions, was there appointed to attend.

The Kings of France and England set forward to the Holy Land.

* Roger Houed. Matth. Paris.

(16) But the voyage being very long, and King Richard comming to the Port before his Fleet, after eight daies expectation there, waxing impatient of delay, embarkt himselfe * in 20. hired Gallies, and ten great Hulkes or Busses (a kind of shipping as it seemes peculiar then to the Mediterranean Seas) and set saile toward Messana in Sicilia, the Rendevow of both the Kings, and of their Armies: in which passage, lying at Anchor (on occasion,) in the mouth of the River Tyber, not farre from Rome; Octavianus the Bishop of Hostia repaired unto him, desiring him in the Popes name, that he would visit his Holinesse; which the King denied to doe, laying to the Popes charge many shamefull matters touching the Romish Simonie and Covetousnesse, with many other reproches, alleadging that they tooke 700. Markes for Consecration of the Bishop of Maines, 1500. Markes for the Legative power of William Bishop of Ely; but of the Archbishop of Burdeaux as infinite summe of money: whereupon he refused to see Rome. Thus (after sundry accidents and commings on land) hearing that his Navy was safe, he staid for them by the way, and then came to anchor not long after (to wit, 23. of September) before the Citie of Messana, with so great a shew of power, and sound of Warlike Instruments, and other signes of Majestie, in the sight of Philip and his French, and of many other Nations there assembled, that it stroke horror into the Inhabitants, (saith Hoveden) and mooved no small envy in the hearts of his confederates.

(17) From this time forward, as it may seeme (the Enemy of Concord feeding the malevolent passions of men with perpetuall matter of debate) the King of France was never truly King Richards friend in heart, but upon the same day (whether streightned in provisions or otherwise) he left the King of England; but by contrary winde was driven backe before night, where (after many troubles and quarrels betweene the English and Sicilians) the two Kings peaced againe, and settled a new and as firme a league, as they could, during that martiall pilgrimage.

Ger. Dorob.

(18) Tancred was at that time King of Sicilia, by usurpation, after the death of William, who had married Ioan sister of King Richard, whom (at that time upon displeasure and quarrell being prisoner) Tancred set at liberty, sending her in honourable manner to her brother, and did yeeld to sundry Articles, and also presents payments of ample summes. Feare wrought on both parts; for Richard being among strangers, and not very sure of the French, seised upon a strength of the Griffons (people much redoubted in those parts, till the arrivall * of the English) and in a tumult tooke the Citie of Messana it selfe, where he displayed his Ensignes, till for the French Kings love he was content to dis-advance them, and to entrust the Citie to the Knights Templars and Hospitalers, untill Tancred had fulfilled all such things as Richard did challenge to be due, being many.

(19) Vpon great deliberation therefore, the Sicilian King made answer, that he had already paid to his sister, late Queene of that Iland, a very great quantitie of coine in recompence of her Dowry or Ioyncture, and would satisfie all his other demands (concerning the Legacies intended by his Predecessor King William, to the Father of King Richard) as farre as he ought, according to the custome of that Kingdome, and thereupon gave unto him for the quitclaime of his sisters Ioyncture, twentie thousand ounces of gold: and farther to be acquitted of all other claims and pretences, as also in consideration that Arthur Duke of Britaine, nephew and next heire of King Richard (if Richard died without issue) should take to wife the daughter of King Tancred, he paid him other twentie thousand ounces of gold, and of his owne accord, and for King Richards love, and for the love of the English Nation (which, saith our * Author, was then in greatest reputation through the kingdome of Sicilie) as also to be the more assured of performance, he gave him other twenty thousand ounces of gold, besides afterward foure great Ships, called Prsers, and fiftreene Gallies.

(22) This peace and accord being happily thus concluded, King Tancred (having most royally and lovingly feasted the King of England for three daies and three nights in a Castle of his) discovered, upon the way at Tavernium in his returne, a foule and unprincely conspiracy of Philip (whom one of our writers calls the vaine-glorious King) against the head and safety of King Richard; which comming to bee scanned betweene the two Kings, the French charged the English with picking of quarrels; and added, that unlesse Richard married his sister Alice, according as he ought, having bin contracted long before together, he would be his enemy while he breathed; whereunto King Richard (being pressed) did replie: That his * sister during the time of her abode in England, had a childe by his Father Henry King of England, which he was ready to prove by many witnesses there present: so that King Richard had farre more cause then a suspicion of dishonesty (which * some write) to refuse the marriage. This falling out so shamefully, Philip (upon certaine conditions betweene Richard and him) left him at liberty to take a wife where he thought good, but never (as it may seeme) forgave him his evill will while they two lived together.

(23) And because acts of Christian remorse and humility are too rare among the Great ones of this vaine world, it were a crime to pretermit the exemplar humiliation of this famous Generall K. Richard, at this time, who (to use my * Authors words) inspired with divine grace, and studying to fit himselfe for the great attempt he had in hand, was stung at the soule with so just compunction for his sinnes, that calling before him his Archbishops and Bishops into a Chappell, at the house where hee was lodged, without the walls of Messana; hee blushed not to make a penitent confession of his manifold excesses, humbly praying God of mercy, and them (as his subordinate Ministers) of Absolution; and God (saith Hoveden) *respected him with the eyes of Mercy, and gave him a penitent heart, so that from thenceforth hee proved a man fearing God, eschuing evill, and doing good. * O falicem illum, &c. (24) Whereupon addicting his mind to divine contemplations, & meditation of the Christian Church, whose Champion now he was; he desired conference of one Ioachim (a Cistercian Abbot) whose great learning and deepe understanding in the Scriptures, with an opinion of a Propheticall inspiration, made him so famous over the world, that King Richard sent for him, being then in Calabria neere Scilie, whom at his comming he heard preaching and expounding the Apocalypse of Saint Iohn, touching the afflictions of the Church, and of Antichrist, which (saith he) was then borne, and in the City of Rome, and shall bee advanced in the See Apostolike, of whom the Apostle said, hee should extoll himselfe above all that is called God; and that the seven Crownes were the Kings and Princes of the earth which obeyed him. Surely, neere about this very time hapned that in Rome, which might seem to give great probability to that Abbots opinion, especially, if Emperours and Kings be truly called * Gods, over whom Antichrist also should extoll himselfe: for in the same moneth that Richard left Messana, was the Coronation of Henry the Emperor, and his Empresse Constantia, in S. Peters Church; where Pope Celestine the very next day after his owne consecration to the Papacie, sate in his Pontificall chaire, holding the Emperiall golden Crowne betwixt his feete, and the Emperour (as likewise the Empresse) *flooping low, received on his head the Diadem from the Popes feete; and presently against the Pope strake the Emperors Crowne with his foot, and dasht * it to the ground; signifying that hee had power to throw him* (upon his demerits) out of his Empire: but the Cardinals catching up the crowne put it againe on the Emperours head.

(25) The same day in which Philip and his French forces set saile out of the Haven of Messana, arrived Elianor King Richards mother, accompanied with Berengaria his new intended Spouse, daughter to Sanctius King of Navarre, whom afterward hee tooke to wife in Cyprus; but his mother after a short stay returned by Rome into England, leaving the young Lady with Ioan Queene Dowager of Sicilie, both which accompanied the King toward the holy Land, his whole Navie being * one hundred and fifty great ships, and fifty three Gallies, well appointed for the warre, and * many other Sailes and Vessels: and (not to omit the same, because it is recorded as a singularity) he had among all these, * thirteene Buces or Busies, which had each of them three course of Sailes to saile with: but no Writer (so farre as wee yet find) declares what numbers of Souldiers were in the English Armie.

(26) This Navie royall, betweene the Isles of Rhodes and Cyprus, (for the honor and good of King Richard) was scattered by God with a terrible tempest, some one or two of which suffered wreack upon the Isle of Cyprus, whom * Cursac (or as other call him Isakius, Emperor of the Griffons) being a * tyrant did spoyle, and contrary to Christian Religion, (which was his profession, though * some mistake) and all honour and humanity, he would not (among other his unprincely, or rather barbarous behaviours) suffer the Kings sister, and Lady Berengaria, with other of that tender society, to come into harbour, to their great discontentment and perill, a * Ship or two sinking there: but neither would God, nor King Richard forgive it him.

(27) For the said unworthy Prince having thrice refused to make restitution of his unlawfull seisures and prisoners, was entred upon by the English, driven from the shoares with great dishonour and slaughter; the City Lymesæum left for a prey to the victors, and himselfe beaten againe out of his Campe, and taken, and after an escape made by him, his onely daughter and heire yeelding her selfe, and her Father lastly comming againe of his owne accord (as despairing to ly hid) under custody and thrust into fetters of gold and silver, the whole Iland (with all the people, strength, and riches thereof) became subject to the King of England, and both Father and Daughter led away into captivity.

(28) There arrived at Limesæum, to salute and honour King Richard within three daies after his first victory, Guido King of Ierusalem, Geofrey de * Lezinant his brother, Raimund Prince of Antioch, Earle Rotmond his son, &c. offering their services, and swearing to be his against all men; with whose privity King Richard seized the flourishing and spatious Iland of Cyprus, by antiquity celebrated as the very seate of Venus, which that it might so prove to himselfe, in the joyous moneth, he solemnly tooke to wife his beloved Lady Berengaria.

(29) The person of the Emperour (for by that lofty title Writers call him,) was sent to Tripolis in Syria, under the custody of Ralph Fitz-Godfrey, Lord * Chamberlaine to King Richard: his daughter was committed to the two Queenes Berengaria and Ioan: the Iland it selfe was entrusted to Richard de Camvile, and Robert de Turnham his Viceroyes, with competent force and provisions, and the Islanders suffered to enjoy all such lawes and liberties, as they held in the time of Manuel the Emperour of Constantinople, or (as now they call it) of Stambols.

* Roger Houed. Matth Paris. Tyndig. Houll.

(30) This fame of Richard was much enlarged by his conquering a mighty * Argosey, called a Dromond, wherein were aboord one thousand and five hundred Saracens (though disguised under French Flagges (furnished, besides all other provisions, with fire-workes, barrells or cages of venemous serpents, and the like, for the use of the Saracens at Acon, (anciently called Ptolomais, to the siege whereof he was then sailing,) thirteene hundred of of which Miscreants, he sacrificed to Mars and Neptune, keeping the rest for ransome.

(31) Philip King of France, (in hope perhaps to conquer Acon before the English could arrive, and to winne thereby that glory intire) came safe before that Citie in Easter weeke; but as yet had not forced the same: at which time (that the Reader may observe the generall disposition of the westerne Christians in those dayes) there engirded Acon (omitting the many great Prelates, Princes, Earles, and Honourable Chiefes) these Nations following; the Genowayes and Florentines, the English under Hubert Bishop of Salisbury, afterward * Archbishop of Canterbury, Flemings, Almaines, Danes, Dutch, Frislanders, Pisans, Lombardes, besides the Knights Templars (collected out of all Nations) and beside the aides of the Asians: all which lay quartered at the Siege in order, as heere they are placed, at that time in which the King of France arrived. But Richard King of England with his victorious and triumphant Navie (which when it went out of Cyprus, being much belike augmented, did containe 254. tall ships, and above 60. Galliots) brought terrour and dismay to the besieged, and comfort to the Christians, upon the Sunday after Pentecost, being about the middest of Iune.

(32) The siege was so vehemently plied, that (notwithstanding sundry dissentions betweene Philip and Richard, the two competitors of glory in this voyage) after severall breaches and assaults, the last whereof was made by the Pisans and English, upon the twelfth of July following, many offers of composition made by the Saladine, being utterly refused, the Citie of Acon was rendred to the Christians upon these conditions. 1. That Saladine (Prince of Miscreants) should by a certaine day restore the holy Crosse. 2. That hee should set at libertie fifteene hundreth Christian Captives. 3. That the Citie with all the things contained therein, should remaine and bee to the Christians. 4. That the Turkes or Sarazens should have their lives onely saved, if these conditions were performed. 5. That they should pay twentie thousand Bizants, (peeces of gold) toward the charges of the Kings. To take possession for the French, there was sent in, Drogon de Merlou, and one hundreth men of Armes, and for the English, Hugo de Gurnay, with the like number, who equally parted the Citie, goods, and people, betweene them.

(33) And even now Philip King of France, aswell because the Earle of Flanders died at the siege without issue, whose countries hee long had coveted, as for evill will to Richard, whose noble Acts so farre out-went his, and because, as some * write, he had taken bribes of Saladine, meditates nothing but returne, asking licence of King Richard to depart, being then but the tenth day after the Cities surrender; so badly his envious eyes could, as it seemed, endure the splender of his companions glory. The chiefe commanders of his Army hearing this, shewing themselves true French-men, and sensible of their obligation to God, and honour, with many teares befought him not to forsake that holy affaire, it a impudenter, so shamelefly. In what Prince would not this have kindled a desire of a better resolution? But impotent passions carrying him, and miscarrying him, he perssited to get leave of Richard, who but two daies before, would have had him sweare to a stay of three yeeres longer in that service; but hee who had other cogitations, farre more unworthy of a King, would needs depart, giving his oath upon the holy Gospels, without which oath King Richard would not grant his good will; That he would well and faithfully keepe the lands and subjects of the King of England, and neither doe dammage nor grievance to them by himselfe, nor suffer it to be done by others * till his returne.

(34) The King of France thus leaving Acon, in the Castle whereof King Richard, his Queene and Sister were lodged, and the Duke of Burgundie remaining behind with the French hoast, (to whom King Philip, not without sundry secret instructions, had with it committed a great part of his treasure) King Richard in the same day set forward upon a new enterprize; but it is true which one writes * that by reason of the dissention betweene the Kings, which of them should seeme the greater, little or nothing prospered; and just cause had King Richard to complain in * his letters, that Philip, to the eternall reproach of himselfe and Kingdome, had fouly forsaken his purpose and vow unto God.

(35) But when the Saladine could not by any meanes obtaine a longer day for performance of the said Articles of composition, hee cut off the heads of all his Christian Captives; in revenge whereof King Richard brought out his Turkish Captives, (being about two thousand and five hundreth) and in the sight of the Saladines hoast caused their heads to bee chopt off; the Duke of Burgundie doing the same to the like number, neere unto the walls of Acon, seven onely being kept alive by the Christian Generals, whereof Karakeys Saladines * foster-Father was chiefe. But Richard proceeding in his undertaken action, and in his march to Ioppa, being set vpon by Sultan Saladine (who had put the Duke of Burgundie to flight, and slaine the valiant Iaques de Avesnis, who onely with a few in the Rereward made resistance) so couragiously encountred him, that the Saladine with the losse of three thousand his choiseft Souldiers was glad to turn his back and flie: whiles therefore this Champion is thus imployed in the Holy-land, let us looke backe a little how the affaires of his Kingdome are managed at home.

(36) Iohn the Kings brother, making use in England of such discontenments, as the incredible insolencies, and intollerable tyrannies of the Chancellour (who carried himselfe both like a Pope and a King, had bred among the Nobility and people, to advance thereby his own designes, stirred against him (though strengthening himselfe like a Generall in the field,) so powerfull opposition, that in the end, (upon warrant of a new * Commission sent from the King his Brother) hee with the rest of the Peeres suddenly thrust him out of all command, and shortly after most reproachfully (as it happened, for hee fled, and was taken in a Curtezans attire, ill-beseeming a Popes Legate) out of the Kingdome also, upon occasion, as of other foule demerites, so particularly of a sacrilegious and barbarous outrage, committed by the Chancellors command, upon the person of Geffrey Elect Archbishop of Yorke (naturall brother to King Richard and the Earle) on pretence that hee entred England contrary to his oath given to his brother King Richard, whereas he then came to take possession of his See, to which he was advanced by the * Kings owne procurement, and by Queene Eleanors owne travell to Rome in his behalfe. And albeit this punishment and shame deservedly followed the Chancellors pride and oppression, yet in one maine point of oppoling the Earles Ambition; (who fought to assure to himselfe the remainder of the Crowne, which in right of bloud belonged to his Nephew Arthur) his service to the State had beene very commendable, if it had proceeded from loyalty of affection, and not from a swelling desire of greatnesse, which he hoped still to enjoy, if Arthur (a child) should succeed in the Kingdome, whereas he knew Earle Iohns advancement could not be without his apparant ruine.

(37) But Philip King of France in all places labouring by * wrongfull and unprincely, aspersions to deface the renowne of King Richard, though finding small credit to his words (because the man had done nothing himselfe) devised after his returne how to trouble and endamage his friends dominions, and had effected it, if the Lords of France whom hee sollicited to that wicked worke, upon preterence preterence of the composition made with King Richard at Messena, had not (to their immortall glory) * refused to assist him therein, till Richards returne, as well in regard of their owne oathes, as because the sentence of excommunication was denounced against all such as did attempt to endammage him in his absence.

(38) King Richard, notwithstanding that the relation of these things greatly troubled him, gave not over as yet, but after sundry other matters of importance performed, did march up within the sight of Ierusalem, where he skirmished with the enemy, and overthrew the Convoy or Caravan of the Saladine, which came laden from Babylon, guarded with ten thousand men; whom King Richard valiantly encountring with five thousand selected Souldiers, put most of them to the Sword, and tooke three thousand Camels, and foure thousand Horses and Mules, besides those that were slaine, and so gained the rich spoyle of all the Carriages.

(39) After this, and many other worthy things done, as the rescue of Ioppa, and repulse of Saladine from thence, &c. the King indefatigable in his brave attempts, desirous to re-gaine Ierusalem, and the Citie Baruck, was abandoned in that enterprise by the Duke of Burgundy (who is * said to have beene apatiently corrupted with gifts from Saladine, and the regiments of French under his conduct:) whereupon hee was the rather perswaded by the Knights Templars, and chiefes of the Christian hoast, not to refuse Saladines offers for a furceasance from hostilitie, consfidering that hee had a purpose to returne with reenforced numbers and meanes; that his present powers by divisions, by sicknesse, by battailes were wasted, and that the dangerous estate of his owne Dominions did require his presence, (the greatest motive, for hee had supplies of money for his Souldiers wages from Pope Celestine) by reason of some undue practises at home, and the rancour of King Philip his unreconcileable adversary abroad. Whereupon a truce was taken for three yeares, and Saladine re-paid such charges as Richard had beene at in fortifying Askalon, which was brought to the same estate, as in which King Richard found it.

(40) But the King of England, though he had very farre excelled all the Christian Princes in great exploits at that journey, because * he had neither conquered Saladine, nor Ierusalem, did mourne, and parted pensive. In the Holy-land he left Henry Earle of Champaine, (who upon taking the said Baruck, was to have beene crowned King of Ierusalem, which Guido had resigned) and he left Guido de Lusignian (the late King of Ierusalem) in Cyprus, to whom he had passed it, in exchange for the other, to advance his Kinsmanthe said Earle of Champain; which, upon that Title, the family of Lusignian for * many descents after did possesse and enjoy. Thus Richard having ordered his affaires in the East parts, set saile homeward. The Queenes Berengaria his Wife, and Ioane his Sister, with the Captive Lady, Daughter of the Cypriot Emperour, under the conduct of Stephen de Turnham, (hearing of the Kings most heavie fortune) so journeyed at Rome about sixe moneths, for feare of Richards enemies, and afterward came safe by Marsilia into Poictou.

(41) God, whose cause was onely pretended in this voyage of the Christians, did not seeme to approove the said truce; for he * scattered the English with a terrible tempest, and the * opportunitie of Conquest was so lost, that hitherto it could never be re-gained, and the King of England letting it slip, when God had almost put the same into his hands, did miserably fall into his enemies hands. Certainely, the name of Richard was at that time growne terrible to Saladine, who had received divers losses, foyles, and overthrowes at his hands: Moreover, the Saladines whole estate being endangered by such of his own sect as reputed him a meere Vsurper, hee could not long withstand the double impression of the Christian Chivalrie, and of his owne Allies and Country-men; as indeed not long after * he died, leaving his Empire foulely, but justly, distracted by civill confusions: whereas by this Truce the crafty Turke made the world see, that the powers of two so Potent Monarchs had in a manner effected nothing; and Richard could never have time to returne for accomplishment of his defignes; for which all Christendome hath at this houre reason to be sorrowfull, and hereof himselfe * was very sensible, so that hee would oftentimes cry out, that hee was not alwaies wise, alluding to this occasion loft.

(42) But the noble King, hoping to pierce with speed thorow Germanie in disguise, tooke to him the name of * Hugh a Merchant, the haire of his * head and beard growne very long, being the fitter to conceale him; but in his journey over-land, was neere to Vienna unhappily discovered by the profufeneffe of his expences; when hee saw hee could not escape them, * in contempt of his fortunes, he put on royall garments, and refused to yeeld but * onely to the Duke himselfe, who came with joy as to a prey which hee fore longed for: but the rascall multitude * cried things worthy of themselves, calling him (O barbarisme) Traitour, and some saying, stone him; some, cut off his head; and others, hang him: and because the inhumanity of this usage may bee suited with rymes as rude and ragged, you shall in such heare the cause of this Arch-dukes malice, growing first at Acon, where the Author speaking of King Richard saith;

He gate it soone with his great Ordnance,
And on the walles his Banners full high set,
The Kings Armes he set up also of France,
And King Guyes Armes of Ierusalem well bet,
The Duke of Oistrich, Limpald without let,
Set up his Armes after above them all,
Which King Richard did cast downe from the wall.

(43) And though it is certaine that this Authour faines not this fact, for that some such matter) and told by * some with more disadvantage to Richards cause) is by others * related, yet the graveft Authors agree (that next to the common envy at his vertues) the greatest preterence was the murther of the Marquesse Conrad, commited at Tyre, by two cursed Assasines, a certaine sect in the East, living under a Senior or Ruler, whom they honour as a Prophet, by whom they are sent forth to murther such Princes as favour them not, promising themselves the reward of immortality by obeying him in all things, though with the losse of their owne lives. Of which barbarous fact, Henry the Emperor, and Leopold the Arch-duke, (whose neere kinf-man Conrad was) would seeme to beleeve that Richard was the Author, though therein they touche his princely reputation and integrity, * most injuriously, for that the chiefe of that sect by their owne publique * Letters (written with the blond of the Shel-fish called Murex, wherewith Scarlet used to bee died) acknowledging the fact, declared the true cause thereof, which was a particular Act of injustice in Conrad himselfe: There wanted not fundry other pretences, as in such cases is usuall, as * that Richard had entred league with Tancred King of Sicilia the Emperours enemy, and that he had thurst the Cypriot (their kinfman) out of the Empire, and kept his onely daughter Captive. But this booty, being to great for a Duke, the Emperour got into his custodie, meaning to coine much Gold and Silver out of his most unjust afflictions; by sharpe imprisonment: which could not make him in any act or speech, or gesture of his, shew beneath the Majestie of a victorious Prince and King of England.

(44) The dismall newes; thereof flying thorow the world, presently disclosed who were sound or unsure; sorrow and dismay was every where among his owne. * His carefull mother, and other his fast friend-friends, sweare the Realme to be true to King Richard, watch the coasts, and provide for the securitie of the State, with singular vigilancie, assuring the Cities and good Townes with Bulwarkes, Walles, and Munition. On the contrary, Earle John being (by the cunning inveighling and suggestions of his brothers professed foes) not onely put out of all hope of his releasement, but also incensed against him for intending the Crowne to his Nephew Arthur, entered into an unbeotherly attempt against his Soveraigne Lord; the summe whereof, take in the words of Thomas Walsingham, who saith, that Iohn with promises allured many to him through the whole Kingdome, did carefully and speedily fortifie his holds in England, and passing the Seas, entred into league with the king of the French, that he might utterly put his Nephew Arthur, Duke of Britaine from that hope, which the Britaines had conceived of his promotion. The * Normans giving any way to his disloyall practises, he sweares fealty to Philip King of France (his brothers most mortall enemie) and also that he would take to wife the Lady Alice King Philips sister, though polluted by his owne Father, and for that cause rejected by King Richard. Out of Normandy hee posts into England, sollicites Peeres and People, and was loyally resisted: but hee not quieted so, labours to stirre the Scot and Welsh to joyne in an invasion with him; the French and Flemings assuring them that his Brother King Richard would never be set at libertie: but William King of Scots would neither give assent, nor countenance, to such undutifull practises, or rather madnesses.

(45) In this most perillous time, the valour and loyaltie of the Citie of Roan (the choiceft of Normandy) did most clearely shew themselves to the everlasting commendation thereof: for Philip comming before it with a puissant Army, solicited them to revolt, promising mountaines. In stead of answere they set open the Gates, telling him that he might enter if he would, for no man hindred him: but the vaine-glorious King being better advised, (for the inhabitants, yea and the damsels of the Citie, whose heads were polde like as mens, powred molten pitch, and such like matter upon the besiegers) retreated from the Walles, and marcht away confounded: and being certainly advertized that the Emperour and King Richard were agreed, he sends over to Earle * Iohn, bidding him looke to himselfe, for the Divell was now let loose. Hee thereupon croft over the Seas to Philip, who * excited him to usurpe the Kingdome of England.

(46) Nevertheleſſe by Queene Elianors negotiation (who in person travelled to the Emperour) the King her sonne was come to be assured of his libertie, upon these conditions. 1. That hee should pay to the Emperour one hundreth thousand Markes to sterling. 2. That hee should pay fiftie thousand Markes of like money to the Emperour and Duke. 3. That he should marry his Neece, (sister to Arthur Duke of Britaine) to Duke Leopolds sonne. 4. That the Emperour should secure him, till hee were under saile with a fore-winde. 5. That hee should set the Cypriots person at libertie, and deliver his daughter to the Duke of Austria, who was her Vncle, and should deliver 67. hostages for assurance of all.

(47) But to colour this unreasonable and unprincely extortion, the Emperour by his Imperiall Charter gives unto King Richard, Province, and sundry other ample Territories, containing five Archbishopricks, and thirtie three Bishopricks (sometime parcell of the Empire, but both then and a long time before out of possession) and thereof crownes him King, writing magnificent Letters into England, with such like offices.

(48) Now when King Richard (who had wonne to himselfe wonderfull honour and respect, even of the covetous Emperour, by the proofe of his innocency, and by his most noble and constant carriage) did expect his libertie at an Assembly or Diet, where the greatest Princes and States of the Empire were in person; to wit, The three Archbishops of Mentz, Colein and Saltzburgh; The three Bishops of Wormes, Spire, and Leiges; The three Dukes of Swave (the Emperours brother) Austrich, and Luvain; The Count Palatine of Rhene, &c. which had undertaken for the Emperour, whose officers had already received the greater part of the ransome: behold even then the Emperour shewes a willingnesse to breake off, producing the Letters of Philip King of France, and of Iohn Earle of Morton, in which they offer an huge summe, &c. too impious and devilish to speake of: but the Princes who had undertaken to King Richard for good dealing, went to the Emperour, reproving him for his avarice, who would so dishonourably traverse and start backe from the agreement. * Vpon the fourth of Februarie therefore being Friday, the Archbishops of Mentz and Colein restore him, * after fifteene moneths imprisonment, to Queene Elianor his mother, free from the Emperour, all that were present weeping thereat for joy.

(49) This Archbishop of Coleine was he, who entertaining the King in the Dominions of his Archbishopricke; with great joy for his deliverance did celebrate divine service in this manner: Now know I truly that the Lord hath sent his Angel and taken me out of the hand of Herod, and the expectation of the common people of the Iewes, &c.

(50) And indeed it was Gods Angell did it: for after all this, whiles the King stayed for a wind, and other preparations at the Sea-shoare, the Emperour repenting him of his release, sent speedily guarders to apprehend him againe, vowing hee should never bee freed from bonds whiles hee lived; but some secret message (as Princes Courts never want Spials) speedily pre-monished him, and so by a very little time he prevented his surprisers, landing happily at Sandwich, in Aprill the Sunday after Saint Georges day; where in stead of all other triumphes, or particulars of joy for his returne, wee will content our selves with onely one, as signe of the rest. When the King drew neere to Rochester, the venerable new Archbishop of Canterbury Hubert (who had beene with him at Acon in the Holy-land,) went joyously forth to meet him; whom when the King saw, he dismounted from his Horse, and having bowed his knee, fell upon the earth, in like fort the Archbishop lay right against him; at the last both of them rising from the ground, they ranne into each others armes, comforting themselves with mutuall embraces and weeping with joy.

(51) The justice of a true history will not suffer us heere to forget, in what fort the injustice of this unnoble captivation of Richard King of England, was punished by God, and on Gods behalfe. The Duke of Austrian Country, and people, being vifited with these five plagues, Fire, Water, Barrennesse, Wormes, and Pestilence: the Fire, casually burning his Townes; the River of Danubius drowning ten thousand of his Subjects, in an over-flow; the earth waxing dry and feare; the Wormes destroying such fruit and graine as grew; and the stroke of Pestilence killing the principall Nobles and Gentlemen of his Dominions: The Duke for all this continued obstinate, like another Pharaoh, swearing to cut off the heads of K. Richards Hostages, unlesse all Covenants (though extorted by cruell Duresse) were exactly and speedily performed. Baldwin de Betun (one of the Hostages) is sent to the King with this bloudy message; but before his returne, upon S. Stephens day in Christmas, the Duke * spurring his Horse, in sport, upon a Castle of Snow among yourhes, which were counterfeiting a siege, and an assault, with the slip of his Horse, brake his foot in such fort, as it came to be * cut off, and within a while feeling himselfe perishing upward, so that his death was certaine, could not bee absolved of his Bishoppes from the sentence of Excommunication

Excommunication which had by the Pope beene denounced, till hee and his Lords had sworne to release all the said matters betweene the King of England and him; but his sonne after his death refusing the performance, his Fathers body lay stinking above ground eight daies, for that no Clergy-man durst burie it, being but conditionally absolved, till the sonne did yeeld to the performance; yet (if * fome may be credited upon his bare word) the sonne did voluntarily condiscend, and not upon this compulsion.

(53) But albeit the Emperour to declare himselfe wounded with some remorse for his ungodly violence, or to engage others in the impietie, gave three thousand Markes of King Richards ransome to make silver Censers through all the Cistercian order, who generally refused the gift, as parcell of an accursed spoile (for as for those * leavenie thousand markes, which hee forgave to King Richard, with as bad a purpose (being to hinder peace betweene him, and the French) as he had taken the other unjustly, they are not to be accounted as restitution, but as the wages of sinne;) revenge forsooke him not, being pursued by his owne Wife (the Heire of the Crowne of Sicilia) in revenge of some cruelties done to her Country-men, and after reconcilement with her, falling dangerously sicke, hee died at Messana, excommunicated for King Richards cause. And albeit he had in his life-time sent his Chancellour out of Burgundie, of purpose to offer King Richard recompence for the injuries he had sustained, and although Constantia the Empresse had sent the Archbishoppe of Messana, (while the Emperours body lay above ground without buriall) to Pope Celestine in humble manner, praying Christian buriall, yet * unlesse the mony which hee had extorted from the king of England were restored, hee could by no entreaties obtaine it, which accordingly was promised.

(54) Neither were the King of Englands afflictions unprofitable unto him, for they gave him occasion to reforme his life, taking home to him his Queene Berengaria, whose society for a long time he had neglected, though she were a royall, eloquent, & beauteous Lady, and for his love had ventured with him through the World.

(55) King Richard after his joyous returne into England, having at the Abbey of Saint Edmunds, in performance of his vow (as may seeme) offered up the rich Imperiall Standart of Cursac, Emperour of Cyprus, which hee tooke among the spoyles of the Griffons Campe: thence hee marched, and tooke in by furrender such Castles as the servants of his brother Iohn (beleeving that the King was not returned) held against him; but Henry de Pumeray, who had fortified Saint Michaels Mount in Cornwall, hearing for certaine that King Richard was come, died for very feare. And now, forty dayes of summons being expired, which were allowed to Earle Iohn, & Hugh Bishop of Coventry, for making their appearance, to answere to such hainous matter as was prepared, and they not appearing, Iohn was adjudged by the Peeres and States of England, to have forfeited all that hee might forfeit in the Realme, and the Bishop to bee punishable by the ecclesiasticall censures, as hee was a Bishop, and likewise as an Officer of the King, by the Laitie. Richard afterward bestirres himselfe to draw in money more greedily then did become soe great a Majesty, wherein yet (saith * one) hee was rather to be pardoned then accused, for that he was prefently to lead a mightie Armie against the French.

(56) But first of all, to wipe away both the sadnesse and contumely of his late restraint, for a better fortunes beginning, hee caused himselfe to bee crowned againe at the City of Winchester; which celebrity was honoured with the presence of William King of Scotland, who bare a sword before * King Richard: betweene which two Princes, there * followed great amity and tendernesse of love; then beeing graunted to him, and his succeſſours Kings of Scotland, a certaine pension, with sundry other allowances, and princely attendances, from the first day of their friendly entrances at any time into England, till their returne.

(57) The King likewise caused a new broad Seale to be made, requiring that all Charters graunted under his former, should be confirmed under this, whereby hee drew a great masse of money to his Treasurie, subscribing such renued Charters thus: This was the tenor of our Charter under our first Seale, which because it was lost, and in the time of our being captive in Almaigne was in the power of another, we caused to be changed, &c. Some have observed, that as this Richard was the first of the English Kings who bare Armes on his Seales, as appeareth by the * former: so was hee the first who carried in his shield three Lions passant, borne ever after for the Regall Armes of England. And whereas we see here the Moone in her full, which in the other was but a Crescent, (which is the Turkish-Ensigne,) it may seeme to be done Emblemetically, in that fence, as wee reade of another Prince, (who going against the Turkes) gave a Crescent with this word, Plenior redibo, I will returne more full. The true draught of this second Seale we have heere annexed.

(58) A good * Author reports, that after this, the King being at dinner at Westminster, and receiving advertisement of the siege laid to Vernuil, by his restlesse enemie Philip of France; sware that hee would never turne his face, till hee had gotten thither with his Armie to fight with the French; whereupon hee caused the Wall to bee cut through, (the signe of which breach appeared * above two hundred yeares after) never resting, till with an hundred great Shippes, hee had croft the Seas from Portsmouth

(60) There were after this sundry skirmishes, takings of Prisoners and Townes, and conferences betweene the French and English, mooved belike by such as religiously tendered the effusion of Christian bloud, so as no great matter was yet effected; that which was, being rather by * Stratagems and starts, then by battle; but within thirty seven dayes after the French-mens flight from Vernuil, King Richard (in revenge of that desolation which the French King had brought upon the City of Evreux, where hee neither spared age, sexe, nor Church) comming to Vendome, with purpose to surprize the King of France, had the spoile of the French Campe, their King (a thing almost incredible) now the second time flying without battle. Many of the French were slaine, and taken, together with much * treasure, the Chappell-royall, the Indentures of such as had left Richard to serve King Philip, and all the * tents, carriages, and other furnitures for warre: and from hence marching to Peyctou, and Engolisme, hee had such successes (howsoever the silent partialities of forraine Writers smother them) that * himselfe wrote over to his deereſt Hubert Arch-bishop of Canterbury, " That by Gods favour, who in all things considers the " right, hee had taken Taillburg, Marsiliac, and all the " other Castles of Geffrey de Rancune, the City of Engo- " lisme, and all the Castles and Territories of the Earle " thereof, and almost three hundreth Knights, or men of " Armes, and about forty thousand armed Souldiers.

(61) Wee will not heere over passe, that which Hoveden reports, (being an example of Christian repentance in Princes) of a poore Hermits comming to this noble Monarch, and preaching to him the words of eternall life; and bade him be mindefull of the subversion of Sodom, and to abstaine from things unlawfull, otherwise (saith he) the deserved vengeance of God will come upon thee. The Hermit being gone, the King neglected his words: but not long after falling sicke, hee more seriously bee-thought himselfe, and afterward waxing sound in Soule, as well as body, his daily exercise was to rise earely, and not to depart from the Church till divine service were finished: " whereupon, (saith Hoveden) how " glorious is it for a Prince to begin and end his actions in " him, who is beginning without beginning, and judgeth " the ends of the earth? Moreover, hee bountifully releeved every day much poore both in his Court and Townes about: and restored Gold and silver Vessels to such Churches, from which to pay his ransome they had beene taken away.

King Richards amendment of life and daily exercise.

(62) After this, passed sundry interchanges betwixt the French and English, sometimes of warres, with wastes and spoiles, sometimes of truces with interviewes and Parlies; in one of which, the Lady Alice, (cause of much mischiefe) K. Philips Sister, was restored (according to the contract of Messana) to her brother, who forthwith bestowed her in marriage upon Iohn Earle of Pontif. In the meane while the Kings sought to make friends upon all sides, but King Richard by his munificence, and other meanes, drew from king Philip a mighty party of his neereſt neighbours: * Baldwin Earle of Flanders, Raimund Earle of Tholouse (to whom also King Richard gave in * marriage, his sister Ioan Queene of Sicilia) the * Champanois, and others; so that Philip was faine to trust wholly upon himselfe: for whereas he had lately married the sister of the King of Denmarke, of purpose to use the Danish shipping against the English, that affinity proved enmity: for the * next day after his wedding, he put her away, pretending (beside * other things) that shee was of too neere a propinquity of bloud; albeit most untruly, as her brother, the King of Denmarke proved before the Pope, though he could not bee heard, the king of France more prevayling, either by feare or favour.

(63) About this time, Iohn the Kings brother, & Markadey Captaine of the Brabanters, called the * Rowters, had made an incursion up to Beauvois, where the Bishoppe, being also an Earle of the Royall Bloud, and the eleaventh Peere of France, valiantly fighting, was * taken in the skirmish, armed at all poynts, and bravely mounted; on whose behalfe the Pope (vpon the Bishops humble suite, * pleading the Clergies immunity) wrote somewhat earnestly to King Richard, to set his very deare sonne, for so hee called the Bishop, at liberty; The King in a kinde of pleasant earnestnesse, caused the Habergeon and Curaces of the Bishop to bee presented to the Pope, with this question (alluding to that of * Iacobs children to their father, concerning Iosephs garment,) * Vide an tunica filii tui sit an non; See whether it bee thy sonnes coat or no. Whereupon the Pope replied, that " he was neither his sonne nor the sonne of the Church, " and therefore should be ransomed at the Kings will, " because he was rather judged to bee a servitor of Mars, " then a Souldier of Christ. Whom the King of England (in * revenge of many evill offices, especially in the time of his captivity with the Emperour) handled sharpely. The Bishop at length waxing impatient, writes a paffionate letter to the Pope; whose answere in part is heere set downe, for that it * notably defends the King of England. If (saith * the Pope) thou hast had ill succesſe, it is no marvaile, for putting off the peaceable Prelate, thou * didst put on the warlike Souldier; and rashly too- * kest a shield in stead of a cope, a sword for a Stole, * a Curace for an Albe, an Helmet for a Mytre, a * Lance for a Bishops staffe, perverting the order * and course of things: neither meant you (as you al- * ledge) to repell violence, but vertue; nor did you * fight for your Country, but against it: for of your * France we can now publiquely pronounce; Woe to * that Land whose King is a * Child. For your King * was strictly bound by corporall oath to the King * of England, not to damnifie his Territories, &c. * at least-wise till his returne from the journey of his * Pilgrimage: Nevertheleſſe, contrary to his faith * and oath, hee without all shame, seized by force * the good Townes of the said King, and cruelly * wasted his Dominions with hostile hand: but * that King returning at last out of captivity; man- * fully encountred your King, not repoſing his hope * in multitude, but in Almightie God, &c. losse and dishonour out of the field by King Richard, beside the losse of Saint Omers, of Air, and of other Townes, wonne by Baldwin Earle of Flanders, and besides the waste of the French Dominions by many invasions. But the greatest of the three victories, was the second, which King Richard gained at the battaile betweene Curceles and Gysors, where the K. of France himselfe fell into the River of Ethe, the bridge breaking under him, with the throng of people which fled for their lives before the English Lion: neither was hee easily saved (twenty of his men of Armes being drowned by that ruine) but before hee could bee drawne out, water had gotten into his belly.

The famous victory of Gysors. Hoveden. Matth. Paris. Tyndig. Newll.

(65) This was a famous victory; for besides a long Catalogue of great names extant in Authors; there were taken by the Kings Army, 100. Knights and Servitours on horse-backe, and footmen without number, besides thirty men of Armes, and other inferiour Souldiers not countable, which Markadey (Generall of the Rowtes) had for prisoners. There were also taken 200. great horse, whereof seven-score had barbes, and capariſons armed with yron. King Richard in his owne person did most nobly, for with one speare he threw to the earth Matthew de Mummerancy, Alan de Rusci, and Fulke de Giservall, and tooke them. " So have wee vanquished the King of " France at Gysors, (saith the King) howbeit we have " not done the same, but * God and our right by us: " and in this fact we did put our owne head and king- " dome in hazard above the counsell of all that were " ours. Howsoever therefore the French or others may flubber over such a noble Iourney, wee have not doubted upon so good warrant to record the same.

(66) The warre continuing still, many vertuous men laboured to make a finall accord; and the new Pope Innocentius the third, having proclaimed a new undertaking of the Holy-warre * sends a Cardinall Deacon to attone the two mighty Kings of France and England. At length Articles of peace were drawne; but Richard (being farre before hand) was nothing hasty to conclude, and therefore put it off till his returne from Poyctou, whither hee went to chastise his rebels, though * some say, hee did then conclude the peace.

The Pope vainly sweres the Bishop. Matth. Paris.

(67) At this enterview or treaty, Philip King of France, * (the sower of strife, though he fought peace) shewed to King Richard a deed, in which Earle Iohn newly yeelds himselfe Leige-man to King Philip, against his brother. A wonderfull thing, (saith Hoveden) that Richard should beleeve it (being perhaps but a Copy of that device or tricke, if it were a device which they once had joyntly put upon the same Iohn, as in the end of King Henry the second you heard) who thereupon forthwith diseased the Earle his brother every-where. But the Earle having searched and learned the cause of the Kings sudden displeasure; (whose love hee had before redeemed with many loyall services,) Hee sends two men of Armes to the French Court, who should on his behalfe, in what sort soever, defend his honour and innocency, against any his accusers: but there was no man found in that Court, neither King nor any other, who would undertake the proofe or maintenance thereof; whereupon ever afterward Richard held his brother more deare, and gave lesse credit to King Philips words.

Matth. Paris. An. Dom. 1193. Roger Hoved. fol. 419. Matth. Paris.

(68) But now ensued the fatall accident, which drew the blacke cloud of death over this triumphall and bright shining Starre of Chevalry, the ill-worthy occasion of which misadventure makes it the more lamentable; which notwithstanding, for a document to the Great-ones, against the outrage of Avarice and Cruelty, God suffered thus to fall on him. Widomare, Vicount of Limoges, having found a great * hoord of gold and silver, sent no small portion thereof to King Richard, as chiefe Lord, with which being not contented (as pretending that treasure trove, was wholly his by vertue of his prerogative-royall, or else misliking that the Vicount should make the partition) came with a power to a Castle of the Vicounts called * Chalus, where hee supposed the Riches were; the Garrison of which place offered to yeeld the same, and all therein, if onely their lives and limbes might be saved: but he would not accept of any conditions, bidding them defend themselves as they could, for he would enter by the sword, and hang them all. It grieves mee to thinke that such a Prince should so forget himselfe: but behold the feverity of Gods judgement. An Arbalaster, (or Archibalista) standing upon the wall, and seeing his time, charged his steele bow with a square arrow or quarrell, * making first his prayer to God, That hee would direct that shot, and deliver the innocency of the besieged from oppression. Whereupon discharging it, as the King was * taking a view of the Castle, within the danger and distance of such an Engin, and the King (* upon hearing the bow goe off) stooping with his head, was mortally wounded in the left shoulder; the anguish and perill whereof was extremely augmented by the bureherly and unskilfull hand of the Surgeon, who having drawne out the wood, and not the envenomed yron, * mangled the arme with cruell incisions before he could prevaile; the paine whereof hastned his end.

(69) Concerning the name of this tragicall Archer, there is so much variety, as that we could willingly take that uncertainery for a warrant to silence it: being loth to ennoble him with our pen, it being a thing worthily punishable with utter oblivion, to have shed, (though defensively or but casually) the bloud of such a King. Matthew Paris * in calling him Peter Basilii, seemes to allude to some ominous conceit in Basilii, (which with the Greekes signifies a King;) him Thomas Walsingham followes therein, as Matthew Paris followed * another: there want not * some who also give him a third name; but Hoveden who delivers this accident, as all the rest of this Kings life, in the most probable and fullest manner, calls him Bertram de Gurdonn, applying unto him certaine * verses of Lucan, in commendation of his unappalled constancy, when he came before King Richard: where thou maist perhaps (for satisfaction of thy mind, with beholding some revenge) desire to know what became of the Actor. After that the Castle by continuall assaults was taken; and (by the kings command) none left alive but hee (as being reserved * perhaps to some more shamefull death) the king (upon a christian magnanimity) forgave him the fact, which the party (without shew of dismay) did neither deny nor excuse, but alledged the necessity of his case, and the justice of Gods worke in it, for that the king had slaine his Father and two brothers with his owne hand: being hereupon set at liberty, and one hundred shillings sterling given him by the king: Markadey (Captaine of the Mercenary Rowtes) after the king was dead, tooke him, flead him quicke, and then by hanging ended his life.

(70) There hath beene an opinion, or fancy, that this King was called Cordelion, because he encountred a Lyon, in prison, at the Emperours Court: but (saith * one very truely) these are fables, imagined by English tale-tellers, to advance their King Richard; as the Britaines, by the like, advanced their King Arthur. The like device, (though more lofty and Mathematicall) may theirs seeme, who conjecture, hee was called so of the famous * Starre, called Cor Leonis. But how the conceit of killing of a Lyon should come up, as it is not worth the while to enquire, so certainely, Hugo de Nevile, (one of King Richards speciall familiars) is recorded to have slaine a Lyon in the holy-Land, driving first an arrow into his breast; and then running him through with his sword: whence perhaps that atchievement is transferred from the man to the master; and the Story applyed to the by-name of King Richard, whereof the true reason is that which * Thomas Walsingham mentioneth, saying; That for the magnanimity of his heart (grostitudinem pressans, saith an * other, meaning as it seemes, that his materiall heart it selfe was big and massive, which * another also saith was inexpugnable) this King was both by the English and Normans stiled Cœur de Lion.

Philip, the naturall son of King Richard, seemeth to have been begotten, while he was Earle of Poyctou, of a Gentlewoman Poyctovin, and to have had of his fathers gift a towne in Poyctou named Sumac, to have taken also his fur-name and title of the same Towne; and to have beene the Progenitour of a Family of Gentlemen of the same surname and title, in the same Country.

Isabel, (by * some who mention not Philip at all) is reputed the Naturall Daughter of King Richard, (whose mother the Author nameth not) and that shee was married to Leoline Prince of Wales.

* Mr. Mills.

Three other Daughters, (Bastards no doubt) hee is said to have, of whose names and matches wee will report as wee find recorded. Whiles hee was in France, employed in his warres against King Philip, Fulco a French Priest, came unto him, telling him hee had three very bad Daughters, which he wished him to bestow away from him in marriage, or else Gods wrath would attend him: when the King denyed hee had any daughter, yes (quoth the Priest) thou cherishest three daughters, Pride, Covetousnesse, and Lechery. The King apprehensiue of his meaning, called his Lords there attending, and said: "My Lords, this "Hypocrite hath found that I have three daughters: "which I maintaine, viz. Pride, Covetousnesse, and Le-"chery, which he would have me bestow forth in mar-"riage; and therefore (if any such I have) I have found "out most fit Husbands for them all. My Pride I be-"queath to the haughty Templers and Hospitallers, "who are as proud as Lucifer himselfe: My Cove-"tousnesse I give to the white Monkes of the Cisteaux "Order, for they covet the Divell and all: But for "my Lechery I can bestow it no where better then on "the Priests and Prelates of our times, for therein "have they their most felicity. Doubtlesse these mariages prooved so fruitfull, that their issue hath now over-flowed all Kingdomes of the earth.

CHAPTER VIII.

An. Dom. 1199. Greatest happinesse no in greatest dignities.

THE lustre of Diadems, and Soveraigntie, so dazeleth the eyes, and bewitcheth the hearts of ambicious beholders, that whiles they fondly deeme the greatest content to be in highest Titles, running after a seeming happinesse, they often cast themselves head-long, and whole Kingdomes, into a reall and irrepairable ruine; as the calamities, which after the death of the noble Cœur-de-Lion, lighted on the Pretenders to his Crowne, and on this miserably distracted State, will yeeld us too rusfull a President. To the full acting of which Tragedie, (for such it was, and so wee must now present it in this our Theatre,) concurred as principall Actors, the two (though these Patients rather, as the issue prooved,) unfortunate Corrivals for the Crowne, Iohn Earle of Mortone, Brother to the late King, and his Nephew Arthur the [a] Posthumous sonne of Geffrey Duke of Britaine, the Earles eldest Brother: their two Female (and therefore more emulous and restlesse) Solicitors, Queene Eleanor and Lady Constance, each ambitious of their owne, in their Sonnes advancement: their two revengefull Abettors, Otho the Emperour for Iohn, and Philip King of France for Arthur: thereupon the two unjust Intruders on the Crowne; Lewis the French Kings Sonne, and Innocentius the Pope, the one by unprincely forces, the other by unpriestly fraud: and lastly, their two sorts of treacherous Instruments, of the Latin for the one, and Clergie for the other; all which, like so many Tragicke fire-breathing Furies, set this State in so horrible combustion, as that the [b] smoake is not as yet, so many ages after, quite allayed.

calamities met,) had from his infancy beene fedde with high and royall hopes, as c being his fathers onely darling, from whom hee had the d possession of the Irish, and e intendment also of the English Kingdome: and in his brothers time, (f whose return from the holy-warres all men despaired) had by gratious deportment towards the Subjects, obtayned an oath of Fealty to himselfe, in g remainder, in case his brother should die childlesse: having now therefore the way to those his desiignes made smoother by the h last will of King Richard, and i allegiance of his Nobles then attending; (for these courses may facilitate, but not make a just claime;) wee may not thinke, that either he was cold now, for the accomplishment of that, which so hotly hee had before pursued, or so nice, as to neglect a Kingdome, upon scrupulous points of Titles & Right. k Propinquity of blood pleaded for Iohn, as l Lineall descent for Arthur, the Kings Brother being nearer then his Brothers sonne; but Iohn, who knew that the weaker use to argue their Titles, whiles the stronger hold the possession, resolved to try the strength of his claime by no other Law then of Armes; and therefore, being at the time of King Richards death in those forraine parts, hee makes it his first care to fasten to himselfe, by present m largesse, and large promises of future favours, (the usuall Rhetoricke of Competitours) all the Stipendarie Souldiers, and other Servitours of his deceased Brother. To win himselfe the like assurance of love at home, and n to settle (if it might bee) an universall quiet, he o forthwith despeeded into England, there to concurre with Queene Eleanor, his experienced Mother, three of the choiseſt men of the State, Hubert Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, William Marshall a potent Peere, and Geoffry Fitz-Peter the great Iusticiar, by whose severall interests, the three States, of Clergy, Chivalry, and Commonalty, might best bee either allured to him by favours, or awed by feare; himselfe, the whiles p posting to Chinon, where King Richards great Treasure was kept; as knowing* Richards treasure would hardly get or keepe a Crowne by Forces that hee should hardly get or keepe a Crowne by Forces or Friends, if hee wanted Coyne and Crownes, to win and hold such needfull Adyers.

(3) The Treasurer, though q himselfe with his Store, Castles, and fidelity, thus assured to the Earle, had yet a powerfull * Nephew, the Castellan of Angiers, wholly r Devoted to Duke Arthur, to whose use he yeelded up that Citie and Castle, with whom also s ſided the Nobilitie of Anion, Maine, and Turaine, surrendring those large Territories, as to t their liege Lord, joyntly avowing it to bee the u Law & custome of those Signiories, that the heritage which was to accrew to the elder Brother, if hee had survived, should descend unto his Sonne. But Constance, Arthurs mother, no lesse x desirous to bee Regent to a King (for her sonne was but y twelue yeeres yong) then Queene Eleanor z disdainefull to goe below a Dutcheſſe, did not dare to build her high hopes on so low grounds, for that such subordinate Princes as favoured her cause, might easily bee corrupted by faire meanes, or crushed by foule: and therefore upon newes of King Iohns successes in England (for with generall applause and a homages hee was now proclaimed King,) distracted with violent and Woman-like passions, Ambition of her sons Right, Rage for his Wrong, Feare of his Safety, and (not the least) Emulation that Queene Eleanor (whose prudence and Grace with the Englesh, had b swayed exceedingly (should effect more in a wrong, then her selfe in a just cause; c shee flies to Turaine to the French King Philip, (to seeke a Wolfe to whom shee might commit her Lambe,) to whose Protection shee wholly surrenders his Person, his Cause, his Countries. Philip * pretending, (as Princes use) a tender care of his Neighbour Princes state, but d meaning indeede out of so wilhed a prize, to raise advantage to his owne, forthwith (e without regard of Truth, or Truce sworne to King Richard) re-enforceth all Arthurs Cities and Castles with his French Garrisons; some of which had scarse put their foote into Maunz, but f King Iohn was at their heeles, to provide them their last lodging, sacking that Citie, and demolishing it to the ground, for a terrour to all others, which after fealty once sworne unto him, (as they had done) should dare to revolt,

(4) Queene Eleanor, who having setled England in Peace, was now come over to forward her sonne in the Warres, and was h present at the surprising of Maunz, is i censured to have too much sharpened his edge against her Nephew Arthur and his friends, out of her implacable disdaine, and Envie towards Constance her Daughter in Law, and it appears no leſſe, for the King passing thence into Anion, left there his k Captaines and Forces with his mother, who made Angiers participate the fortunes of Maunz, the Citie ruined, the Citizens captivated; whiles himselfe comming to Roan, l was there by the hands of Walter the Archbishop, in the Cathedrall Church with great pompe, on Saint Markes Festival, girt with the m Ducall Sword of Normandy, and crowned n with a Coronet of Golden Roſes, (taking his Oath for faithfull administraion in that Dukedome) which was the pledge or earnest of his unquestionable admittance to the Englisſh Diademe, which every day now expected him. Neither yet may wee thinke, albeit King Iohns o mature and experienced age, his homebred, and well knowne education, his re-annexing of Irelands kingdome to Englands, made his person more gracious then Arthurs, that yet his Agents all this while in England found no rubbs in their way, before p all the Earles, Barons, Burgeſſes, and free-holders could bee induced to diſclaime Arthurs apparent Right, and to ſweare fealty to King Iohn against all men living: yea, many of the * Englisſh Peers (who through their last Kings absence, and others connivences, had habituated in them a conceit of uncontrouled Greatnes, which they miſcalled Liberties and Rights, under vayle whereof, they after drew, not onely undue restraints upon the Regalitie; but also infinite calamities and maſſacres on the people, whose good they pretended,) thought it fitteſt now (like cunning Statiſts) to worke on the advantage of the time, and the neceſſities of their Prince, whose present condition fitted him for any obtruſions: and therefore in the great Assembly at Northampton, yeelded onely to ſweare a * Conditionall Fealty, to keepe q Faith and Peace to King Iohn, if hee would reſtore to every of them their Rights: which was the firſt ſeede of diſloyalties, which after grew to ſoe great a height. Thus howſoever, all domeſticke difficulties overblowne, and Queene Eleanor * left in Aquitaine to provide againſt Forraigne, King Iohn arrived at * Shoreham, and the next day comes to London, preparing for his Coronation to bee at Weſtminſter, the morrow following, beeing Aſcention day.

(5) Strange it was to conſider, (if ought be ſtrange in State-plots) how men, otherwiſe very prudent, transported once with Worldly and ſeemingpolitique reſpects, can ſo wilfully cloud their Reaſon, as to attempt thoſe things, which leave both a preſent ſtaine on their Soules, and a laſting diſ-reputation both of their Integrity and Wiſedome, wherein ſo much they glory. For what elſe did Hubert Archbiſhoppe of Canterburie, the man ſo * famouſed as r the Pillar of the Common-wealthes ſtability, and t incomparable for deepe-reaching Wiſe-dome, when in that ſacred and celebrious Aſſembly of c all the States, addreſſing for the royall Inauguration, hee added to thoſe Ley-Peeres Conditionals, his Clergy-Sophiſmes, and u ſecond ſeede-plot of Treaſons, perſwading them by a cunning, but diſloyall ſpeech (which yet x ſome by transforming, have more deformed) that the Engliſh Crowne was meerely Arbitrary and Elective at the peoples devotion? That y they all in diſcretion were to know, how that no man hath Right or any other fore-Title to ſucceed another in a Kingdome, unleſſe firſt (with invocation for Grace and Guidance of Gods Holy-Spirit) hee bee by the Body

Chap. 8.

Body of the Kingdome thereunto choſen, and hee indeede ſome choiſe man, and picked out for eminency of his vertues; by the President of Saul, the firſt Annointed King, whom God made Ruler over his owne people, though neither the Sonne of a King, nor yet of any Regall deſcent. So after him likewiſe David, the Sonne of a Iſhai; the one for being valourous, and a Perſonage fitting Royall dignity, the other for beeing Holy and humble-minded. To b ſhew that ſo hee, whoſoever in a Kingdome excelleth all in Valour and Vertue, ought to ſurmount all in Rule and Authority: yet ſo, as that, if any of the Oſſ-ſpring of a deceaſed King ſurpaſſeth others, it is fit ioyntly to conſent in election of ſuch a one. Thus hee ſpake (as hee profeſſed) in favour of Iohn, who then was preſent, whoſe moſt illuſtrious Brother King Richard, dying without any Heire from him deſcending, Him they had all (firſt imploring the c Holy Ghoſts aſſiſtance) as being a Provident, Valiant, and d undoubtedly-Noble-Prince, unanimouſly Elected, as well in regard of his Merits, as of his Royall Blood. So unjuſt a ſpeech from ſo great a Perſon, (eſpecially, blanching his diſloyall Aſſertion with Sacred Writ, and his lewd deviſed plot, with the Holy Ghoſts aſſiſtance,) could not but move much Offence and. Wonder to many, even to Iohn himſelfe, who doubtleſſe meant to ſtand to e his right of proximity by blood: f but they durſt not then and there, move Queſtions thereof, as afterward g ſome did, to whom he gave a reaſon of it, as ſtrange as the ſpeech it ſelfe; ſaying, h that hee was aſſured by ſome divining fore-ſight, that King Iohn would worke the ruine of the Kingdome, and that therefore, to i bridle him from ſo doing, hee had affirmed his Admiſſion was to bee by Choice, and not Hereditary Succeſſion: Implying, that as by Election he got the Crowne, ſo by Ejection on demerite hee might as juſtly looſe it. But for that preſent, the Ceremonies all pompouſly accomplished, (where k three Oathes were miniſtred to him; l To love Holy Church, and preſerve it from all oppreſſors; To governe the State in Juſtice, and abolish bad lawes; Not to aſſume this Royall honour but with full purpoſe to performe that hee had ſworne:) the firſt act and bounty of his Kingly Power, was to reward thoſe whoſe hands had lifted him to it, making William Marſhall and Fitz-Peter, Earles of Pembroke and Eſſex, and the Archbiſhop, Lord high Chancellour; who ſeeming m to glory in that addition of Honor, was told by the Lord Bardolfe, that the height of Archiepiſcopall dignity was ſuch, as it was ever reputed a great advancement for a Chancellor to bee made Archbiſhop, but none for an Archbiſhop to be made a Chancellour. And yet in truth, this Office of Conſcience, ſuited farre better with the Miter, then that of * Lord chiefe Juſtice of all England, which hee (though * no great Lawyer) enjoyed, in the Raigne of the late King.

(6) The Kings enemies, n who kept their heads in, whiles he was there in Armes, found opportunities to impeach him, while he was here feeling his Peace: the o French King in Normandy ſurpriſeth the City Eurenx, and recovers the County of Main, the Britaines re-gaine the City Angiers with other ſtrong holds: the newes whereof cauſed King Iohn with all ſpeed p to paſſe the Seas, to give ſtoppage to that current; where on his arrivall, his Army of q Friends and Voluntaries was ſo encreaſed, that King Philip was ſoone content to take r truce for fifty dayes; on expiration whereof, an Enterview was agreed on to eſtabliſh a laſting Peace. But Philip s long time noted of doubling, (ill beſeeming any, but chiefely a Prince) the t very day before the two Kings ſhould meete, giving Duke Arthur the u Belt of Knighthood, and taking of him Homage for the Signiories of Anion, Poyctou, Turaine, Maine, Britanny, and Normandy, hee made him faithfull vow, to yeeld him powerfull helpes, for acquiring thoſe poſſeſſions. Neither was King Iohn behinde him in that kind of prevention, when Philip Earle of Flanders, the French Philips profeſſed Enemy, u comming to Roan, and diſſwading x King Iohn from truſting any French friendſhip, did there ſweare unto him, both faithfull Helpe and Homage. Yet the two Kings keeping touch for the day, though not for the purpoſe of amity (and yet making faire ſhew of that too) held Parley betwixt Butavant and y Guletun z two dayes by Commiſſioners inter-current, the third by preſence and privacie, that not one of their Nobles or Attendants (who on each ſide lay far aloofe for the ſpace of an houre) underſtood any paſſages betwixt them. Thus much yet came to notice by after-relation, that a King Philip then required for Himſelfe the large Country of b Veulguſſine, pretending that Geffrey Earle of Anion granted it to Lewis le Groſſe, for ayding his Sonne King Henry the ſecond againſt King Stephen: and for Arthur, all Poyctou, Anion, Maine and Turaine: both which immoderate demands with others, King Iohn (conceiving with c Salomon, Wiſe doth hee not alſo aske for Adonijah the Kingdome?) d neither would nor ought to grant unto him; whereby their amities intended, ended in more hoſtile defiances. But Philips capitulating then for Arthur, was onely perfunctory and complemental, as his owne words, (and afterward his actions) bewrayed: when being queſtioned by his Favorites of his implacable e hatred againſt King Iohn, who had never harmed him, profeſſed it was onely, for that hee had (not, defeated Arthur, but) poſſeſſed himſelfe of Normandy, and the other Demaines, without asking him leave, or offering him Homage.

(7) The flames thus on all ſides breaking forth the ſtronger, by how much the more they had beene for a time kept in, (f many Earles and Barons of France) (who formerly adhered to King Richard) became Homagers to King Iohn, they (ſwearing, never without his aſſent to revert to Philip, and hee, never to make Peace with Philip, but they therein to be concluded. In the heate of which ſidings (if not before) a Schiefe adherent of the forefaid Earle of Flanders (now col-leagued with King Iohn) being the Biſhop Elect of Cambray, fell into the hands of the French, at which time alſo h Philip Biſhop of Beauvois, (a great French Peere) was held in priſon by King Iohn; and neither of them willing to forgoe their mitred Champions, i Petrus de Capua, the Legate, interdicted France for the one, and Normandy for the other, till they, as perſons ſacred and inviolable, ſhould bee diſmiſſed: yet King Iohn (whoſe Perſon and Title the Pope and Papals as yet much tendred) had the favour to wring out of his prize, k five thouſand Markes for his releaſe, and an Oath, never whiles hee breathed to beare Armes againſt any Chriſtian. l This Legat in King Richards time, had made agreement with King Philip for a five yeeres Truce, which expiring with Richards laſt breath, hee ſtill laboured to eſtabliſh it betwixt the now Kings: but King Philips great heart would not ſo come downe, which was likely to have coſt him deere. For purſuing whither his Fury (a bad guide) did lead him, after his ſiege of Lavardin, (m Whence upon King Iohns approach with his Army hee fled to Maunz, and thence againe fled, King Iohn comming thither;) ſeized the Caſtle of Balun (which belonged to Arthur) and to prevent his enemy (as is likely) n hee levelled it to the very ground; which fact Duke Arthurs o Generall, William de Rupibus wrathfully expoſtulating with King Philip, as having done therein contrary to Covenants with his Lord Arthur, hee as ſcornefully anſwered, that hee would not for his Lord Arthurs pleaſure, forbeare his owne, in doing as himſelfe liſted, with ſuch Forts as hee tooke. The Generall ſeeing Arthur was but the outward maske, under which Philip revelled for his hidden ends, p feriouſly perſwaded his Lord to reconcilement with his Vncle King Iohn, and rather to hazzard his hopes on the clemency of a Generous Foe, then on the guiles of a falſe-hearted Friend: and ſo making his peace with King Iohn, hee preſently yeelded up to him both Maunz, and (with Lady Conſtance) the young Duke alſo, the important matter of so great contentions. But heavens were not so propitious to these Reconciliats, as so to hold them long: some Philippines buzzing such needlesse [a]terrors of Imprisonment into the Noble Childes eares, that the next night, Feare giving wings to his flight, as Love did to his Mothers, (for leaving her Husband [b]Ranulph Earle of Chester, she was amorous of, and married Guido a gallant Gentleman, who then fled with her,) they escaped into Angiers. Arthur neither sure of King Philip, nor sure to King Iohn, had now cast himselfe betwixt two Millstones; but (howsoever) Philip ment the grieſe in the end should be his.

(8) The breach betwixt these two great Kings, was the more irreconcileable, by reason of the hatred betwixt King Philip and the Emperour [c]Otho, King Iohns Nephew, whose advancement to the Empire (himselfe perhaps [d]aymingto it) Philip still endeavoured to impeach, [e]not regarding that the Pope (whose power Kings then regarded onely, while it made for their purpoſe) had thundred his Anathema against all his Oppoſers: and Otho in [f]gratitude to King Richard, who [g]procured him the Diadem Imperiall, and in tender regard of his Vncles honour, sent him advise, [h]not to haſten any finall atonement with the French King, for that himselfe would bring him his utmoſt Imperiall aſsiſtance. Notwithstanding, by the Cardinall-Legates affiduous interceding, a Truce was concluded till the [i]Feast of Saint Hillary: at which time, the Kings comming to a Treaty betwixt Guletum and Butavant Castles, [k]it was agreed, that Lewis the Heyre of France [l]should marry King Iohns Neece, Blanch, Daughter of Alphonſus King of Caſtile; that King Iohn should give for Dowry the City and County of Eureux, with sundry Forts in Normandy, and thirty thousand Markes in silver; vowing also not to ayde his Nephew Otho with men or meanes to attaine the Empire: and further, [l]promiſing to leave (if hee dyed without iſſue) unto Lewis, all the Territories hee held in France; all which Articles were [m]formerly engrossed, but finally concluded betwixt Butavant and Guletum (the [n]one King Iohns, the other King Philips Castle) the [n]Octaves of Saint Iohn Baptiſt, when these Counties were actually surrendred to Philip; the Lady Blanch [o]espoused to Lewis his sonne; Duke Arthur (Philips once vowed, but now unvalued charge,) yeelded over, and made [p]Servant, and [q]Homager to King Iohn for his owne Dukedome, whom yet his Vncle was content to leave with King Philip, who had now so left him, and erſt had upheld him, onely as the baite of his owne advantage. If Princes can bee thus unprincely degenerous, what truſt can men repoſe in baſer vaſsals? King Iohn hereupon proved much more fleddfast to Philip, then either Philip was to him, or himselfe to Otho the Emperour, who sending his two Brethren Henry Duke of Saxony, and William (surnamed of [r]Winton) to demand the Counties of [s]Torke and Poyctou, with the Treasure and Iewels which [t]King Richard bequeathed him: King Iohn denyed to yeeld thereunto, [u]onely in regard of his Oath which hee had paſsed to Philip, to yeeld no kind of ayde to the Emperour. And further to teſtifie, (yea further then he ought) his faithfull meaning to preſerve intire this amity with Philip, [x]by his advise hee divorced [y]Hawiſia his wife, as too [z]neere of Blood, by sentence of the Archbishop and Bishops of Burdeaux, Poyctoirs, and Xanton, and by the Archbishops hands espoused Iſabell, a Heiretrice of Ailmar Earle of Angoliſme, a faire yong Lady, but [b]destined to another bed.

(9) This Finall Concord (so [c]called, but not prooving so) with Philip, who now acknowledged Iohn the [d]rightfull Heire of King Richards Crowne, gave him more leaſure, to receive peaceably all [e]Submitties, and bring in forceably all [f]out-ſtanders of those his transmarine Dominions, and after to looke home to the affaires of his Kingdome, from which hee had beene (and wee there following him,) too long absent. Yet in the heate of those forraine imployments, hee on occasions had his recourſes hither to settle his State-affaires, and [g]Crowne-Revenewes; to enact wholeſome [h]lawes for forraine and domeſticke Commerce; to Collect an [i]Ayde for his Neeces great Dowry, and Martiall uſes; which later (being three thillings on every [k]Carrucata,) though his firſt and onely Subsidy since his comming to the Crowne, cauſed much heart-burning; eſpecially by meanes of his[l] owne brother Geoffry Archbishop of Torke (touching whom the King was [m]fore-warned, that hee would bring a Sword, and not Peace into England) who bearing himselfe too bold on his bloud and place, [n]forbad the Collectors of that Ayde in his precincts (though it were [o]granted to the King generally for all England) and alſo being required by the King to attend him into France, to conclude the Peace, and his Neeces eſpouſall, hee very undutifully denyed his ſervice. The King [p]juſtly mooved with those his diſloyalties, cauſed all his Temporalities to bee ſeized on by his Sheriffe; whom therefore Geoffry (adding freſh fuell to the fire) did ſolemnely excommunicate, cauſed the Kings Officers to beare blowes, and interdicted the whole Province of Torke. So partiall and unhiſtoricall is the report of [q]one; (a Stranger by birth, but more ſtrange for bold untruths) who faines the onely incentive of ſuch indignation in the King, was that Prelates reprehenſion of his Rapines on the people. For (to give a further taſte of that Authors [r]vehement fond malice, juſtly ſo taxed) what ancient Iudicious Writers call an [s]Ayde neceſſary for Warres, that hee enſtileth Rapines and Spoiles; where they make Iohn his Brothers Heyre by Will, hee makes Arthur; they ſay he was a[t] valiant man, he faith he was a Coward; where they make him [u]purſuing, and Philip flying, hee chargeth him to have made onely plaints, when hee ſhould have drawne ſwords; where they charge the Peeres for [x]drawing backe from his Warres, hee makes them the onely Haſtings, and Iohn the Hinderer; briefely, if a [y]fire-ſhooting Meteor appeare above, it portends Heavens fury on Iohn; if the [z]watry Element over-flow, it bodes Iohns fury on his Land. But ſurely that part thereof, which fell on Geffrey, it was (you ſee) not undeſerved: notwithſtanding, upon the Kings * returne into England, and Geffreys to his more loyall carriage and ſubmiſſion, his Peace was made, at the very time, and for the more celebrity of Queene Iſabels * Coronation, with whom the King himselfe was * againe crowned at Weſtminſter by Archbiſhop Hubert.

(10) The Pompe of that ſolemnity ended, the King reſolved of ending a long depending controverſie with King William of Scotland, who formerly (before Iohn was proclaimed King) had challenged, as [a]his patrimoniall right, the Counties of Northumberland, and Cumberland, and afterward ſeeing he got but words and delayes, was ready, (King Iohn being then in France) with an hotter and more forceable argument, to winne, what hee could not crave: but being in darke [b]devotion all night at Saint Margarets Hearſe, the ſtill true * Engliſh-hearted Queene perſwaded him by a Dreame, (for certainely it was no other) not to inſeſt England, her native ſoile; who thereupon ſent backe his Army. But now hee commeth with a more friendly traine, upon King Iohns ſending to him, in Honourable [d]Embaſſage, the Earles of Huntingdon and Hereford, King Williams Brother and Nephew, his three Sonnes in Law, Lacy, Veſcy and Ros, with others, to deſire him to give him meeting at [e]Lincolne, where accordingly they both [f]meet with Kingly curteſies; and the next day, King Iohn to auſpicate his Temporall affaires with Spirituall devotions, (and yet to ſhew what hee thought of ſome ſuperſtitious follies of thoſe times) went [g]undantedly into the Cathedrall Church, being much diſſwaded by many, (for Monkiſh impoſtures perſwaded many it was very ominous for a King to enter that, and certaine [h]other places) and there offered a golden Chalice on Saint Iohns Altar, which [i]no King before him durſt doe. Where his Devotions performed the the two Kings (in preſence of * three Archbishops, thirteene Bishops, the King of South-Wales, with a multitude of Engliſh, Scotiſh, French, and Iriſh, Princes and Peeres,) aſcending the toppe of that conſpicuous and high * hill, on the North ſide of the City, did there in a glorious ſolemnity, ſweare amitie and faithfull love, [k]upon the Croſier of Archbiſhop Hubert.

(11) That Spectacle ſo Royall to the beholders, was ſeconded with another, no leſſe Honorable to K. Iohn, (for Humility in ſuch great ones is more glorious then their glory,) when the King having lately left Hugh Bishop of Lincolne (called the Saint, for the opinion of unfained integrity, though [l]blemiſhed with ſome obſtinacies, and ſurcharged with Legends of [m]fained Miracles) at London very ſicke, (where himselfe with gratious care [n]went to viſite him, and both confirmed his Teſtament, and promiſed the like for other Biſhops after,) now hearing he was * dead, and his Corps then bringing into the gates of Lincolne, hee, with all that princely Traine, went forth to meete it; the [o]three Kings (though the Scottiſh was to depart that very day) with their Royall Allyes, carrying the Hearſe on thoſe ſhoulders, accuſtomed to uphold the weight of whole Kingdomes: from whom the Great Peeres received the ſame, and bare it to the Church Porch, whence the three Archbiſhops and Biſhops convaid it to the Quier, and the next day (it there lying the meane time [p]open faced, mitred, and in all Pontificall Ornaments, with Gloves on his hands, and a Ring on his finger) interred it with all ſolemnities anſwerable. Yet heere the King reſted not to give proofe, in ſo great a height, of his lowly minde, and then benigne (how ever afterward averted) to the Clergie; when twelve Abbots of the Ciſteaux Habit (whoſe [q]whole Order had diſpleaſed him, by refuſing to give Aide towards his great payment of thirtie thouſand pounds) [r]came now to Lincolne, and all proſtrate at his feet, craved his gracious favour, for that his Forreſters had driven out (for ſo the King had given command) of his Paſtures and Forreſts all their Caſtle, wherewith themſelves and Chriſt poore were ſuſtained. The King touched with remorſe on ſo venerable a troope of Suppliants, (though ſo great offenders) commanded them to riſe, who were no ſooner up, but the King, inſpired with Divine Grace, fell flat on the ground before them, deſiring pardon; adding, that hee not onely admitted them to his love, and their * beaſts to his Paſtures, (a ſpeciall favour which Kings had granted that Order,) but would alſo build an Abbey for men of their ſort, (if they would deſigne ſome choice ſeat) wherein himſelfe meant to bee enſhrined. Neither did hee promiſe then, more then he performed, nor were thoſe wylie Immiliates regardleſſe of chooſing a delicate plot for the purpoſe, where hee built a goodly Abbey of their Order, deſervedly for the pleaſance of the place; named [s]Beaulin, and of [t]a rich Revenue, and exceſſive Priviledge; continuing long of great renowne, as a Caſtle of refuge inviolable; our Anceſtors thinking it moſt hainous facrilledge, thence to draw any, though willfull Murderers or Traitors: wherein the Founders of ſuch unſanctified [u]Sanctuaries and Temples of Mercy (ſo they called them) throughout this Kingdome, ſeemed rather to take Romulus for their Preſident, then Moſes, who granting favour to caſuall Man-ſlaughters, yet commanded wilfull Murderers to bee drawne from the Altar to the ſlaughter. But this Ciſteaux diſ-order was not alone, either in thoſe ſhamefull indignities, or gainefull attonements. The [x]Benedictines, in Antiquitie above them, in Priviledges equall, ſcorned to be in courage behinde them for affronting their Soveraigne: who claiming the patronage of a * Benefice which the King his Father formerly beſtowed, * they impugned his royall title, lockt the Church doores againſt his Preſentee, (being the Kings neere friend) ſcorned his moſt princely loving letters of requeſt, rejected his often and earneſt meſſages, fenced the Church with armed men againſt the Kings Officers, aſſayled the Kings Sheriffe and his forces, and put them to flight by ſword, mooved the Pope to excommunicate all their oppugners (which touched the King neere) yea, cauſed him ſubmiſſion, he forgave them their offence, gave them that patronage, with ſundry other great gifts and immunities, and ſo became their chiefe Patrone and Protector.

(12) By what degrees, men not onely of ſuch reputed-religious habite, but alſo of the Secular-Clergy, fell afterward more and more from ſuch favours of the King, and hee from theirs, a man that will not purpoſely winke, may eaſily behold, both ſorts ſtanding ſo ſtiffe on their perſons, and their poſſeſſions Exemption from Regall command, that whiles the [a]Pope would have all for any ſuperfluous imployment, the King could get nothing, though his Kingdome were in hazard, as you heard by the diſloyall obſtinacies both of the Archbiſhop of Torke, who denied the King his perſonall attendance, and thoſe Ciſteaux Monkes, whoſe Coffers were thus lockt againſt him. The like pretended Exemptions of their Clergie Prelacies (as well as of their Perſons and Purſes) wrought alſo like offences, both with former Kings, and now with King Iohn, who on the death of Biſhop Hugh, reſolving to conferre by gift, (as his[b] Auncestors did, and [c]himſelfe elſe where lately had) that See, on ſome whom eyther merite or affection had endeared to him, (the rather, becauſe [d]men of thoſe places, in thoſe daies were uſually their Soveraignes boſom-Counſellours) [e]hee was with peremptory affronts withſtood by the Canons there, who very bold on the Popes up-bearing, reckt very ſlenderly their Princes diſpleaſing. It is not unlikely that Archbiſhop Hubert (left Canterbury might bee thought inferiour to Torke in daring boldneſſe,) as being Papall Legate, in ſecret boſtring them had a hand, though cloſely carried in a glove: for that the man, who lately [f]gloryed, that the King was wholle his, now finding hee had not the ſway hee expected, and thought hee deſerved (by obligement of his firſt Agency about the Crowne,) not onely ſtudied to make up that by his Legatine Glory which hee wanted by his Princes countenance, but further, (as [g]one who thinkes hee extolles his vertue, who paints forth his diſloyalty,) hee repented now, more then any thing in all his life, that hee had ſo advanced King Iohn to the Crowne, Cortes, about this time hee ſhewed ſlender reſpect to his Soveraigne, (for as God is in his, ſo are Kings alſo diſhonoured in their Miniſters diſgraces) when being prohibited by Fitz-Peter, the Kings great Iuſticiar and Miniſter (in the Kings abſence) of Regall commaund, [h]from holding a Generall Councell of his Province, (never vſed to bee held, but by Soveraigne permittance) his pleaſure ſcorn'd to take any counter-maund, but from him eſpeciallie, who, in [i]calling his inferiour, by * joynt deſerts towards the King, but his Equall, was now, in neereneſſe and faſtneſſe to the King, become farre his Superiour. But what ſpeake I of confronting a ſubordinate power? did hee ſpare to out-beard his Soveraigne himſelfe? It ſeemes no. For having notice, the Feaſt of the Nativity now approaching, that the King intended, with his Queene, at Guilford to keepe that feaſtivity with great magnificence; he whoſe Pallace ordinarily, for ſplendour, multitude of Attendants, and ſumptuous intertainments dud ſtrive with the kings (as one of his owne [k]Succeſſors avows) thought this a fitting time, to ſhew, both his great ſtate, and little regard of his Princes diſcountenance, by [l]Paralleling to the Kings, his owne ſumptuous preparations, [m]with rich attires, and coſtly gifts for his Attendants at Canterbury. The king (as kings brooke not to bee brawed by Subjects, nor is it wiſedome for for dif-favourites to doe it,) mooved [n] with great indignation, thought the man had too much riches, and too little Discretion (which seldome lodgeth in the braine, where Pride dwels in the Heart,) and therefore to abate somewhat of the one, and learne him more of the other, having first beene in the [o] North parts to gather money for his better vses, hee meant not to lavish it in keeping his Easter, which he chose rather to doe at the cost of Hubert the [p] Rich; and not to spare him, who spared not himselfe, hee there increast that great expence with a greater, of His, and his Queenes solemne [q] crowning againe on Easter day, in the Cathedrall Church; where, in lieu of his expence, Hubert had the formall honour to set on their Crownes, but yet not the grace to sit neere the Kings heart.

(13) Such being the first overtures of heart-burnings betwixt the King and his Clergy, which after by additament of daily fuelling, brast forth into a more fearefull flame; the Lay-Peeres were so farre from labouring to quench it, that they made it the fiercer: for these Bellowes of Rebellion, which before their Homages did condition for their Rights and Liberties, were not all this while sparing of their breath, to inflame other Nobles with the like heat of fury. Hell it selfe (whence all Rebellions spring, and thither fall againe) could not wish a fitter occasion to broach and actuate such a mischiefe. For the [r] Poyctovins with King Philips connivence, (taking advantage of King Iohns absence, and Springs approach) were up in Armes, dislodged his Garrisons, beleagured his Castles; tidings whereof recalled King Iohns thoughts from his Domesticke Pomps, to his Transmarine Affaires; for the present, he gave Command to his [*] Seneschall of Normandie, to attempt on them some Counter-services, to withdraw the Seigers, (whom also King Philip, [s] hearing King Iohn was in person comming over with an Army, forthwith recalled,) and published his generall [t] summons, that his Earles, Barons, and all that held by Knights-service, should bee ready at Portsmouth with Horse and Armes, on Whitsunday then instant, to crosse the Seas with him. The tumultuous Earles, knowing that the King then needed their present helps, and therefore might bee forced to any Capitulations, in a Conventicle held at Leycester, by a [u] joynt-conspiring, sent an audacious message to the King, that they would not attend him, unlesse hee would first restore their rights; with which disloyall refusall, the King justly incensed; [*] by some mens too precipitate advice, (considering the hazardous time, which needed a salve rather then a corrasive) seized into his hands some of their Castles, to prevent their further attempts, of some he tooke their children for pledges, and others, whose Purses were likely to doe him truer service then their owners, hee [x] released upon payments. At which prefixed time, hee dispatched before him William Earle of Pembrooke, and Lord Roger Lacie with [y] two Regiments to joyne with Normandies Seneshall. What a [z] grave Author judged of those bold Barons heere, and other turbulent Great-ones then abroad, may bee gathered by this; that as soone as mention fell in of those refractary Lords, hee straight fell off, to shew how in that very yeere, Pope Innocent then raigning in Rome, Saffadine the Turke in Ierusalem, [*] Alexander the [a] Fatricide in Constantinople, (for so he yoketh these three together, with some others following them;) the great Doctors preached, that then was the time ([b] prophesied by Saint Iohn) when after a thousand yeeres restraint, the Divell was let loose, to seduce the Nations like a [b] Serpent, and trouble the world like a [c] Dragon: which how true it proved in this our Nation and little-World (in whose Tragedy the Divell also, amongst the [d] first named Actors, comes now to play his part,) the Diabolicall ensuing practises, both of fraud and fury, will hereafter demonstrate.

(14) The King, though thus disfurnished of his Principall home-helpes, yet [e] entrusting the custodie of the land, especially those Southerne parts, with [f] Hubert de Burgo Lord Chamberlaine, and receiving to [g] full reconcilemnt (for more security of the Northerne,) Geffrey Archbishop of Yorke, whose [h] Churches large Priviledges then hee ratified; without delay at Portesmouth hee put forth to Sea, with Isabel his Queene, though in sundry Bottomes, and with differing successe, [i] sudden gust dif-parting the Fleete, whereby the King was driven backe on the Isle of Wight, but the Queene [k] with much adoe, arrived safe in Normandy, whom soon after the King followed thither. Vpon whose arrivall, the French King [l] perceiving the power of his adversary, presently condescended to another personall (but very [m] private) Parley; wherein each gave and received such reciprocall satisfaction in their desires, that thereupon not onely the former bonds of Amity seemed to continue strong, but were also more strengthened with a new knot of [n] Association, wherein sundry great Lords of eyther side were by indentment of Writing, made sureties to the counter-part, with condition, that whether of the two Kings did first violate the Covenants, all his cautionary Lords should bee released of their allegiance to him, and become Leige men and Assistants to the Prince offended. And that the world might take more notice of their combined loves, they [o] both agreed to contribute to the Holie-Warres, (whith now began to bee on foote) the fortieth part of the whole Revenewes of their Crownes; sending their [p] letters abroad into their Dominions, to encourage all their Nobles and people, by their examples to doe the like. With which intercourles, & other complements, three daies being spent betwixt them, King Philip, the deeper to skrue himselfe into King Iohns good opinion, (the [*] surest way to over-reach another in any commerce) by intreaty obtained his company, first to S. Denises Pallace, [q] where hee entred with a pompous Procession of the Clergy, and lodged with royall entertainment by the King, and the next day, to Paris, where hee was received with [r] very rich Presents of the City, and great applause of all sorts, to see so noble arguments of affection betwixt two so great Princes, lately so mortall enemies: where the French King betaking himselfe to a more private mansion, left his owne Pallace to accommodate and honour *England*s King. After fome dayes there bestowed in princely delights and entertainements, King Iohn conducted forth of the City by King Philip, and parting with mutuall attestations of love never to bee parted, tooke his journey towards Normandy, in full hope to enjoy thence forward the contentment of quiet to himselfe, and peace to his Dominions: but those windy hopes soone changed with his change of the aire.

(15) For whiles at Chinon he was royally entertaining Queene Berengaria his [s] sister (whom [b] hee there also bounteously satisfied, in performing the Ioyncture promised her by King Richard, giving her the Citie and Signiory of Baion, two Castles, and their Demaines in Anion, with a thousand Markes yeerely for tearme of life,) and at [c] Argenton in Normandy, where he kept his Christmas, was solacing himselfe with his faire Queene Isabel; the Earle of March, Hugh, surnamed Le-Brun, a [d] Peere of great power and alliance, to whom Isabel was first promised (though for her [e] unripe yeeres hee never bedded her) enflamed with love of her, who was now thought worthy to bee a Queenes [f] drew on other Poictovine Nobles, to thinke that hee was unworthy to bee a King, who wrongfully had taken her [g] from him, and would, if not prevented, doe the like in time with them. So, [h] once againe young Arthur, whose former hopes were all cold, is re-kindled by these fire-brands, and set up by their malice, to supplant his Uncle, but by Heavens Decree, to overthrow himselfe; how soever the [i] Britaines, then fascinated with his ominous Name, dreamed that the Merlin to have beene ment of him, v that he ſhould be crowned with the head of a Lyon, ſhould cut out the tongues of Buls, and lay-yron chaines on the backes of roaring Beaſts (and indeed hee z chained them hand and foote, and ſo convayed them away in Carts, a kind of riding till then unuſuall with them,) ſo King Iohn himſelfe, a duely acknowledging the greatneſſe of Gods goodneſſe therein, ſent his Letters to all his Barons wherefoever (thereby to encourage the loyall, and hold in awe the tumultuous) inciting them to render all praiſe unto God for ſo admirable a worke, and ſo gracious aſſiſtance: and ſoone after b he diſperſed his Nobleſt Captives into ſundry Caſtles in Normandy and England; Arthurs ſiſter Eleanor, called the Damoſell of Britaine, being c committed to Briſtow Caſtle, where ſhe d long lived with e very honourable uſage. And though the Kings diſpleaſure was juſtly incenſed againſt her brother Arthur, for ſo frequent wavering in his faith, yet meaning to ſtifle all meanes of winning him who had thus loſt himſelfe, f hee ſent for him (being then at Falaiſe in the cuſtodie of g Hubert L. Chamberlaine) and entreated him very gently, promiſing him all honourable reſpects, if (as yet) he would reſolve to forſake the French Kings amity, and frame both his minde for hearty love, and his actions for peaceable obſervance towards him, his Vncle and Liege-Lord. Which exceeding clemency, the ill-adviſed yong Gentleman (for what wiſedome is it to ſhew pride where wee need mercy, and to give threats beyond poſſibility of performance?) h requited onely with arrogant and undutifull language, furiouſly upbraiding the King with violent and fraudulent detention of the Engliſh Crowne, which menacingly hee there required of him, and all other King Richards Countries, as his law full inheritance, affirming with an Oath, that unlaw full ſhee did forthwith reſtore them, he ſhould not long leſſe he did forthwith reſtore them, he ſhould not long liveinpeace. With which incorrigible pertinacy the king provoked, as ſeeing no place left to better hopes, i committed him to ſtricter cuſtody k under Robert de Veypont, in the Caſtle of Roan.

(19) The Britaines fury and conſpiracies, which King Iohn hoped to abate by this their Princes durance, l were thereby much more augmented; like Serpents, moſt ſtrugling with their traines, when they feele their head in preſſure. Which moved the King, who was now returned into England, (and in triumph of his late victory, m wore his Crowne againe at Canterbury, at the coſt of his former hoſte) to take adviſe of his Councell touching his troubled affaires, whoſe ſentence was (if wee will credite the ° reporter) that Arthur ſhould looſe his eyes. But the eſcaping of ſuch tortures, is by p ſome aſcribed to the commiſeration of Lord Hubert; by q others, to the mediation of Queene Eleanor, who interceded with her Son, for her Grand-child, as long as ſhe lived, which was not long; Deathes unpartiall hand (and r griefe of heart, ſome ſay) laying that great and prudent Queene, (the wife of * two mighty Kings, and mother of * three) where Princes and Peſants are all equals. Her Nephew much behind her in age, ſoon over-tooke her (if not ſ out-went her) in deſtiny; whoſe death divulged on King Iohns returne from England; gave his maligners freſh coloured occaſion; both to moleſt his quiet, and to diſtaine his eſtimation, as if he had not onely beene the Cauſer, but alſo the executor of it with his owne hands.

(20) As the Tongues of Paraſites are no true ſcales to weigh the worth and vertues of Great men; ſo neither ought we to judge of their (or any mans) blemiſhes, by the deforming pencils of Envy or Rancor; with one of which, no eminency, either of place or of vertue, was ever unattended. And that this bloudy aſperſion on the King, came from no other fountaine but malignity; ſuch as then lived, and might therefore beſt know the truth, and were alſo (as Monkes generally were) his moſt bitter Taxers, and therefore farre from ſalving his infamy with partiall falſehood, can beſt witneſſe. It was (ſaith v one) by certaine perſons avowed, that Arthur attempting to eſcape ſecretly out of hold, was by caſualty drowned in the River Seyne (on which the Caſtle of Roan is ſeated;) and yet the Frenchmen, the Kings mortall enemies (and therefore plenary credit not to bee given them) give it out, that he was murthered by the kings command, yea, and by his owne hands: thus by the malice of ſlanderers, Englands King became not a little defamed. With whom other the approveſt Authors accord (though differing in the * manner of his death) that this imputation ſprang onely from the * French emulation; as ſince it hath beene kept on foot, onely by y French, or Italianate ſpirits, * one of which hath not bluſhed to charge King Iohn with murthering of his owne Brother King Richard, and a another with killing Arthurs ſiſter, who yet outlived him 24. yeares; ſo ſhamelеſly will the Penne blurre the truth of Actions, where it is once dipped in gall againſt the perſon. But ſharper ſhowers then of Tongues (which being undeſerved, are to be unregarded) were ſequels of b Arthurs death: it ſeeming to give new life to King Iohns troubles, and King Philips hatred, which yet once againe muſt goe masked under the roabe of Iuſtice. For Philip cites Iohn, as Duke of Normandy, to appeare at a ſet day, to be tried upon point of c Treaſon by his Peeres; Conſtance Arthurs mother (well brooking her name for her immutable hatred to King Iohn) is made the d plaintiffe, requiring Iuſtice of Philip, as both their Soveraigne; King Iohn not appearing, is condemned e of atraiterous outrage, for that careleſſe of his Oath made to the French, he though an Vncle, had murthered his elder brothers ſon, being an Homager to the French, and that within the French Territories; without any legall courſe, nor by cognizance of thoſe to whom it appertained; whereupon he is adjudged to be held an enemy to the French State, to forfeit all his Signiories which by Homage he held of the French, and thoſe to revert to the Crowne of France, and a re-entry to be made by force of Armes, if any deny poſſeſſion. Thus now the ſecond time, by a ſolemne, but moſt unjuſt ſentence, (as the * pope himſelfe did ſtrongly and truly plead againſt Philips unprincely and unjuſt proceedings,) the King and Peeres of France diſherited and condemned King Iohn, though abſent, unheard, neither confeſſing, nor convicted of the Action; albeit at that time f he ſent them his royall promiſe to come, (if they would give him publike faith and ſafe conduct for his comming and * returning) and anſwere at Paris touching the death of Arthur, though he was his Leiege-man, had ſworne him fealty, had violated the ſame, had raiſed a rebellion, and was taken in battle. Vpon which grounds, if King Iohn had cauſed the pretended execution on ſo capitall a Compoſtor both againſt his Life and Crowne; and one who had cauſed ſo much bloud-ſhed of his people, and more would if he had eſcaped; in g which caſes Princes are and ought to be very jealous; what underſtanding Statiſt can juſtly condemne him, or juſtifie the French injuſtice? Eſpecially it being queſtionable, and even then h much debated, Whether the Peeres of France were competent Iudges on a King annoynted, and ſo their ſuperiour, the king of England and Duke of Normandy being but one perſon, & major dignitas abſorbet minorem, the greater dignity was to ſwallow up the leſſe. But when the will of a Ruler, is a rule, or ruled-caſe to his Iudges, no other could be expected then by theſe Peeres was performed: eſpecially themſelves being ſharers in the booty of his Lands.

(21) Neither did they here ſtay; but (as in moſt States, the Actes and Decrees advantageous to the Princes, are carefully purſued, though others ſeldome or coldly executed) that heady ſentence was i ſeconded with as haſty force, on Philips part, and on Iohns (if ſome Authors ſay true) as much neglected. It is no rare thing to ſee Princes (becauſe on their ſafety depends the State of their Kingdomes) often ſuſpicious of dangers where there is no cauſe; but it

* Robert de Lacie, we ſhould be guilty of high offence againſt true honour, who having received of his Prince the cuſtody of the goodly Caſtle Rocke-Andely (* which was builded alſo by King Richard) f did bravely beare off the ſiege and power of King Philip and his hoaſt almoſt a whole yeare; in which ſpace, though by their continuall batteries and undermings; g a great part of the walles were flatted, yet they could never make entry upon him, but were repulſed with ſlaughter, till his proviſion of victuals being now ſpent to the laſt houre, hee called his "Souldiers together, encouraging them, after ſo long "proofe of their Manhood, not to faint now in the laſt "Act; but to conſider, that though it were better for "them to die by famine, then to live with reproch of falſe "or faint-heartedneſſe, yet it is more noble for ſouldi-"ers to die fighting, then famiſhing, and together "with their owne lives, to ſacrifice to their Countries "honour the bloud of their ſlaughtered enemies. Whereupon fiercely * ſallying forth with his Reſolutes, after a bloudy ſhambles made in the middeſt of his beleaguers, he was by multitude over-borne and taken, but h in regard of his exemplary faith and proweſſe, in maintaining his charge, by King Philips expreſſe command, (a ſecond princely and prudent fact, to diſcipline his ſubjects by thus entreating his foes,) he was honourably uſed, and * without reſtraint of a priſoner.

(23) But as the fact of this Peere was peereleſſe, ſo was this Clemency in that King, but rare and unaccuſtomed towards ſuch Chiefetaines as ſtifly out-ſtood his aſſaults; i ſome of whom formerly hee had cauſed to be deſpitefully dragged at horſe-heeles, for the terrour of others. Of which indignities, and other irkeſome extremities, (the inſeparable companions of warre) indured by his people, when King Iohn had notice by Meſſengers ſent unto him for reliefe and aides, no marvell is it, if k his griefe were above beleefe or meaſure, finding himſelfe utterly deſtitute of meanes to relieve their wants, or his owne loſſes; albeit for the time hee bare it out with a manly ſhew, ſaying, l that theſe were but the French pilferings, of which hee meant in due time to exact an account with intereſt. For what elſe could hee doe? The Normans (to omit thoſe others in open Rebellion) m either wholly fallen away from him, or but diſſemblingly adhering to him; his n Barons from home, detaining him at his need; his ° Nobles there about him, being under pretext of a ſpeedy comming againe, returned into England: by which meanes the King p was left very diſpeopled, having onely a ſmall traine, which could in ſo great a need do him but very ſmall ſervice: but that theſe important and unportable matters q did no whit move him, nor could retrive him r from the boſome of his too deare Enchantreſſe, (which occaſioned ſome to thinke him infatuated with * forcery) is a thing paſt capability of beleefe.

(24) The King thus diſſurniſhed of all helps, Innocentius, the ſtirring Biſhop of Rome, made faire ſhew to ſalve theſe temporall wounds with a ſpirituall playſter; ſ which doubleſſe made King Iohn more ſecure then ſtood with his good: for, as in ſo great diſtreſſes, there was no forraine Prince fitter for the King to combine with, then Otho the Emperour, his owne Nephew, and Philips profeſſed enemy: ſo the Pope on the one ſide beginning to be jealous of Otho's greatneſſe, miſtruſted the concurrence of two ſuch great friends, and therefore undertooke to Vmpeere the debates betwixt thoſe two great Enemies: and King Iohn on the other ſide, willing to make uſe of the Popes favour, durſt not yet comply with any, whom his Sanctitude any whit diſavoured. His Legates for this buſineſſe, were the Abbots t of Caſmer and Troiſons: his motive, that v thoſe diſſentions of Chriſtendome weakned the wars againſt Turkey: his colour, x that this contention being a matter of faith-breach (as of Leagues, Oath and Covenants; the cognizance thereof did properly appertaine to his ſacred Iudicature; whereof he made ſo little doubt, as that the y very letter then sent to the French Peeres, it is to this day regiſtred for a a pontificiall decree: and this audacious Law then by Innocentius firſt brought to the world for current.* That whenſoever one Prince is delinquent againſt another, the correction thereof appertaines to the Pope. Their Commiſſion was, z to call the Biſhops and Princes of both Kingdomes, for ſetling a Peace; to inhibite all hoſtility; to reſerve the further triall of the Right to the Pope, as b Soveraigne Iudge; c to enjoyne that all Religious places by the warres deſtroyed, or impoveriſhed, ſhould bee reſtored to their due State; d if either of the Kings ſhould be refractary, his whole Kingdome preſently to be put under Interdict. Philip, albeit the Pope was then offended with him upon other termes, (for that hee e impoſed towards his warres a taxe of certaine Tenthes upon his Clergie, (againſt the Popes will) alleadging it was neceſſary that out of their private abundance, they ſhould beare a charge in the common preſervation,) yet knowing the Pope had neede of his friendſhip about ſetling the Empire, hee meant ſo long to ſide with the Popes Authority, as the Pope would ſtand with his commoditie, and repining to have ſo faire a prey taken out of his talents, made bold f to deſpiſe both the commands and the curſes: yet this hee did in ſmoother faſhion then hee had done once before, when he rigorouſly puniſhed all the g Biſhops and Prelates whom for conſenting to ſuch a Papall cenſure, he turned out of their Sees and dignities; for now, hee h appealed from the ſentence for a faſhions ſake, i but yet violently proceeded with his warres, and k did ſwim with the full current of his victories: The waves whereof ſo faſt ſurrounded King Iohn, that * fearing alſo further treaſon of his owne men, hethought good, till ſome better daies would thine upon him, (eſpecially winter ſeaſon, enforcing ſurceaſe of warres) to abandon the place of his injurious foes, to expoſtulate in England, with his perfidious friends.

The Pope interpoſeth betwixt the two Kings.

The Popes Nuncio-tes ſee Caſmil & Trium. Fontium Tyndal. v Polydor. & Paul. Æmil.

(25) For that was the firſt worke hee did, after his arrivall, (l which was at Portſmouth on Saint Nicholas day in December) when m laying to the charge of his Earles and Barons, that in his warres they ſuffered him to be deſtitute of requiſite aides, and n had left him in the middeſt of his enemies, by which their defaults, hee was thus diſpoiled of his Caſtles and Countries; thereupon, by o adviſe of Hubert Lord Archbiſhop, and Lord Fitz-Peter, Chiefe Iuſticiar, (who knew theſe were no p forged Cavillations) he put them and other delinquents to their Fines, (for his warres made him deſire their money more then their lives) wherein theſe two great Counſellors were q overſeers for the receipts, the one for the Clergie, the other for the Laity, of both whom they received no leſſe ſums of curſes, then of Coyne. The like repining among the people, (who judge of the goodneſſe of a King onely by ſparing their purſes) enſued on the grant of a large Subſidie (two Marks and halfe of every Knights Fee) in a Parliament * preſently after held at Oxford, where the King and Peeres convening about redreſſe of thoſe remedileſſe miſchiefes, the iſſue (as ſeemeth) was, that Ambaſſages ſhould be addreſſed into France, two Prelates, Canterbury and Norwich, with two Earles Marſhall and Leiceſter, to treate from the Body of the Kingdome, touching thoſe Provinces, which being incorporated with Englands Soveraignety, could not without apparent injuſtice be abſtracted from a Nations common intereſt, upon coloured pretences againſt any particular. Philip, having r upon King Iohns departure thence uſed his whole Forces and Wits, to weary, or to win divers other Cities and Forts; which had till then ſtood faithfull (for which purpoſe hee alſo imployed ſundry s inſtruments, themſelves firſt corrupted, that they might corrupt others to defection, with great rewards and greater promiſes,) hee meant not now to re-commence Queſtions of Right, having already neere decided that point by the point of his ſword: yet becauſe hee was to deale with a mighty Nation, hee would not abruptly refuſe to capitulate, and yet againe by propoſall of v conditions exceeding either reaſon or poſſibility, hee dammed up all paſſages to peaceable agreement: x his demaunds were, to have either Arthur, whom hee knew to be dead, re-delivered into his hands alive, or elſe, his Siſter Eleanor in marriage, with all thoſe Countries in that Continent: but thoſe Stateſmen eaſily perceived that Philips heart, aimed farther then his tongue, and that with Eleanor hee hoped to purchaſe a higher dowry, even the Engliſh Diadem, whoſe claime glided downe from the brother to her; which perchance was the ſecret ground of his Oath, that he would never linne to purſue that quarrell, till hee had deprived King Iohn of his Kingdome.

(26) This Ambaſſage was not onely thus iſſueleſſe, but produced alſo effects tending to further irritation: for this ſeemeth to bee the time when a Philip ſent a braving Champion, to juſtifie by Duel before the States here in England, what his Maſter had done in France againſt their King in open warre; and b though it was not deemed expedient to jeopard a Title of ſuch weight on the Armes and Fortune of one man; yet it was reſolved the Challenger ſhould not paſſe unanſwered, whereto none was held fitter then Iohn Curey Earle of Vlſter, for c rebellion and denying his homage to the King, condemned to perpetuall impriſonment in the Tower) a man of Giant-like limme and ſtrength, and of ſome diſpoſitions not diſpicable, if they had not been ſavaged with a too careleſſe rudeneſſe: which appeared not onely in his d wilde ſpeeches, touching the Kings miſ-uſage of his nephew Arthur (which e ſome by errour alledge as cauſe of his indurant durance,) but even now, when the King demaunding him, whether hee would combat in his quarrell? f No, (quoth he) not in thy quarrell, nor for thy ſake, but for the kingdomes right I will fight to the death. Againſt which day, whiles he repaired with large dyet his impaired limmes and ſinewes, the French-man hearing of his exceſſive feeding, and ſtrength anſwerable therero, thereby fearing he had beene ſome Monſter of Nature, rather then a man, hee ſecretly ſneaked away g into Spaine, aſhamed to ſhew his face in France againe. Curey finding the King gracious, was hereupon releaſed, and h is ſaid (if this bee not to digreſſe) to have croſſed the ſeas for Ireland fifteene times, and evermore beaten backe to the ſhore, i acknowledged himſelfe herein juſtly puniſhed of God, never againe to ſee his owne ſeate, for diſplacing God out of his, when he converted the Church of Prebendaries in Doan, conſecrated to the bleſſed Trinity, into an Abbey of Monkes, to the honour and name of Saint Patricke, k whoſe image was erected in a ſtately ſeate, wherein before the Trinity was deportracted, which was thence rejected into a private Chappell. The l Iriſh relate, that the two Kings being afterward together (beſike when they made the next truce in France) King Philip hearing Curey to bee in the Engliſh Campe, intreated to ſee ſome experience of his ſo much feared and reported ſtrength: where a Helmet of excellent proofe full fareed with Male, being ſet upon a great woodenblocke, the Earle liſting his truſty Skeyne, firſt louring round about him with a dreadfull aſpect, cleft ſo deepe quite through the ſteely reſiſtance, into the knotty wood, that none there could draw it out but himſelfe, who did it with eaſe, and being asked by the Kings, why hee frowned ſo irefully before the ſtroke; he told them, that he then intended if he had failed of his blow, to have killed them all, both kings and others the lookers on.

(27) But what Philip could not in England by one Champion, he accompliſhed in Normandy by many, where having a m mighty power attending him from city to city, yet hee thought faire words would be for himſelfe both cheaper and ſafer, and with the Provincials more forceable then force it ſelfe; eſpecially, where where ſuch troupes of armed Orators were at hand, and where golden Preparatives had made way with the chiefeſt. Philip told them, n their late Lord had o quite forſaken them, and that therefore himſelfe, "as their ſupreame Leige came to provide that his "owne Countries might be indemnified, deſiring "them lovingly to admit and embrace him as their "Lord, ſith now they had no other to protect "them from skathe; but menacing withall, that p if they forced him to uſe force, they ſhould die "no other death then hanging, or to bee ſtead a-"live: with which fawnings and feares, though many well munifyed places were fetched off without any reſiſtance, q their Captaines violating their faith to curry favour with the French; yet Roan, the r place ever honoured for fidelity to the Engliſh Crowne (and q therefore worthily ſelected by King Richard to be the Shrine of his Leonine Heart,) was better fortified both in affection and munition, then to wave upon parties. Which neglect incenſed Philip to turne his Oratory into Battery, (it being the chiefeſt Citie, and therefore of greateſt conſequence for conſummating his victories) which he continued in a moſt fierce and s horrid manner of ſiege, the ſpace of two moneths; but finding it to be with ſmall advantage, he fell againe to * golden Eloquence, attracting ſome in ſpeciall with preſent pay, and all in generall with t promiſes of future injoying all their wonted lawes, and liberties, without impairement of any their commodities whatſoever: adviſing them u not to reject thoſe profered conditions, which ere long they would gladly get, when they ſhould not be granted. The Roaniſh, ſeeing their dangers, feeling their wants, fearing their ruines, yet deſired reſpite till King Iohn might know their State: who finding himſelfe at home as ill be-ſted as theirs abroad, his Barons v refuſing to follow the warres, returned them anſwere, hee could not preſently releeve them. Whereupon the z Great men, who could ſway the multitude with cheaper reaſons, then Philips open hand had ſwayed with them, perſwaded them to weigh, that in truth they were all originally French-men, though now called Normans, of that nobleſt and richeſt part of all France, and the French King being Supreame Lord thereof, there was no cauſe at all of continuing this new hoſtility, but very many of renewing that antique amitie.

(28) The y Head, yea, and Heart of all Normandy thus fainting; who can expect that theſe few inferiour members, yet untainted, ſhould ſo continue long? neither did they. So as eft ſoones all that Dukedome, one of the goodlieſt gemmes in the Engliſh Diademe, and diſbranched from Fraunce ſince the yeare eight hundred eighty five, was againe rent away, ingloriouſly for them who loſt it, injuſtly by them who got it, but perfidiouſly by ſuch as ſhould, and might haue kept it. For whatſoever neceſſitie then, or malice ſince hath laid on the King; this Eulogie, and memoriall thereof, written by a unpartiall pennes, will ſtand indelible on his Subjects, A Rege Anglia, Normannia fraudibus ſuorum alienata, Englands King loſt Normandie by treacherie of his owne people. And no leſſe treacherouſly deale Philip with them, when hee had caught them with the trap of his gloſing proffers (as ſuch Princes more uſually then princely, ſquare their promiſes to others liking, their performances to their owne) cauſing without delay their cities goodly walls b to be utterly demoliſhed, and giving ſtrict charge that they ſhould never be built up againe. The other neighbouring Countries, Main, Turraine, Poictou, who were all fore-runners in the Rebellion, would not be now behinde in the finall revolt; Angiers in this more happy, that ſhe fell away by others fallhood, not her own, when ſtanding on her guard, c William de Rupibus clad his choyſe Souldiers upon their Armour, in the habite and other furniture of market-men, who ſo getting acceſſe unto the City-gates, made eaſie entrance for a greater hoaſt; which ſoone after became abſolute Lords of all Anjou.

(29) Wofull experience had now taught King Iohn a Leſſon fit to be learned of all Princes, whom the fawning World enſtileth moſt Mighty, that this their might is not onely violable to the checke and diſpoſe of that Higheſt all-ruling power, who unthrones them at his will; but even depends of the waving humours, and wils of thoſe * inferiour Vaſſals, of whom they thinke themſelves un-reſiſtable Commanders. But King Iohn was not unſenſible either of his forraine diſhonours (though as d often as hee endevoured to redeeme it, by levying any Army, ſutable to ſo great a deſigne; ſo often was hee croſſed by his owne Nobles) or of thoſe his Domeſticke affronts; which notwithſtanding, by counſell and aſſiſtance of his better affected, and truer hearted friends and ſubjects, at length e he gathered a Royall Hoaſt and a mighitie Navie, (therein 14000. Mariners f ſome ſay) with full reſolve to revenge his wrongs, and repaire his loſſes. Which great enterprize, managed with unmoveable determination, (for now with full ſayles, and fuller hearts at Portſmouth they were ready to embarke) brought to the Kings further knowledge, and to the worlds, who had beene all this while the ſecret undermin-ers of his fortunes, and hinderers of his imployments. For Hubert g the Archbiſhop, and Papal Legate, with many others, (amongſt whom, h ſome find William Marſhall Earle of Pembroke numbred) thither comes unto the King, and ſtatly i forbids him to proceede in the voyage. Some k Writers have laboured to conjecture the true cauſe and reaſons of this audacious Prohibition; but if wee conſider on the one ſide the Popes uſe of Philips Forces, to counter-ballance if needs were Othos greatneſſe; on the other, the intereſt which both the Pope * and Philip had in Huberts affection: we may without Huberts l divining Spirit pry into the myſtery of his ſecret workings, as an Archbiſhop, and now open command as a Legate, to hinder King Iohn, for feare of hindring King Philip.

(30) But whatſoever was the reaſon, Hubert was the Inſtrument that ſo reſolute projects, ſo m inexſtimable charges, ſo neceſſary an action fell ſodainely to the ground, whereby, beſides the leſſe-miſchiefe which therewith fell on the King, many freſh grudgings accrewed unto him, for ſuffering himſelfe to be thus violently repulſed from ſo behovefull a purpoſe. The Archbiſhop and Marſhall, as principals, were rewarded with the n curſes of the diſmiſſed multitudes, as the juſt fee for their unjuſt counſell; and the King himſelfe was ſo little pleaſed with ſo unexpected a countermand, that albeit at the preſent, (either awed with the authority of the Papall Legate, or with the weight of his colowred motives, or with hazard which hee might leave behinde him) hee durſt not withſtand it; yet o the very next day, checking himſelfe for over-prizing the command of any man, above the value of his kingly honour and ſtate, hee p reſolved to recollect his diſparkeled troupes, and to * put forth to Sea. To which end, taking order for his Nobles to follow, they gave him leave q with a ſmall company to wave up and downe two daies, in expectance of their attendance, till ſeeing them more obſequious to Huberts command then his, (r the Archbiſhop alſo ſending his Inhibition after them on the Sea) hee was forced to come againe to land. How a King of any royall ſparkle, could brooke ſuch Sea and Land Tempeſts, without diſgorging his Kingdome of the cauſers thereof, I cannot conceive; and yet ſo unevenly doth ſome mens judgement poyſe, whoſe affection guides the Beame, that this defeating of the Kings weighticeſt affaires, is cenſured as s too light to deſerve the puniſhment which inſued, when the King put many of the Earles, Barons, Knights, yea and Clergy-men, to a grievous pecuniary redemption for thus refuſing to follow him for recovery of his Inheritance.

might well haue beene exempted from this iudgement by his passage to a higher,* dying(if some erre not) the very same weeke, either of [u] griefe, or of a [x] fever, which killed him in foure dayes: but the king forthwith in person at Canterbury seized vpon all his wealth and possessions, shewing himselfe [z] right ioyfull, that now he was rid of him, whom men suspected of too familiar practising with the French King, and saying, [a] he was never a King till now, by reason of Huberts too much presumptuous daring to crosse his royall resolutions as late he did. But this ioy and hope of happier dayes, was soone choaked and buried in the same Tombe with Hubert; out of whose ashes sprang vp a root yeelding more, and more bitter fruits, then king Iohn had as yet tasted, by how much more lamentable are the wounds which are in the bowels and heart of a State, then those which onely light on the skirts or more remote members. The first seeds of which fast-growing mischiefes, were to the eye, (as are the beginnings of all Kingdomes ruine) very small and contemptible, and the Sowers of little better regard, being but Cloistered Monks, who craftily factious to aduance a priuate friend, (which once mounted into Huberts Chaire, might be-friend them againe,) they gaue a deadly blow, both to themselues, their Soueraigne, and the State in generall. The * yonger heads among them (whose vnexperiences makes them in acts of Societies more forward and daring) hauing feerest notice of Huberts death, [c] meant by a slight (whereunto they doubted not to finde the Popes furtherance) to defeate their Soueraignes interest in that Election, (and perchance in all other, euer after) of a Primate for the See of Canterbury, the most important place of his Kingdome. * Reginald, the Sub-prior of their Covent, One (as you shall heare) fitter for their projects, then for that place, was the man they chose, and that at [d] midnight; when singing Te Deum, they lifted him first vpon the High Altar, and after into the Metropolitan Chaire. They ought to haue first obtained the Kings assent, and leaue to elect, and therefore to preuent both [e] his interposing and displeasure, till it were too late for him to redresse the wrong; the same night they caused their Elect to enter * caution by oath, neuer to carry himselfe as Archbishop, nor to make it knowne to any man liuing, till hee had further speciall warrant from them, vpon proofe of the successe it might finde at Rome, whither forthwith they sent him for his dispatch.

(31) Reginald taking Flaunders in his way, was both so [f] proud, [g] periurious, and [h] misjudgent, (the vertues of their most choyse man) that he could neuer conceale the purpose of his journey, and boast of his dignity from any mans Eares, nor from their eyes, the Conuentuall letters ratifying the same. Whereof when the Covent had notice, vehemently intended against him who had thus diuulged their secret, and providently casting how to evade the Kings offence, [i] out of hand they despeeded certaine of their Crue, to crave both [k] pardon of their fact, and licence for choyse of some worthier Primate. There was then in high grace and imployment about the King, Iohn Gray Bishop of Norwich, [a] man of great wisedome, learning and integrity, [l] qualities truely desiring that high place) whom the King (very sensible still of the contrary qualities, & turbulent affronts which he endured in Hubert) much desired to aduance, commending him, as one [m] most deare vnto him, and of his secretest Counsels (of [n] which, some say, hee was President) most behoouefull for the Common-wealth; for Himselfe, and them: which message from the King faithfully delivered, [o] all of them glad thus to redeeme the fauour which they had hazarded, with vnanimous consent elected him; and sending for him from Yorke (where he was in the Kings affaires) the [p] King himselfe graced his entrance into Canterbury with his presence in great pompe; and the next day, the King with a multitude of People assembling in the Metropolitane Church, the Prior did there publish his Election solemnely, and in due forme performed; where the Monkes carrying him with Te Deum to the high Altar, did forthwith enthronize him in the Chaire of his Primacie; The King there in presence of them all, giuing him actuall possession of his Temporalities. This loving correspondence betwixt the King and his Clergie, gaue great hope of more blissfull fortunes hencefor-ward vnto them both; but the Infernall Author of debate, and his chiefe Agent, tooke a hint hereby to intrude a Tyranny both vpon Clergie, King and all.

(32) Little thought false Reynor, what was doing at Canterbury, whiles hee was trotting to Rome; whither when he came, and shewed his letters of Ratification to his Holinesse and his Cardinals, [q] hee received this short answere, that it was a businesse which asked mature deliberation and better informations; the Pope soone finding, that the Sub-prior was too sleight an instrument for him to worke with, and for King Iohn to be wrought with, and therefore bethought him of some fitter hammer for so hard an Anvile. But sundry stops were in the way, which wisely and by degrees were to be removed. The first was, (which Reginald in likelihood had imparted to hasten his owne dispatch) that the Bishops of the Province claimed a ioynt interest with the Monkes, in choyse of their Primate: a point which could no way suite with the Popes aduantage, because Bishops were generally much obliged to their Soueraignes, and so likely still to Elect a Royalist, whereas Cloystermen, professing ignorance of worldly affaires, and obedience to one Superiour, might more facilly be swayed to bend as the Pope would bow them, in preferring his Creatures. Which was the Motive (we may suppose) of the Popes * Letters, soone after sent to the Suffragane Bishops, exhorting them by [r] sacred example, and precept of filiall obedience, to desist from vexing, like vndutifull sonnes, their Mother-Church with such vndue chalenges. The Bishops notwithstanding, who knew themselues in sacred writ to be stiled fathers, would not thus acknowledge the Monkes for their Mothers, till Innocentius to his light Reasons added the weight of his Keyes, and by his power swept both that and other rubs out of his intended way. [s] For the King keeping his Christmas at Oxford, (attended as it seemeth by his Bishops) meaning not to pretermit any faire meanes to worke the Popes inclination towards the new Elect, he sent for [t] twelve of the Monkes, whom with some other of his owne Clerkes (which carried his Letters to the Pope) hee put in truft for transacting this businesse at Rome; allorting them very bountifull expences out of his Exchequer for their whole journey. They to leave with the King, (who knew well the traines of Rome, and the ouer-reaching ferches of Innocentius,) a pledge of their durie, and assurance of his hopes, [v] entred with him [x] a couenant by oath, that no man, nor meanes should remove them from him, whom the King and themselues had already appointed: the Bishops sent [y] the same time their Procurators also, to plead their right of Co-election; so as, foure obstacles stood at once in the Popes way, the two elections of the Monkes, and the two claimes of the King and Prelates, hee for his Royall-assent, they for their ioynt consent, in the choyse) which all must be dasht and voyded before the Pope can have his full forth.

But because these will aske long time for contriving, (which moued his Holinesse to adiourne the hearing to the very [z] end of the yeare, wee will see the while how the King and State of England is imployed.

(33) The dorre, which deceased Hubert did put vpon King Iohn and his late designe, gaue both King Philip aduantage to take furer footing in his new possessions, and King Iohn greater stomacke and edge to recouer his old. The last taske (almost) of the one, and hold of the other, was Chinon a place of great strength, but in nothing more, then in the ever-trusty valour of her Captain, Roger Lacie; who (if some mistake mistake him not in stead of [b] Hubert de Burgo) being redeemed from the French, resolved here to give Philip another taste of his proweſſe, and King Iohn of his fidelitie; had not others faithleſſe feare defeated his brave resolution. For the beſieged having [c] no reſt night or day, from a long and inceſſant battery, their Commanders invincible constancy against yeelding, which enhearned the better sort, diſmayed the baſer, as more prizing their eaſe, then their faith or fame; ſome of which by night ſlipping over the walles, ſo inſtructed the enemy of all ſecret advantages to poſſeſſe the Towne, that by a ſodaine aſſault, both it and Lacy (more worth then it,) was againe ſurprized. Heere ſeemed to haue beene the Garland of Philips conqueſt; had not newes beene thither brought unto him of ſome new riſings in Britaine, where Guido, the husband of Conſtantia, Arthurs Mother, (ſenſible belike of the falſe-grounded wrongs offered to King Iohn, under pretence of Arthur,) [d] returned gladly both into Amity and a ſtrong league with the Engliſh: and with him alſo Savary Malleon, and Almericke Lufignian, [e] two Peeres of Heroike valour and great command, whom King Iohn of his * priſoners, had made by prudent and lovely uſage his truſty friends. The French King fuming to ſee his unjuſt intruſions thus prejudiced, (eſpecially by Arthurs owne father in law) was haſtening from Chinon into Britaine, to worke revenge on them, whoſe exemplar equity ſhould have beene his mirrour of amendment; Englands King on the other ſide, was no [f] leſſe heartned with this new confederation, [g] levying once againe a puiſſant Army, which he [h] landed at Rochel, being the onely noted place, which in all theſe turmoyles and murabilities of Fortunes, kept her ſelfe entire from entrance either of enemy, or of diſloyall thought.

(34) The King having his Army much augmented [h] with great concourſes of his beſt affected Provincials, marching confidently forward, ſubdued a great portion of that Countrey; till comming to Mount-Auban, [a] Caſtle of much renowne, (as being reputed [k] inexpugnable, and now the Rende-vous of his moſt potent enemies, and all their flower of Chivalrie, he gave a terrible aſſault thereto, for fifteene dayes together; where at laſt his [l] Engliſhmens valour was ſo adventurous in ſcaling the Walls, and both giving and taking blowes unportable, that in thoſe few dayes hee entered Conquerour into that very place, [m] which Charles the Great, could not get with his ſeaven yeares ſiege. The [n] multitude of Nobles therein taken was ſo great, that he ſent into England a bed-roll of their names, for a memoriall of ſo great a victory. Which auſpicious beginnings, he ſeconded with no leſſe expedition, providence, and proweſſe, in the ſiege of Angiers, where, on his firſt approach, he [o] gave preſent inſtructions to his maine Army, ſuddenly to environ the whole Citie, and by aſſault to ſeeke entrance at the walles on every ſide, whiles himſelfe and his ſelected band, with fire and Engines would aſſaile the Gates; where with great celerity, and no leſſe hazard then hardneſſe, breaking through, hee became Lord of his owne. But whatſoever were the Citizens demerits, pitious it was, that their offences, and the Conquerours wrath, lay ſo heavie on thoſe ſtately walles, as [p] to throw them flat to the ground; which haſty doome, (it being the [q] cradle of his birth, and citie of his chiefe delight,) he as haſtily (and very dearely too) repented, when with exceſſive expences hee encircled it againe with a beauty farre beyond the former. Theſe faire ſucceſſes humbling all the Countrey before him, cleared his paſſage into Picardy, whither King Philip was now converting all his power, to oppoſe himſelfe againſt the violence of this Torrent: which [r] now more facilly hee might ſtoppe, having in his way, *by laying ſecret * ambuſhments*, laid hands upon Duke Guydo, Savary, and Almericke, King Iohns principall hopes, as they were buſily advancing his preſent affaires: by which ſurprize, though the Engliſh forces miſſing their Provincial aids, were greatly impaired, yet their * great hearts were not much amated, as the Frenchmen [s] found, when both the Armies neere approaching over-night, the next morning alacriouſly they addreſſed to the fight, and with great ſpirits on each ſide expected the Signall. Notwithſtanding, the day likely to prove dreadfull with expence of bloud, upon earneſt interceding of ſorraine Prelates, and religious perſons, who undertooke equally to compoſe all things; both Kings condeſcended to a two-yeares * Truce, King Iohn chiefly out of affection to his Captive friends, whoſe liberty was formoſt in the conditions.

(35) Having thus ſeeled thoſe Countries in farre better termes then laſt he found them, hee embarked for England, where he laid not aſide a careſull (though diſtaſtefull) providence, for ſtill bettering thoſe his ſucceſſes: for which ends, whiles from his Subjects (both Lay and Clergy) hee [t] gathered money, the Sinewes of warre, hee loſt their affections, the ioyns of peace; whereof Geffrey Archbiſhop of Yorke (his Naturall and unnaturall brother) was a principall incentive; who [x] ſolemnly curſing all the Kings Receivers within his Province, fled ſecretly out of the land. Which pervicacie, * a bitter Enemy of King Iohn, yet bitterly taxeth, ſaying, y the Engliſh Biſhops were farre from that dutifull obſervance towards their Soueraigne, which the French Biſhops performed to theirs, at whoſe commaund they maintained Souldiers in his Warres againſt King Iohn, acknowledging they were ſo bound to doe, as often as the King purſued the Warres in perſon; though now alſo they did it, where hee was not in perſon. And indeed how hollow-hearted to the State, thoſe money-murmurers were, their * owne friend bewrayeth, ſhewing, how with curſes they wiſhed, and prayed to GOD, that theſe exactions might never haue any good ſucceſſe, though they knew it was purpoſely for preſerving a maine part of the Kingdome. A diſloyalty the more unſufferable by the King, knowing that but a [z] very little before, the Popes Legare, *Io. * Florentius*, nick-named * Ferentinus, for bearing away ſo much money,) had [a] gathered of the Clergie a huge Maſſe of money, which in full Cheſts hee conveyed to Rome. Yet all theſe domeſticke grudges abated not the Kings due care, nor yet his good hopes, which were ſoone after much augmented by the encouragements of Othoes Imperiall preſence, [b] who in perſon arriving here in England, to project for his owne and his Vncles Warres, was with great joyes met by the King, and conducted through London by night, where all the Citie was ſeene in her glory, and all the ſtreets adorned with richeſt hangings, beautified all along with the luſtre of pendant Crownes, and burning Lampes: who after ſome dayes of royall entertainements hence departed, not unfurniſhed with helpes to deſtray his Warres.

(36) Whiles King Iohn is thus buſied about his open Hoſtilities, Pope Innocentius is plotting his ſecret Stratagems againſt him at Rome: where, like unto that * other old Roman, who being choſen Vmpere touching ſome march lands betwixt two neighbour-Nations, unpartiall to either, [c] adjudged it from them both to the Romane State; ſo hee now, being Arbiter betwixt the king, Biſhops, and Monkes, concerning their choyſe, hee meanes to defeate them all, and * adjudge the right of diſpoſing thereof to his Romiſh See. Therefore, at the * fore-limited day of hearing, his firſt care was, that the [d] Biſhops lippes for ever ſhould be ſealed up, (notwithſtanding their [e] allegations of Law, Reaſon, Decrees, and Practiſe,) from intermedling in choyſe of their owne Primate. Will you heare the maine reaſon? becauſe himſelfe, and ſome other popes would haue it ſo. Which definitive ſentence, being [f] ſent to the Prelates into England, it was thought a point of prudence alſo, to [g] prepare the King, and worke him pliable before hand, to entertaine that which was to follow: which muſt be done by amiable amiable lines, and Gemmes, wherewith he knew the King was much delighted. His Present, being foure gold Rings, with foure precious stones, an Emerald, Sapphire, Rubie, and Topaze, he so vainely and childishly (though * ignorance enstile it eloquence) celebrateth in his * Epistle, for their number, forme, and colour, that no man will question whether it were dictated with an Apostolicke Spirit. The Rings Roundnesse must remember the King of Eternitie; the Quadrat number of Constancy, and of the foure Cardinall vertues, Iustice, Fortitude, Prudence, Temperance; the Golds price, of Wisedome; the Emraulds greennesse, of Faith; the Saphires brightnesse, of Hope; the Rubies rednesse, of Charity; the Topazes clearenesse, of operative Sanctity, &c. Which, though toyes, were yet accepted as pledges of love for a while, till at last, the King finding by the sequell, they were but baites to beguile him, esteemed the Popes Gold as drosse, his Iewels as * Iewish frandes, and his love as most cankered hatred. For shortly after came to his notice, the most indignious injurie, which the Pope meant to obtrude upon him and his Kingdome, having not onely hunted both Reynard and Gray out of their holdes, but also imposed upon him, for the chiefe place and managing of his State, one whom he reputed a chiefe and dangerous enemy to himselfe and it: which thus was fetcht about.

* Gemmas gestatum libeat.

(37) The Monkes freed from the Bishops impugning, were hote now in the strife amongst themselves; the [g] one side against Reyners election urged it wanted Royall assent, the greater and sounder part of Electors, due solemnities, due * time: the other, against Norwich, that no second election could be validous, unlesse the former were first annulled. Both their Reasons pleased well the Pope; who, (as pre-possessed Iudges often use) made shew of [h] great diligence in pondering the pleadings, whereas himselfe long before had resolved on his Sentence; which was, that by Apostolicall definitive doome, neither of the Elects should ever be capable of that See. So great rubbes hath the Pope with so little breath blown out out of his way. The man whose advancement all this while hee had aymed at, was now commended to them, who must be there presently chosen for their Primate, Stephen de Langton, a Cardinall, English by birth, [i] French by education and affection, one of so [k] transcendent power in the Romaine Court, that the pope was thought not for love, but for envie, (as being himselfe eclypsed by his neerenesse) to have wished his service in some remoter dignity. But the Monks ill-apaide with what was done already, and very tremulous to enter matter of new intrications, alledged against all further courses, that [l] no Canonicall Election could bee there made, they having consent neither of King nor Covent; at which word the Pope snapping them up, bad them know, that * hee had there plenitude of power over the Church of Canterbury; and besides, that no consent of Princes vsed to bee expected in Elections celebrated where the Pope was: hee therefore charged them, under paine of his high curse, (a terrible bug-bear in those dayes) there presently to chuse him for their Primate, whom himselfe thought good to nominate unto them. Thus trembling under the cracke of his Thunder-bolt, they all [m] excepting one Heliae de Brantfield, whose constancy shall here perpetuate his memory,) durst not for feare but elect him, though very unwillingly, and with murmurations: whose * Consecration followed by the Popes owne hands at Viterbium, and his earnest recommendation by the Popes [n] flattering Letters, to the Kings favourable acceptance. And this was the unblessed beginning of those new miseries which brought the King to his ending, and his Kingdome to unsupportable calamities; all which, little did his Holinesse or his Charity reckon of, so his desperate policie might take effect. Yet not unduely fell those judgements of many Princes of those times, who neglecting the domesticke execution of Supreme Iustice, suffered their Subjects, at so high a rate both of expence and travels, to buy such arbitrary and dangerous formes of a forraigne, and falsly named Iustice.

(38) Two very presumptuous Lawes hath [o] one observed to have beene first hatched by this lawlesse Pope, the one occasioned by King Iohns and Philips former strife, that Princes delinquent must bee lyable to correction from the Pope; the other, upon the choyce of the Emperour, that where in elections voyces are equall, or concord wanting, the Pope may gratifie whom hee please: unto which wee now may adde a third no lesse arduous and insolent, that the Pope may strike up Elections, both where, and of whom, and with, and without what consent him listeth. Which lewd obtrusion, that it galled the King to the quicke, we need not marveile, if wee ballance in one Scale, the popes meere will and pleasure, in the other the dishonour to the King, (thus to be triced out of that, which so vehemently, and with his owne prefence he tooke care to see effected;) the prejudice to his Crowne, to bee defeated of Soveraigne assent; the hazard to the State, to have his * Enemy (a Philippine, and French favourite) the* chiefe man over his English: besides wrongs more particular; as both the disgrace to his best deserving Counsellour, and the disloyalty of the Monks, first, to choose without his licence, then to mocke him with a second choyse, next, to beguile him with oathes, after, to travaile upon his excessive charge, and lastly to doe, and undoe all, with their perjurie. With all which so farre the Kings patience surfeited, that hee began on them to dis-gorge his wrath, who with him began these affronts; proscribing first all those Monkes as [p] Traytors, and afterward writing his [q] Letters to the pope, with relation of those great "wrongs to Himselfe, and exceptions to Langton; "vowing immutably to stand for his owne Elect, and "to dye in defence of the Liberties of his Crowne; "putting the pope in minde, that Rome reapt more "gaine from England, then from all the Transl-alpine "Regions; threatning also, if he were now crossed in "this, hee would stop all from crossing the Seas to "Rome, nor would any longer emendicate their forrain "Iustice, fith his owne Kingdomes, so abounded "with Bishops and learned men of most accomplish-"ed perfection in all professions.

deprived of the very face of Christianity for many ensuing yeeres; as if, not Innocentius Christs Vicar, but Iulian his professed Enemy, had mured up the doores of the Christians Temples for despight of their God.

(40) But this High-Priest had forgotten what another * taught him, and [z] hee himselfe sometimes thought, about interdicting France for their Kings offence; that better it was one should suffer then a whole Nation perish: whereas now, for the Kings only crossing the Popes good pleasure, God is censured to loose his worshippe, and all the People to hazard their soules, [a] living almost like Infidels, without Gods service and blessed Sacrament, yea and dying * like dogges tumbled into every ditch. But what? did such wofull effects fasten onely on the Laity? The Clergy bare their part too; whom the flames of the Kings justly incensed wrath did so scorch, that his Dominions were too hote for their abode: for, their [b] persons hee proscribed and sent packing to the Pope, their revenewes hee confiscated, their Bishoprickes, Abbeyes, and Priories, hee deputed to Laymens Custody: their women (for such as had not wives, had Lemmans) were dearely ransomed: and every where they suffered wrongs without ordinary protection of Iustice. Whereof, though our * vulgar perfunctory Writers produce no other reason, but the onely over-flowing of the Kings gall, as if first stirred by some few delinquent Bishoppes, through furious revenge it over-whelmed the whole Clergy; yet indeede these were but the due chastisements of their generally-dilloyall hearts. As (to instance) when the King sent his [c] mandate to S. Albans, that not regarding the Popes command in the Interdict, they should continue the celebration of Gods service; the Abbot calling his Monkes into the Chapter-house, perswaded them to obey God rather then Man, (meaning the Pope rather then the King) and to beare resolutely the kings anger, * whom God in due time would bring to an end. What marvaile then, if the Clergy carried so generally with this streame of a forraine vsurped power, against Gods service, and their Soveraignes godly desire, and due authority, were likewise generally involved in that reward of their disloyalty? And yet, even in the Clergy, many of eminency detested these cruell and irreligious courses of the Pope; [d] Philip the Bishop of Duresme, and his Successour, with the Bishops of Norwich and Winchester, heartned the King to contemne the Papall Curse; the [e] Cisterstian Abbots (neglecting the Interdict) continued their divine celebrations, till the Pope suspended them for their contempt; *Alexander Abbot of the Benedictines, a Divine of * exquisite learning, [f] published in his Sermons, that their present calamities were no reproach to their Soveraignes proceedings, but due rewards of the Subjects haynous trespasses, because kings ought to governe, yea and strongly bridle all disobedient Subjects whomsoever; but as for Popes they ought not to intermeddle in the civill affaires, and regiment of any Princes over their vassals, seeing Peter himselfe received no power, but onely in matters appertayning to the Church. And though the * Pope were revenged on him for his plaine truth, and some Monkish humours have asperted other such men with bitrer reproaches, yet what may be thought both of these the Popes courses, and of such his opposers, a late Iesuite (no partisall man to Princes) sheweth, saying, that many, and godly wise men at that time did wish, that Pope Innocentius had not stood so hard with king Iohn in such a poynt as this was, for contenting him with a person gratefull unto him in that See. And no marvaile they so wished, seeing that was the grand cause of such infinite confusions, factions, and wrongs, hurrying so indignely the Prince, Peeres, Clergy, and Commons; the very contemplation whereof to all godly wise men must needes bee gastly and rufull: yet wel-fare those Anathematizing Bishops, the Instruments of all these evils, who patiently endured under the name of exile, [h] to live the while abroad in all variety of delights.

(41) Such perplexities in the People could not but breed as great harred and hazards to the king; who therefore to prevent the issue of such discontents, (which though causlesse, yet kindling in the multitude prove often unquenchable,) hee [i] required of his Nobles new Oathes of allegiance, pledges of such as hee most suspected, and homage of all Freeholders, [k] even of twelue yeeres old, whom he distrusted with a kisse of peace. Misdoubting also the Popes further intent to absolve his subjects from their due allegiance, he gathered about him (by * example of his Father Henry on the like ground) a mighty Armie for all occurrents. The terrour whereof hee first displayed in the North, offended (faith [l] one) with * William King of Scotland, for marrying his daughter to the Earle of Bullogne; for receiving (faith [m] another) fugitives, and enemies of his State: for throwing downe (faith a [n] third) a castle built by King Iohn against Barwicke: but whatsoever were the breach, the cloze was amiable, each accompanying other to Yorke, where King Williams [o] two daughters were promised to King Iohns two sonnes, and [p] delivered as pledges of united love, with a [q] gift of nine thousand markes. The dread of this his power so glyded out of the North into the West, that upon his returne, the [r] Princes of Wales, and others rich and poore came to him at Woollocke (the like thing never heard of before) to doe him homage. But all these linkes of allegiance were soone cracked by another thunder-clap (from Rome) of Anathema on the king by Name, with strict injunction for all men to abandon his presence: [s] which sentence being sent to bee divulged by the Bishops and Prelates in England, all of them for feare or favour of the king, were content to neglect the Popes commaund, and let the Apostolike processe escape without execution. The same fyet thereof was in all mens mouthes, but came first (as seemeth) to the Kings Eares, [t] by a fervant of his owne Exchequer, Geffry Arch-Deacon of Norwich, who secretly perfwading his fellow-officers, that they were bound in conscience to relinquish the kings service, gave them example himselfe by leaving his dutie and charge; for which hot-braine tricke, hee was put in a * Coale of lead, the weighe wherof, as (a punishment of his levity) soone hastened his end in prison: but the greater and wiser fort, both of [u] Nobles and others, continued their due attendance on their Soveraignes Court and person, without * regard of the censure.

(42) Those Romish furies thus infesting all at home, gave also courage and opportunity to ill-affected members further off; some of which in Ireland having furfeited long of the kings indulgence or absence, [x] begunne now to play the kings themselves. The noble spirit of this Prince in his tender yeeres [y] made choyse (on bended knees to his Father, in presence of Heraclius Patriarke of Hierusalem) rather in devotion to conduct an Army against the Turkes, then in Ambition to take possession of that goodly Kingdome. But being now possested thereof, and intending (by a kind of compensation for his losses in France) to annexe and assure that Kingdome to the English Crowne, hee resolves with a power-full Army to quell the disturbers, and reforme the disorders, of his first, and long un-visited charge. Whose approach such fame and dread did fore-runne, that [z] more then twent ie Petty Kings of that Nation haftened to Dublin, there to honour his [a] arrivall with their submissive attendance, Homage and Oath of Allegiance; others, either upon confidence of their good holds, or diffidence for their ill deserts, flying his presence, and some of them, the Country. The * two Lacies (whose onely praise was, that they were the sonnes of a nobly-deserving Father) having beene, through ambition of Soveraignty, the fountaine of daungerous garboyles, [a] tyrannizing over the Commons, and making away such of the Nobles, as stood either in their light, or in the Kings favour) fled into France, where they lived in * an Abbey as poore Gardiners, untill the Abbot descrying by their deportment some state above their habite, upon penitent humility reconciled them to the King. The Lord William de Breuse, (a * Baron lately of great command and wealth in the Marches of Wales,) shewed not the like penitence, nor found the like grace; who, upon * refusall to deliver his sonne as a pledge of his fidelitie, sped into Ireland to flie the Kings wrath, and now, to avoyde his pursuit, fled also into France, then the common Sanctuary of all trayterous fugitives; but * sharpe revenge overtooke both his Sonne and his Lady, (taken in a strong Castle of Meth) whose virulent and rayling * tongue had more exasperated the fury of the King (whom she immodestly reviled as a Tyrant and Murtherer,) then could be pacified by her strange presents, (* foure hundred Kine, and one Bull, all milke-white, except onely the eares, which were red,) sent unto the Queene.

(43) But [b] Catalus, the unquiet King of Connaught, trusting to his owne Forces, King Iohn subdued by strong pursuit: [c] and after all carried him captived in triumph, imprisoned the English Fugitives, tooke pledges both of English and Irish Inhabitants, punished by death malefactors, turbulent persons by ransomes, eſtablished all their Lawes, Coynes, and Officers, to the English forme, and deputed (which was worth all) a wise, stout, and upright * Governour over them, the Bishoppe of Norwich, Langtons Competitor: thus settling on that barbarous Iland so noble and ordered a face of government, as was the stay thereof in those tumultuous times, and a patterne even to more peacefull ages to imitate. By which both glorious and * speedie conquest and reformation, hee better merited that Style of Irelands Lord, then when it was confirmed to him by a Crowne of * Peacockes feathers from the Pope, at what time (long before) hee injoyed it by his Fathers gift, as his Broad-Seale (heere not unfit to be annexed) will shew.

This Seale is at a Charter granted to Dublin, before Iohn was King.

(44) The Bankes of King Iohns estate, were not unlike to those in Grounds: ill-neighboured with an encroaching Sea, where before one breach is well made up, another no lesse dangerous is laide open: which endles turmoiles kept his body still in Action, his Minde in passions, and his Prowesse in ure. The vaste expenses of his Irish expedition were no sooner repayred, (by a * great taxe charged on all the Conventuall houses) but Lewelin Prince of North-Wales, with his great spoyles on the English Marches, made new matter of charge and exploit for the King; [d] having, to prevent due revenge, caused his Wallans to convey all their cartell and better substance to the scarce-accessible refuges of Snowdowne Hill. These difficulties much more whetted and excited the Kings resolution; neither had the vertuall power of the Popes fulmination as yet so blasted his good fortunes, but that hence also hee [e] returned in great triumph, as Conqueror of all Wales, where, with wonderful celerity and valour, he [f] subdued all their Princes and Cheefes, whom he received upon Oath, homage, and hostages, with an absolute [g] graunt of all their Inland unto the king for ever. Notwithstanding, perceiving that [h] very many slipt away for dread (at least for colour) of the Popes curse, from those his martiall and other civill services, (though [i] hee punished by fine all such Revolters,) whereby his person could never bee free from danger, nor his State from trouble; hee resolves (seeing the Pope unflexible, and unsensible of so many Christians calamities,) at length to relent from his vowed stiffenesse against the Popes Elect, in hope so to settle his owne and his Subjects tranquility, though with unsufferable indignity to himselfe. In his [k] returne from Wales, with with an Army no lesse faithfull then powerfull, and also with the love of his Neighbour-Princes. King William of Scotland, [q] at this time infested with a dangerous rebellion, (stirred up within his Kingdome by one Gothred, [r] laying claime, under colour of some antiquated title, to his Crowne) being himselfe infirme with age, sent his sonne Prince Alexander into England, to crave assistance of King Iohn, who (by his owne princely love and readinesse to demerite theirs,) resolving with his Army in person to chastise the disturbers of his trusty Confederate, before his setting forth, did [s] on the table in a solemne feast, (which hee kept in the Hospitall of Clerken-well) adorne Prince Alexander with the Belt and Order of Knight-hood; and [t] afterward with his Hoast vanquishing the Rebels, advaunced their Chiefe-leader farre higher then his owne Ambition expected, and left that Kingdome in a setled peace. But whiles he is thus kindly carefull in suppression of anothers rebels, his owne at home are as unkindly vigilant to undermine his State; the Popes absolution, like magicke-spelles, having let loose many tumultuating Spirits, which wil not easily be laid againe. For the [u] Chiefes among the Wallians, whom neither breach of their Oathes, nor losse of their noble hostages, ([x] which soone after perished for their parents sinnes) could deterre, suddenly fell off from the King, and fell on his Subjects with [y] much slaughter of men, burning of Townes, and surprizall of Castles: whereof, whiles the King meaning to take sharpe revenge, was on his way at Nottingham with an un-resistable Armie, letters of great speede and secrecie were delivered to him, (as he sate at meate) from his faithfull and gratefull friend the Scotish King, and instantly others from his Daughter Ioan, Prince Lewylins Lady, both giving him intelligence of imminent Treasons [z] plotted by sundry of his Peeres, who meant eyther to murther him, or betray him to the butchery of his foes. Which dreadfull notices from so true-hatted Informers, could not yet affright his manly heart, till comming to Chester, he there understood by sundry other Intelligencers, that his [a] Nobles held themselves quite discharged from his Allegiance; and knowing that they wanting fidelity, he himselfe could not but want fecurity, hee dismissed his Hoast, tooke hostages of his Barons, pursued the detected Conspirators, and [b] the three principall of them flying the Land, he prosecuted their persons, demolished their Castles, and confiscated their possessions. But many of as vile and virulent affections they left behinde them, as that [c] trayterous Act of those Nobles bewrayed, who sent to Philip of France their sealed Charter, promising to settle on his head the Crowne of England, if hee would come to receive it. And that the mindes of the vulgar should not be un-possessed with like expectation of Iohns un-crowning, the prophesies of an [d] Heremiticall wizard (fore-telling, that on the day of the Ascention, King Iohn (should be no King) were buzzed into their ears. Whether by Gods inspiring, or the Divels, these were revealed, [e] some doe doubt; but hee that considers the quotidian impostures of these times, and the secret machinations of the Pope, the French King, and the English Barons, all for divers ends, complotting against King Iohn, will easily perceive both what use there was of suborning such a Prophet, to deterre the popular meynie, from sticking to the King, and to beguile their credulity, as if the thing were to be done, by Gods fore-appointment, and ordinance, and also [f] that his punishment by death, as a trayterous Impostor, was no other then he deserved.

(46) Neither is the Popes revenge thus appeased, some higher greeces yet remaine, on which his Greatnesse; and greatnesse of his holy rage must display it selfe: the under-props whereof, (a thing almost incredible) were not onely English-men, but English Bishops also. For Stephen Langton with the B B. of London and Ely, (thirsting after revenge, though with the destruction of their Country, and bloud-shed of innumerable their Compatriots) going to Rome with complaints on the King, [g] made humble supplications: to the Lord Pope, that he would vouchsafe in a touch of pious compassion, to support the English Church, being at the point of ruine. At whose earnest follicitation, the tender-hearted Pope (grievously lamenting the desolation of the Kingdome of England,) decreed by solemne sentence: That King Iohn should be deposed from his Kingdome, and that the Pope should provide some other, who should be deemed worthier to succeede. To effectuate the former clause, Innocentius eagerly pursued the latter, sending speedy Letters to (whom but King Iohns most mortall enemy?) Philip King of France; [h] requiring him to undertake the labour of the dethroning King Iohn, with no lesse reward then pardon for all his sinnes and enjoying of the English Crowne to him, and his heires for ever. A goodly large patent both for a Spirituall and Temporall Kingdome, which, (more like Mars his Priest, then Christs Vicar) he meanes to seale, with a deluge of Christians bloud. For not thus yet satiated, he transmits his Letters generall; [i] To all Potentates, Souldiers, men of warre of all Nations, to signe themselves with the Crosse, and to follow their Captaine, Philip, for the dejection of King Iohn, assuring all, that their assistance (whether in Person or Contribution) shall be no lesse meritorious, then if they visited our Saviours Sepulchre. That this Pope under colour of such Crusadoes, did formerly cloake his owne Avarice, his [k] owne Monkes averre; but here he cloakes therewith both his Pride, and a farre more savage vice, the thirst, not of mens Gold, but of their Blood. In which service with King Philip, he used the same English Prelates for his Negotiators, which were before his Solicitors thereunto; with whom also he sent his Factour Randulph; [l] giving him in private, secret instructions how to manage every particular of the whole designe, to the most behoofe of the holy See.

(47) The French King likewise receiving [m] from the Archbishop and his Associates, (in a [n] Councel) the Apostolike sentence; was very apprehensive of that employment, whereto not so much the Papall commaund, as his [o] owne ancient malignity, and the English Barons trayterous requests, had prepared him; both which he was now [p] willing to make with the specious pretext of Iustice and devotion. Vnder which colours he had [q] speedily marshalled an immense army at Roan, & drew a mighty Navy richly furnished to the mouth of Seyn, [r] all his Dukes, Earles, Barons, Knights, and Souldiers being summoned to the exploit under paine of high Treason, and disinheriting, who therefore both in feare and hope of spoyle, came flocking without number.

(48) A preparation of so great importance, that all Christendome tooke notice of, could not long be hidden from King Iohn; whose care, by reason of his now doubled opposition (forraine and domestick) could be no lesse for his owne and his Kingdomes safety, then was his Enemies for impugning both. Wherefore his Summons being [s] sent to all his officers both for Sea and Land, for speedy furnishing both of a Navy, and an Army, equivalent to encounter so powerfull an invasion, such [t] innumerable multitudes swarmed to Dover, and other harbours for landing, that the Chiefe leaders for want of provision, dismissing the rest, [u] encamped at Barham-Downes, onely with 60000. choyse, valiant, and well-appointed men, who, if they had carried all one mind, and true affection towards their King, and safegard of their Country, there breathed not any Prince under heaven, whose assault England had not beene able to repell. And being no worse appointed for a Sea-fight, his intent was to grapple fiest with the French fleete, [x] making no doubt of sinking them all: so secure and confident was hee in expectation of all Invaders. In which brave addresse, whiles both shores of the Sea are thus bel-laide with both those Kings puissant armies, the one waiting for the Enemy, the other for faire winds, & more forces, behold Pandulphus (the Popes Pragmaticke) having firſt defired ſafe conduct of King Iohn, arrives at Dover, to put in execution thoſe [i] ſecret Inſtructions which his Lord, (who made his advantage of the Foxe-skin, as well as of the Lyons) * had expreſly preſcribed. He there unfolds to the King, the innumerable "multitude both of King Philips ſhips, and of his "ſouldiers Horſe and Foot, (all in readineſſe to paſſe, "and yet more expected to follow) to bereave him of "his kingdome by Apoſtolicall authoritie, and to en- "joy it himſelfe with his heires for ever. That with "him were alſo comming all the Engliſh Exiles, both "Clergy and Lay; they, by his forces to re-poſſeſſe "their eſtates, (maugre the King) and he from them "to receive Allegiance, as from his ſworne Subjects. "That hee had the fealty of almoſt all the Engliſh "Peeres obliged to him by their owne Charters; "which made him diſtruſtleſſe of attaining eaſily his "wiſhed ſucceſſe: which calamities (the more unſuf- "ferable, becauſe impoſed by his inſulting enemy, and "his owne ſubjects) he might yet evade and retaine "his Crown, which by ſentence he had already loſt, "if penitently he would ſubmit himſelf to the Chur- "ches judgement. Doubtleſſe the ſtraits wherein to the King ſaw himſelfe plunged, were very dreadfull; ſo many deadly enemies abroad to aſſault him, ſo few truſty friends at home to guard him: which drove him into this ſad cogitation, [k] that thoſe his perſidious Peeres would now with their followers abandon him in the Field, or betray him over to the Sword of his Enemies. Yet not unlikely other motives alſo might forcibly perſwade him to relent: the remembrance of the Emperour Otho, whom this very Pope (not without ſoule blot of [l] Iniuſtice and [m] Lewdſie) had both eagerly advanced, and furiouſly diſ-empyred, the boundleſſe furies of the Cruſado promulged againſt him, wherewith this Pope [n] uſed to over-flow, as with a mercileſſe Ocean, all ſuch Princes as withſtood his will, which once broken-in would never end, but with the end and ruine of all. Thus thinking it better to yeeld to the time, with aſſurance both [o] of his Crowne, and of the [p] Popes favour, then deſperately to hazard Life, Crowne and all, to his mortall foes; he redeemes his ſafetie on ſuch conditions, as Neceſſitie, and the Pope (both which have no law) liſted to impoſe; and ſo preſently ſworе to ſubmit in all things * to the judgement of the Church. By vertue of which farre ſtretching Oath, Pandulphus afterwards exacteth his ſubſcription to a * Forme of Peace preſcribed by the Pope, wherein King Iohn, though [q] with an unwillinge, yea a bleeding heart, and weeping eyes, yet will he, nill he, muſt acknowledge [r] that touching all things for which hee was excommunicated, hee had abſolutely ſworne * to ſtand to whatſoever the Pope ſhould command. Secondly, that the Archbiſhop, Biſhops and Monkes, with all thereſt of that liſt, ſhould (with ſatisfaction alſo for all dammages) be reſtored both to their poſſeſſions and the Kings favour, ſo that they alſo would ſweare not to attempt any thing againſt the Kings Perſon and Crowne. Wherein we ſee that King Iohn in ſwearing to obey the judgement of the Church, was concluded to have ſworne performance of whatſoever the Pope commanded, and how great matters the Pope can command, King Iohn, with much more * bleeding amaritude of ſpirit, ſhall quickly ſee and feele. For two daies after, (being the period of the Hermits propheſie) the King at the houſe of the Knights Templars, in Dover, [s] by the Popes command in his [t] pre-ordination at Rome, taking off his Crowne from his head, ſurrendred it into the Popes hands by his Attorney Pandulphus, (at whoſe feete he [u] alſo laide his Scepter, Robe, Sword, and Ring, the Royall Enſignes;) ſubſcribed alſo to another [x] Charter, whereby hee reſigned his Kingdomes to the Pope, profeſſing he did it * neither for feare, nor force, but of his owne free will, and in the Common Councell of his Barons, as having no other way to make ſatisfaction to God and the Church for his offence, and that thence-forward he would hold his Crowne as Feodary to the Pope, paying a penſion annuall of 1000 Markes for both the Kingdomes of England and Ireland: whereupon doing homage and ſwearing fealty to the Pope, he did withall deliver ſome money, (as the earneſt of his ſubjection) unto Pandulph, [y] who throwing it to the ground, did thereon trample with his feete, to manifeſt his Maſters greatneſſe. That theſe things were done in preſence of ſome Peeres, who gave no conſent thereto, appeares by Henry Archbiſhop of Dublin, (the very principall man in that Aſſembly) who [z] both inwardly grieved threat, and openly diſclaymed and gaine-ſayed it.

(49) The Pope formerly pretended hee ſought [a] nothing more then Iohns repentance, and [b] grieved at nothing ſo much as Englands deſolation: but theſe his circumventions bewray he ſought ſomewhat elſe, which bred both repentance and deſolation to King Iohn and his Succeſſors long after. Which fact cannot be liveliер paralelled, then by another dolefull accident of the former yeare, [c] when a dreadfull fire in Southwarke, conſuming the Church and buildings neere London-Bridge, ſuddenly (whiles numberleſſe people flockt on the Bridge, either to bring ſuccour or ſeeke ſafetie) the fire by a winde ſeized alſo on the hither end of the Bridge; wherewith * multitudes thus encompaſſed on both ſides, miſerably periſhed; where at length ſome bringing their Barges to ſave the reſt, their crowde was ſo great, that the veſſels ſinking, more periſhed in the Water, then by fire. King Iohn, like thoſe, was in the middeſt of two inevitable flames; on this ſide, his faithleſſe Nobles, on that, his mercileſſe foes; when the Pope thus proffering him St. Peters Boat, for a ſafegard from both, drencht him into as great miſery, certainly greater Ignominy then both the other. Wherein yet the Pope doth not want his ſhare and ſhame; amongſt his owne favourites, ſome accuſing that his preſcribed Charter, as [d] lamentable and deteſtable; [e] ſome denying it was of the Popes procuring, but that King Iohn had long before made a vow of devotion, that if God ſeeled him in thoſe Kingdomes hee would dedicate them both, and make them tributary to the See Apoſtolike. But ſome other, (great pillars of the Papacy) ſtepping further, [f] avow it to be utterly untrue, that King Iohn did make his Realmes thus tributary to the Pope; or [g] that ever ſuch penſions were paide to Rome; or [h] if hee ſo did, or any other Engliſh King ſhould ſo doe, ſuch an act to be of no validitie at all; or if it were of any force, [i] it ought onely to lie on King Iohn, who ſo offended, and not on any his ſucceſſors. Doubtleſſe, if the Papal ſword had power to cut off King Johns regality for any offence, his Crowne was to have deſcended to the next Heire, (whether Henry his ſonne, or Eleanor Arthurs ſiſter, then alive) who, as they were not guilty of the fault, ſo neither conſenting to the reſignement. Some therefore have imagined, that [k] ſuch Inſtruments might happily then be motioned and drawne, and yet die unratified, though the copies ſtand recorded; but whatſoever were then done, that the Pope himſelfe (not onely thoſe his friends) were thereof aſhamed will hereafter appeare.

(50) Whiles Pandulphus is thus chaffering about the Crowne for his Maſter the Pope, Phillip is fitting his head to weare it, and was now ſetting forth his Navy to winne it, for himſelfe; which made the Legate (having after [l] five dayes ſeyſen re-delivered the Crowne, but [m] not yet releaſed the Cenſures, till conditions were performed) to haſten into France, carrying with him eight thouſand pound, as part of reſtitution to the exiled Biſhops; where, comming to King Philip, he adviſed him to diſmiſſe his hoaſt, and enterprize againſt King Iohn, as being now an obedient and reconciled Son to the Church. But Philip who was of the Popes minde, not caring for King Johns repentance, but for his Kingdome, which now hee loſt before he had gotten it, [n] ſtretting exceedingly to ſee himſelfe not onely ſet up for a ſtale, and made to the World an object of ſcoffe, by the Nunces guileſull colluſions, but alſo by the [o] Popes owne inticements, plunged into ſo exceſſive a dammage, (having ſpent, beſide his great travaile in this preparation, 60000. Crownes, wherewith hee purchaſed nought but ſcoffes; reſolved and profeſſed, that ſith the Pope himſelfe, had ſo farre thruſt him on, his Legates ſuggeſtions (no nor his threats of excommunication,) ſhould not draw him backe from his intendment. In which reſolution [q] calling his Peeres and Nobles into a conſultation at Sueſſoune, all the reſt approving the courſe, Ferdinand Earle of Flanders (part of whoſe Countrey Philip by force detained) told him tartly, that [r] as the attempt was both unjuſt and impoſſible, ſo [s] it was fitter, every mans right ſhould at home bee reſtored, and juſtice imbraced, before they attempted to teach duties of piety to others abroad. And, that he [t] ought rather to thinke of making reſtitution to King Iohn of thoſe tranſmarine Countries, which hee with-held unjuſtly, then of invading his Realme, whereto hee had no right at all. With which unexpected reclamation, [u] the chiefe Peeres began to waver, and Philip enraged, bidding him deſiance, forbad him his Court. The like rough uſage (not * long before) found [x] Reginald the moſt valorous Earle of Bulloigne (though his daughter was married to Philips younger ſonne,) whom the French King perceiving to wiſh well to King Iohn, [y] drove him unjuſtly out of his Earledome; but King Iohn, receiving him with honourable compenſation of [z] faire revenewes in England, held both with him and Earle Ferdinand, a fure (though ſecret) confederacy. So that now Philips rage, and feare to hazard his owne Crowne, (if ſeeking anothers, hee ſhould leave ſo neare an Enemy at his backe, diverts the courſe of his Ambition into the Itreanе of his Revenge, and reſolving firſt to ſubdue the Earle, (after which ſucceſſe hee might more ſafely paſſe into England,) hee commands his mighty prepared Navy to ſet forth from the mouth of Seyne towards Flanders, where himſelfe with his forces (meaning to ſubdue the countrey in their way) would meet them by land. Whereof King Iohn having ſpeedy intelligence from the Earle (who, knowing his meanes too ſlender to beare off the Kings ſo long prepared power, deſired his preſent ayde) without delay deſpatched his * Fleete, to purſue them who intended to purſue him, under the conduct of a [a] three brave Generals, his brother William Earle of Sarisbury, William Duke of Holland, and Reginald Earle of Bulloigne, [b] who with hugely gaines ſurprizing the French Navy at the port of Damme, (whiles moſt of the French Souldiers were on land, diſpoiling the Earles Country,) ſeized on them all; [c] three hundred of which ſhips, laden with proviſion, Armes, and other coſtly fraught (for whatſoever the King and all his Nobles held deareſt was therein,) they ſent for England (whither at firſt they were bound) and above one hundred other they burnt, or ſunke, for France.

(51) This Navall victory produced effects in the two Kings ſo oppoſite as were their affections; the [d] one with anguiſh of his irreparable loſſe and ignominy, haſting back into France, to prevent further danger; and [e] the other (joyfull of his owne ſucceſſe and his confederates) diſmiſſing his power, as ſecure of any French attemps in haſte. Wherefore now, with full purpoſe to finde him worke at home, who ſo buſily fought it abroad, hee forthwith ſent (with large rewards to his Flaunders Army) [f] inſtructions alſo to the Earles, how to inveſt Philip on that ſide of France, whiles himſelfe entring Poictou, would ſide of France, whiles himſelfe entring Poictou, would do the like on the contrary ſide, and otho the Emperor on a third part. A dangerous plot and league, if the iſſue had beene anſwerable to the deſignes. For proſecution whereof, [g] King Iohn attending at Portſmouth with a noble Army, in hope now that all true Engliſh, would gladly embrace ſo faire an opportunity, to recover their hereditary Provinces from the falſe French; his Barons reſtleſſe themſelves in procuring his unreſt, and envying that his forraine vexations being thus paſſed, hee ſhould want domeſticke, flatly oppoſe themſelves both to his commaund and their Countries good, [h] denying him (until he were abſoyled of his excommunication,) their attendance in ſo behovefull a ſervice. Thoſe men in the heate of his former troubles with the Pope, ſhinking ſuch troubled waters moſt advantageous for their fiſhing, [i] re-commenced their contention with the King for their long-deſired Liberties, wherin becauſe they found him ſtill as immooveable as themſelves were immoderate, it ſeemeth, though the cloake of their now refuſall were Religion, yet their ſpurre was Revenge, having withall an eye to the good of the King of France, whom ſo well they had before loved, as to wiſh him King of England. But King Iohn, being no leſſe earneſt to further the preſent generall cauſe, then they their particular ends, delayed not their deſires; and [k] deſpeceding his Charters and ſafe conducts to the Archbiſhop and his fellow-Exiles, hee as ſpeedily * arrived: [l] at whoſe preſence the earth is faid to have trembled; but (doubtleſſe) King Iohn did; who hearing of his comming towards him (then at Wincheſter) went to meet him and thoſe other Biſhops; at whoſe ſight [m] he fell down at their feet; with floods of teares intreating them to commiſerate His, and his Kingdomes miſeries. Vpon which [n] great humility in a King (moving them likewiſe to bedew their eyes,) they lifted him from the ground, and leading him by each Arme to the doore of the Cathedrall Church (where, at rehearſall of the 50. Pſalme, all his Nobles and others wept for joy,) after in the Chapter-houſe they did abſolve him; but with ſuch guilefull Appendices of Oathes impoſed on him, that this abſoilement was not ſo much the Epilogue of his olde, as the Prologue of his new Tragicall vexations.

(52) For the Prelates, whoſe beſt abettors the diſloyall Barons had formerly beene, meaning now to be the like to them, amongſt other Oathes then taken of the King (to [o] defend holy Church and Church men; to make due reſtitutions to the Clergy; to beare fealty to the See of Rome,) cunningly alſo inſerted this, [p] to eſtabliſh the good Lawes of his Predeceſſors, and to abolish all bad, proceeding with all his Subjects according to the juſt judgements of his Courts: out of which generalities, what good ſtuffe the Prelates and Barons can picke, ſequels will ſhew. Now all exceptions ſeeming to be taken away, which might hinder the Kings deſigne for France, hee once againe at Portſmouth haſtens to embarke his hoaſt; where, at the point of paſſage new impediments are pretended, [q] that the people having ſpent their money with long attendance, could not bee fitted for the ſervice, except the King would doe it out of his Treaſure; which moved the King in anger, with a ſmall traine of his owne attendants, to ſet forth to Sea, and his Barons (Philips true friends) to depart home, leaving the king (who at Gerſey expected their comming) deſtitute of their ſervice. With theſe ſo often trechcrous deluſions, what marvaile, or blame, if a King, and in ſo important an action, thus defeated, were enflamed to take due revenge? On which purpoſe the King thus [r] enforced to returne, reſolving to chaſtiſe thoſe rebellious ſpirits (the cauſes thereof) and to reclaime them to due obedience by force of Armes, the Archbiſhop (reſolute to be as tough a Bridle to the Regall power, as ever Hubert his predeceſſor was,) came unto him, to divert him with Arbitrament, that it was a breach of his Oath, for him to take Armes againſt any man whatſoever, without the judgement of his Court. But the [s] next day, ſeeing hee could not thus prevaile with reaſons (the King forbidding him to intermeddle in matters of lay-judgements, and [t] ſwearing that he would not forbeare for one * Clerkes pleaſure to take his owne raſſals) he followed the King (who was on his way earneſtly following his intendment) deterring him with threates, and vowing, [u] if out of hand he did not deſiſt from his purpoſe, hee would excommunicate all, (except the King himſelfe) who durſt take take Armes against any whomsoever, till the Interdict were quite released. So quickly did this Prelate on his coming into England, shew himselfe not only a faithfull Philippine, (as the King fore-saw,) and a faithlesse Baronist (as these his darings prove) but even another Pope, to threaten and persecute the King, sith Innocentius had left to doe it.

The Archbishops conspiring against the King.

(52) But these threates of sacred Censure, though they dash the whole course of Regall government, may seeme the more excusable, hee having some colour (though but a colour) thereof by reason of his vocation and place: the courses which soone after hee pursued, will not admit the like plea or pardon with the King. This English Pope, having in a [a] promiscuous Synode of Clergymen and Barons, granted by Indulgence, that in this time of Interdict, both Conventuals and Seculars, might in their Churches celebrate divine service, so it were with a very low voyce; singled out the Barons into a [a] very private conference (more cordiall perhaps to them then serving of God,) relating with much ostentation, what an Oath at his afforoiling the King, hee [b] compelled him to take, for restoring good lawes, and antiquating bad; to which end, a Charter of King Henry the first being lately found (which there hee shewed and caused to be read) by it, they might, if themselves would, reduce to the pristine estate, those Liberties which long they had lost. Both Charter and Counsell being received with [c] great applause and joy, a [d] Confederacy was stricken betwixt them, they all sweuring to him to strive for those liberties to the spending of their lives, and hee promising them his most faithfull and uttermost assistance. Amongst so many false to the State, probable it is, that some were false among themselves, by whom these secrecies might come to the Kings eares; who finding himselfe by both Clergy and Lay-Peeres combining against him, unable to revenge his forraine, or represse such domesticke indignities, knew no surer way to over-top them all, then by that high Hand, by which himselfe was first subjected to them all. How this must be fetcht about, because it concernes his Holinesse, a learned Monke shall relate in his owne Language. [e] The King knew and had learned by manifold experience, that as the Pope, both for Ambition, and Profit, went beyond all other mortall men: so likewise, hee was in his greedy desire of riches so unsatiable, that with money, either paid or promised, hee might bee wrought like waxe, and made pliable to all wicked actions. Thus having the true length of the Popes foote, hee fits him accordingly with rich presents, and golden promises, craving (by such moving Rhetoricke) not his ayde onely, but his Curse also against the Archbishop and Barons, who so unessfully distressed him. But Innocentius (forward of himselfe without any Motives, to put in ure those his Papall vertues, and the execution of his late usurped power,) upon the first gladsome newes of Englands Vassallage to his See, had presently dispatched for England an Agent of greater port then Randulph a Subdeacon, Nicholas Bishop of Tusculum, with no meaner credence and instructions for preserving what the Pope had guilefully gotten, then Randulph had to purchase what he ambitiously gaped for: by whose [f] arrivall the King seemed to bee possessed of those his desires, before his golden letters arrived at Rome to crave them.

The Popes Legate commeth into England.

(54) For this Legate was infected with the like itches (6 Ambition and Avarice) as his Master, and therefore King Iohn knew how to demerite his faithlesse and love, by supplying him with like [h] oyntments; whereby the Archbishop and Barons soone perceived, that the Legate was [i] wholly Regall, and the King Papall; which jealousie made both their Actions more distastfull. The Overt and professed end of his comming, being to release the Interdict, hee first tampered a little to accord the King and Prelates upon covenants of Restitution; towards which, though the King offered ten thousand markes, yet the Prelates [k] repining at the Legates [l] partiality to the King in approving that offer,) [m] chose rather to suffer the whole land to grone under that unchristian, and truely-styled Curse, [n] then to defalcate any jot of their covetous demands. Vnder which colour, the Popes Agent, (a fit helve for such a hatchet) brake his minde to the King of a more secret and principall cause of his Legacy, which was [o] for the contriving of a more validous and unexceptionable conveyance of his Kingdomes to the yoake of Romish Soveraignty; pretending doubtlesse, (as Randulph had done) that [p] hee could never be safe or quiet, but under the powerfull protection of the Popes wings. What juft exceptions the World might take to the former Grant, his Holinesse was not ignorant; it being an Act in the King, both of manifest * Perjury against his oath at his Coronation, and alfo of * Confirmation, * Circumvention, and * Feare; hee being driven thereto by the Pope himfelfe, who had fet up both the French power, and his owne Barons against him; an Act of one * actually excommunicate, as alfo were the * Witneffes converfing with him in that action, whereto, as neither the * next Heyres, nor the * Clergy, nor * Body of the Kingdome, gave any confent, fo an * open diffolaime thereof was made by the very [q] Principall man there prefent, in the name (as is likely) of all the reft: and that all was ingroffed with fo many groffe * untruths, as if done moft voluntarily; without any feare or force; in a generall Aſſembly of the Barons, onely by a divine inſpiration, and becauſe the King had nothing fit to pacifie God for his ſinnes, but the giving away of his Kingdomes: Well might the Pope bluſh at theſe fhamelesſe abuſions; and therefore if now the King, ſtanding on calmer termes, can be wrought to ratifie his former Grant, though the dealing bee more fraudulent, yet the Act will ſeeme more colourable, becauſe favouring of leſſe conſtraint, and more free devotion. But if we looke with an unpartiall Eye, wee ſhall ſee both the plight of King Iohn, and the action of Innocentius, ſtill like it ſelfe: the Interdiction ſtill burthening his land; his Barons more moleſtious to him then forraine foes; his Prelates greedily grating on him to empoveriſh his meanes; his Archbiſhop ſtopping all proceedings againſt forraine or home bred enemies; and if hee had thwarted the Popes commaund herein, hee fore-ſaw farre greater ſtormes at hand, then he had hitherto eſcaped. Thus in deſire to ſettle his Kingdomes quiet for his owne time, and in hope, perchance, that his Succeſſors would (as ſince by divine bleſſing they have) vindicate it againe from ſuch an enforced ſlavery, hee condeſcended to renue his [r] Charter of Subjection, knowing belike that his expreſſe [s] reſervation to himſelfe and his Heires, of all due adminiſtration of Iuſtice, all Liberties and Regalties, (as being excepted out of the Graunt,) was forcible of it ſelfe to make it unforcible. For how hath hee his wonted power of Iuſtice, who was ſupreme, and is made ſubordinate? how his wonted liberties, who was abſolute, and is made Homager and Penſioner? how his rore uſed Regalties, whom another may name and command as his vaſſall? Yet this Charter, adorned with a Golden Bull, (fit for the Roman * Phalaris, whereas the former was but ſealed with wax) was at a meeting in Saint Pauls Cathedrall Church [t] pretended for other buſineſſes about the Interdict) preſented for more authenticke ſolemnity at the High-Altar, where, in the King and Legates preſence, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, himſelf alſo both a Cardinall and a Legate (in this, acting the office of a ſtout Patriote, and noble Prelate, as the Archbiſhop of Dublein had done at the firſt Graunt,) ſtept forth, and in [u] the name of the whole Clergy and Kingdome, * boldly and earneſtly preſented [y] at the ſame Altar in ſolemne manner, his Appeales againſt that Charter, ſo execrable to the whole world, as likewiſe formerly [z] he had uſed all poſſible endevor to divert the Kings heart from that Subjection to the Pope and Court of Rome. That the Peeres of the land accorded with the Archbiſhop in the Appeale, (and

(and more then in Appeales) both the Kings owne [p] letters to the Pope ſaying, they openly profeſſed, that they forcibly made head againſt him, becauſe hee had ſo enſlaved his land, and their owne bitter exclamations againſt it, ſo frequently in [q] Authors reiterated, doe demonſtrate: and yet both the Archbiſhop and other Barons, are ſo cunningly named in the Popes [r] Tranſcript, as if they had not onely beene preſent and witneſſes at the doing, but alſo approvers of the deed. What comfort then had Innocentius of renouncing his old Charter, and thus ſhuffling for a new? Surely but little, it ſeemeth; eſpecially when hee ſaw both his owne Creatures in England thus oppugne it, and Chriſtian Princes abroad; yea King Iohns * mortall enemies, who not onely denyed, that England (notwithſtanding this Tranſaction) [s] was any patrimony of Saint Peter, and condemned the Pope for holding an errour ſo pernicious to all Kingdomes; but alſo vowed to dye before they would yeeld, that any King can of his owne will, make his Kingdome Tributary, and his Nobles ſlaves to others. By which univerſall deteſtation of this the Popes uſurping, it is not improbable (though for the preſent hee flouriſhed the Tranſcript thereof, which he ſent into England, with the [t] Preface of Chriſt and Melchiſedech, being Kings and Prieſts, and that therefore in one perſon of Chriſts Vicar, as the Soule and the Body, ſo both Kingdome and Prieſthood did now concurre,) that yet ere long hee was no leſſe aſhamed of this letter, then of his former Charter. Whereto well ſureth his teſtimony, who writes, that a [u] Parliament was held at London the yeare 1214. Where the Archbiſhop ſate as Preſident with all the Clergy and Laity: wherein by commandement of the Pope, the Charter, Fealty, and homage by which the King was obliged to the Pope, was abſolutely releaſed on the ſeventh day of July: which if it be true, no marvaile if the Court of Rome cannot produce, though often challenged thereto, this Charter, whereof ſo much they vaunt. Notwithſtanding ſome unquiet Spirits, aſpiring long after to the Papacy, though pretending (perhaps) the [x] Originall Charter was conſumed at Lyons (where the [y] Pope cauſing, ſome fay, *his owne Conclave to bee ſet on fire, to have a pretence to extort a contribution from the Prelates there in councell, the fire went farther then * hee meant it ſhould*) they made ſome flouriſh to [z] renew their claime of homage and penſion, till in a Generall Parliament, the Prelates, Lords, and Commons, ſeverally and joyntly [a] enacted, that for ſo much as neither King Iohn, nor any other King, could bring his Realme and people to ſuch thraldome, but by common aſſent of Parliament, (the which was never done,) and that in ſo doing hee did againſt his Oath at his Coronation; beſides many other cauſes of juſt exception; if therefore the Pope thence forward ſhould attempt any thing therein, the King with all his Subjects ſhould with all their Forces and powers reſiſt the ſame, and rather hazard all their lives and liveliyhood, then endure that uſurpation. If Pope Paſchall (in the [b] time of King Iohns grandfather) having with much ſolemnity made ſome grants to the Emperour Henry, and confirmed them with an [c] Anathema, with the [d] oaths of thirteene Cardinals, and with [e] religious receiving of the bleſſed Sacrament; yet, becauſe ſuch grants were thought prejudiciall to his See, [f] ſolemnely diſclaimed his owne Act, and ſuch his doing was approved by a Clergy Councell, as pretended to bee done [g] by feare: how much more juſtly might King Iohns Succeſſors and his State, by ſuch approbation of their grand Councell, free themſelves of thoſe ſervitudes wherewith by anothers unjuſt, forced, unwarrantable Act, they were ſuppoſed to be enfettered?

(55) Though the Archbiſhop were ſo unkinde againſt the Pope (the Advancer of his Fortune,) as to give by his appeale ſo fatall a blow to his deſired Crowne, yet the Pope was not ſo ingrate as to dye in his debt; as quickely hee found in [h] another appeale which hee made to the Pope againſt his Legate, for that hee, relying on [i] Apoſtolicall indulgence, not onely diſpoſed of all Spirituall dignities to [k] ſuch as beſt liked the King, but alſo to his owne [l] Italians, and Kinſmen, though abſent, unknowne, unſufficient, unworthy, yea, and ſome [m] unborne. Which Legatine * Tyranny unſufferable in a Chriſtian State, though Simon Langton (the Archbiſhops brother and Proctor) urged earneſtly before the Pope, yet the Legates Agent Randulphus, ſo diſplayed both the Archbiſhops ſervent neſſe in uſing ſuch * eager perſwaſions and appellation againſt the Kings ſubjection, and the Prelates * avarice, in their unreaſonable exactions for reſtitution from the King; being the moſt benigne, modeſt, and humble Prince that his eyes ever beheld; that his Holineſſe not onely conceived [n] exceeding hatred againſt the Archbiſhop and his cauſe, but ſent alſo his Authenticke Letters for repealing the Interdict, upon reſtitution onely of 13000. Markes * more to the Prelates (the King before had voluntarily offered them 100000.) and that but by equall portions of [o] five yeeres payment. But the King, who knew the Popes pleaſure before theſe Letters came to impart it, having found that his French affaires had ſuſtained unreparable impeachments by his hitherto enforced delayes, [p] entruſting his Kingdome to the Legate and Earle Marſhals cuſtody, was with his Forces paſſed into Poyctou, (whiles in his abſence, the relaxation of the Interdict, after [q] more then fixe yeeres continuance, was by the Legate in a Parliament ſolemnely promulged) where his Succeſſes were ſo fortunate, that [r] it being powerfully ſubdued, great hope was conceived the other Provinces would follow. Whence breaking with [s] like victories into Britaine, being there at the point to give [t] battle to Lewis the Dolphine, his ever faithleſſe Poyctovins ſodainely [u] forſooke him, and made him forſake his purpoſe. But a greater impairement of thoſe his hopes, was the [x] defeature of his Confederate Otho the Emperour, at the renowned Battle of * Bovines, where King [y] Philip, ſtricken from his horſe by the hand of Reginald Earle of Bullogne, had there with his life ended the quarrell, if a faithfull Souldier had not covered him with his owne Body, and bravely facrificed his life, to ſave his Soveraignes; who thereupon recovered both his footing, and the victory. The heavy newes whereof, concurring with his Barons outrages at home, drove King Iohn on [z] deare conditions, to capitulate on a five yeeres Truce, and returne to bridle them at home, whoſe attempts hee ever found moſt dangerous, when he was moſt buſied abroad. For under a * pretext of Devotion (the uſuall maske for Treachery) the Barons aſſembling at Saint Edmunds, [a] did every man on the high Altar ſeverally ſweare, to renounce their ſworne fealty to the King, and purſue him by Armes, till they had enforced his conſent to the Charter of liberties formerly by the Archbiſhop recommended to them. which when [b] afterward they came in perſon to challenge of the King, as a part of his Oath taken at his Abſolution; he [c] ſeeing both their forces and affections addreſſed for violence, was enforced with gentle language and promiſed ſatisfactions, to deſire, till after Eaſter, mature deliberation on ſo important a matter; in which breathing time, both in pollicie, he tooke new oath of loyalty throughout all the land, and [d] in devotion, undertooke the Vow and Signe of the holy Wars; chooſing belike to die againſt faithleſſe Turks, rather then to live amongſt ſuch unfaithfull Subjects. but neither Oaths, nor holy vowes [e] (then eſteemed the ſupreame priviledge of protection) could bee ſufficient Bucklers to protect againſt ſuch deſperate attempters; who at the prefixed weeke of Eaſter, preparing themſelves not for a Conference, as with their Prince, but for a Battle, as againſt ſome hoſtile power, trouped together at Stanford, with [f] an Army inſtimable for number, whoſe * very principall Abetter and conſpirer was Stephen the Archbiſhop, the more pernicious perſon, becauſe (to hide his falſe intendments) moſt aſſiduous in attendance about the King. And ſhim the King ſelecting to ſend to the Barons Army (who were come on as far as Brackley, not farre from the King, residing now in Oxford) to know the contents of their desires; hee brought a [h] Scedule of their claimed liberties, with a message of their resolutions, if presently hee sealed not a Charter thereof vnto them, they would compell him thereto by forcible entrance on all his possessions. Whereat his great heart * highly disdaining, hee demanded, why they also demanded not his kingdome? those their exactions being grounded on no colour of reason, and swearing never to enslave himselfe to them by such a concession, he dismissed his Archbishop to returne them his peremptory answere.

(56) Neither were the Barons lesse resolute in performance of their vow and message, appointing for Head unto that huge and heady rout, Robert Fitzwalter, whom they entitled [i] The Marshall of Gods Armie and holy Church: who first affailing Northhampton Castle, after fifteene dayes fruitlesse fury, departed to Bedford, whose * Castelan being a Confederate, gave them easie entrance; but the Londoners (displeased with the King for burthening them with taxes) not onely admitted them, but [k] invited them by requeste, to enter their Citie by night: where having that Key (as it were) of the Land, in their dispose, they by their [m] threatfull letters, not onely drew most of the Nobles from the King, but also had almost lockt him out of his Regall Seat. To prevent which outrage, by gentle messages intreating of the Barons a place and day of meeting, who thereto designed * Runingmead (since called Councell-mead, for such consultations of State,) they thither came [o] with armed multitudes out of all the kingdome beyond all number, that the King, [p] seeing his power far inferiour vnto theirs, was constrained to * grant them their uttermost desires, not onely for Liberties, (specified in * Magna Charta, and Charta foresta) but also for a kind of sway in the Government, by twenty five selected Peeres, to whose commands all the other Barons also were bound by oath to bee obsequious. Thus one of the greatest Soveraignes of Christendome, was now become the [q] twenty first petty King in his owne Dominions; as appeared that very night, when all the rest following the pompous streame of the new up-start Kings, left their Soveraigne * onely with seaven Gentlemen to attend him. What marvaile if high disdain hereof pierced his swelling heart, and filled his minde with revolving thoughts, how to unwind himselfe out of those servile fetters? And so hee did: [r] sending his letters over night unto certaine his trustiest Castellans, strongly to fortifie and victuall their Castles; and the [s] next morning before breake of day, very secretly retyring into the Isle of Wight: (whence seeking redresse both by the [t] spirituall and temporall [sword]) hee sent Messengers, both to the Pope, and other his forraine friends, to crave the Censures of the one, and succours of the other, against such outragious Rebels. In both which, his Agents were so sedulous, and his Friends so compassionate, that at [u] Rome by definitive sentence, the Barons Charters were speedily cancelled, the King and Barons [x] accursed, if either of them observed the composition, (which Excommunication was soone after upon their continued rebellion put in execution, for that [y] the Pope, Fortunes wheele being turned, did mortally persecute them whom himselfe had first wheeled and incensed against the King, [z] and from Flaunders, Gascoyne, Brabant, and other parts, such competent aids came in, as encouraged the King (after [a] three moneths secrecy and retyring,) to shew himselfe in the face of his enemies. His suddaine comming, with so unexpected attendance, to the siege of Rochester Castle, so amated both the * Captaine thereof, and all the Barons ([b] who had sworne to assist him against any siege,) that the one nor daring to approach to his rescue, the other was enforced to yeeld up his charge; and all his company had received, * what they deserved, had not Savery de Malleon entreated for their lives. The Gales of King Iohns fortunes seemed from this time, to blow from some happier Angle; and [c] dividing his great hoast into two parts, with the one conducted by himselfe Northward, he * every where from the Southerne to the Scotish Sea, victoriously subdued his Rebels, as likewise did the Earle of Salisbury with the other forrainers Southward. In which most deplored state of this land, all things were in confusion, and all men set on mischief, [d] Fathers against their Sons, Brother against Brother, Kinsmen and Allies, against their nerest friends, by assailing, surprising, pursuing, burning, spoyling, disherizing, tormenting, murthering; all the Kingdome, by the combustion of so universall a Rebellion, becomming like a generall shambles, or place of Infernall torture. And yet, as wirnesseth one who then lived, [e] the Fathers and ageedmen (likely to be the wiser, and better affected,) flood on the Kings part, but the younger on the contrary; though some againe forsooke the King for love of their kindred, and other like respects.

(57) Which certaine miseries, and uncertaine findings in civill warres, are not so strange, as is the savage madnesse of disloyall dispositions, who to attaine a shadow of seeming Liberties, immerge themselves and their abetters into bottomlesse servitudes and distresses. Yet more strange it is, that those Barons, and their adhering impugners of the King, whose pretext formerly was, that they durst not obey the King becawse of the Papall Curse, being now themselves by vertue of the same [f] commanded to obey and assist him, could without any scruple contemne both it, and him, [g] pretending it concerned them not, because particularly they were not named. Yea, the Archbishop himselfe, who with his suffilings had made the World seleeve, that the Popes censure (yea and his [h] owne too,) were of vertue to deprive the King of all Soveraigne command over his Subjects, now being [i] by name, and under that fearefull penalty, required by the Pope to denounce the same against those perturbers of the Kings peace; he esteeming thereof, but as a wizard to affright children, told the Popes messengers, [k] he would not doe it for any cause whatsoever, till himselfe had in person conferred with the Pope; for which enormious contempt, the Bishop of Winton and Pandulph [l] solemnely denouncing the curse themselves against the Barons, did likewise suspend him from all Episcopall authority. Stephen thus comming to Rome (for Innocentius had then called a Generall [m] Councell, and therein [n] excommunicated all either French or English who impugned king Iohn) was in that assembly (° of sixty one Archbishops, foure hundred and twelve Bishops, eight hundred Abbots and Priors,) accused and convict of treason against the king, and contempt against the Pope and Churches censures; for which the Pope [q] fully resolving to depose him from his See and Dignity, by the Cardinals earnest intercession for him (as being their Brother-Cardinall) was intreated to deale somewhat milder; but yet thereby * publike sentence confirmed his suspension, commanding by his [r] letters all his Suffragane Bishops to with-draw their obedience from him. And for a farther revenge, whereas Simon Langton (his Brother,) by his procurement had beene elected to the See of Yorke, (a strange example to [s] have a whole kingdome ruled by two Brethren of so turbulent humors) the Pope not onely did [t] cassate his Election, and made him incapable of any Episcopall Dignity, but also placed in that See, Walter Gray [u] (a trutty friend to the King, and a professed enemy to the Langtons) whose * Pall cost him no lesse then a thousand pound. By the like covetous grating, at the breaking up of the Councell, the Pope [v] extorted of every Prelate there, an infinite masse of money * before he would give them leave to depart home, amongst whom William Abbot of Saint Albans was one, [x] who "comming to take his leave of the Pope without any "present; what (faith he) Art thou the Abbot of Confederates doe the like at Windsor Castle; King Iohn and his mighty hoast, breaking forth with a fuddaine violence, like a furious tempest, over-runneth the Countrey all about, to the ruining of the Barons Castles, and possessions every where. Thus setting forth from Lime in Norfolke, (where, for their faithfull services he [k] bestowed large Franchises, and his owne Sword, and a Guilt Bole, for testification of his affection,) with a full [l] resolution to addresse his mighty Army for to give Lewis battell, as hee was passing the Washes with his Army and rich carriages toward Lincolneshire, in those sands (by reason of the often-changeable channell, ever dangerous) all his [m] Carriages, treasure, and provision, (himselfe and his Army hardly escaping) were irrecoverably lost.

(60) Many likewise were the grievances into which the Barons, the meane while were plunged, to see their Native Countrey by their owne wilfulnesse thus horribly massacred, their owne Castles and possessions ruined and rifled by the King, & which bred in them most anxietie, [n] their faithfull services (in this their faithlesse adherence) not so respected by Lewis, as he, and their owne fore-running hopes had promised them, whiles he conferred onely on his French, all such Territories and Castles, as the hand of victory had lent unto him. But their distresses were yet farre greater, then those their jelousies could comprehend, [o] till a Noble Frenchman (Vicunt de Melun) a man of great esteeme with Lewis, having his soule in his sickenesse deadly wounded with his sins of his health, desired private conference on his death-bed in London, with those English Barons, to whom Lewis had committed the custody of that City. To them hee imparted, what lamentable desolations and unsuspected ruines hung over their heads, for that Lewis with sixteene other his chiefe Earles and Barons, whereof himselfe was one, (averring it on the Salvation of his now departing Soule,) had taken an Oath, if ever Englands Crowne were setled on his head, to condemne unto perpetuall exile all such as now adhered to him against King Iohn, as Traitours to their Soveraigne, and all their kindred in the land utterly to extirpate. So counselling them timely to prevent their miseries, and to locke up his words under the Seale of Secresie, presently his penitent Soule being thus in peace with men, went to rest with God. What strange amazements so rufull a relation might work in the hearers, we may imagine, but onely men in like perplexed estate can fully and sensibly conceive. The operative power whereof was such, that though many of the Barons then doubted, whether, if they returned to their Soveraignes due allegeance, he (whose hatred against them with so many indignities they had provoked) would accept them upon their repentance, [q] yet presently forty of them addressed their Letters of submissive suite unto the King, in hope that true-kingly bloud is ever ready to yeeld mercy, to such as are ready to yeeld themselves prostrate.

(61) But these solicitors for mercy came too late, either to receive, or yeeld any contentment, by their submission to the King, himselfe (now at Newarke) lying at the mercy of a higher Soveraigne, and by the stroke of death neere to some rest, which in his life he had seldome attained: vexations being commonly the attendants of Crownes, but quiet and content the Priviledges of more private States. On deaths approach, with penitent [r] confession of his sinnes, and great devotion, hee received the blessed Eucharist, having the Abbot of * Croxton for his Physitian both bodily and ghostly: and not onely forgave gladly all his mortall persecutors (holding that a matter though very difficult to flesh and bloud, yet salutary to the Soule) but also sent command to Henry his sonne to do the same to whom he caused all present, [s] sweare fealty, as to the heire of the Crowne, and sent his Letters to all his Officers abroad, exhorting them to assist him. And [t] thus he commended his soule to God, and his body to be buried in Worcester Church, where the Bishop solemnely interred it, by the Kings appointment, neere the body of Wolstan, a fainted Bishop renowned for constant fidelity to his Prince against the rebellious Nobles of * his time: with which kind of men, King Iohns government had been miserably encumbred.

(62) This, being the Catastrophe of his Tragicall Raigne, might also have beene the close of his Story, had not the suddenty of his death exacted some search into the cause of his sickenesse. Such Authors as touch the matter but in generall, content themselves with saying, hee dyed of a [a] grieſe, or a [b] feaver, or a [c] flux, or a [d] surfet; but those who have entred into the particulars, insist on such a surfet, as whereof both griefe, feaver, and flux were most probable effects and Symptomes. For comming (say [e] they) from the Washes, to Swinshead Abbey, (being of the Cisteaux Order, which of olde hee had much incensed) he added new matter of offence, as hee fare at meate, when, in speech [f] of his enemies too large provision, he sware, if he lived but half a yeare longer, he would make one half-peny loafe as deare as * twelve: which to prevent, a Monke of that holy habit, whither in love to Lewis, or hate to the King, or pitty on the Land, presenting him with an envenomed Cup, (whereof the King commanded him to be his Taster) became the Diabolicall Instrument of his owne and his Soveraignes destruction. This relation delivered by Monkes, and men of Monkish humour, as a thing so undeniable, that they avow (at what time they wrote this) [g] five Monkes in that Abbey did sing for this their brothers soule specially, and so should whiles the Abbey stood, which, if it had beene forged, every child might easily have refuted; and the rehearsall of all circumstances thereof, (of the Kings speeches, of the Monkes conference with his Abbot, of his preparing the drinke with the Toade in the Garden, of his dying in the Firmary) might deserve credit with the greatest Patrons of Monkery; yet [h] one of them (as if by acquitting Simon of Swinshead, all * other of such Orders were cleared from assasinating of Princes) striveth eagerly, to asperse some late * Relaters hereof, with the blots both of malice and forgery. Wherein is the malice [i] in adding to the narration, Pictures also of the fact, so to move hatred to Monkes and their Religion; whereas of truth, either Monkes, or men of that Religion, were the very first, who not onely so depictured, but also lively and richly depainted it in their [k] goodliest Manuscripts. Wherein then the Forgery [l] in addding to Caxton, that [m] his Abbot gave him absolution for the same before-hand, there being no such matter at all, nor any mention thereof in the Story? No: let the very Story speake. [1] The Monke went to the Abbot, and was shriven of him, and told the Abbot all the King had said; and praid his Abbot to assoile him, for he would give the King such a drinke that all England should be glad thereof, and joyfull: tho yode the Monke into the Garden, &c. Yea father, [n] one Monke alleadgeth, an inducement for the Abbots assent thereto, for that the King had sent for the Abbots Sister (a faire Prioresse) with purpose to have desboured her. Yea, but the Story it selfe is charged with [o] novelty, the first author thereof being but Anno 1483. and all other former Writers making no mention of it. This if true, were somewhat, and doubtlesse, it is as true as the former: for how could he bee the first Author, sith the Latine History entituled * Eulogium, (whose Author dyed about 1366.) hath all particulars more exactly set downe, then that English hath, and expretly, that the Monke conferred with his Abbot, of his whole purpose, and shriued himselfe, how hee would suffer this voluntary Martyrdome, as Caiphas said of Christ, better one perish then a Nation. At which constancy of the Martyr, the Abbot wept for joy, and praised God: So the Monke being absolved by the Abbot, was undaunted, and tooke the Cup, &c. And not onely * Ranulph the Monke of Chester, [q] Iohn of Tynmouth, and [r] Thomas Otterbourne the Franciscan Fryer, recorded it as * a fame generally received, but fundry other auncient Stories; as Iohn Iohn of Lichfield, the Monke of Leicester, and Scala Mundi (to omit other [p] nameslesse Authours before Anno. 1483.) so confidently avouch his poisoning at Swinshed, that unpartiall [q] after-Writers, though friends to Monkery, made no scruple to believe it. And why should they not, sith an * Authour, more ancient and unexceptionable then all the rest, (even King Iohns Sonne and Successor in his Kingdome) averred it, [r] when, the Prior of Clerken-well fawcily telling him (being then in that house) that as soone as he ceaste to doe Iustice towards his Prelates, hee should cease to bee a King; the King enraged with his traiterous threat, replyed; What e meane you to turne me out of my Kingdome, and afterward to murder me, as my Father was dealt with?

(63) But not to trouble our selves with refuting a Gooſes gagling against Foxes true relation; ease it is to observe the hatred of Monkes against that King, both in thus procuring his death then, and his dishonour (a fecond death) in their flanderous inventions ever since. For, whereas he [s] writ by some of his Bishops to certaine forraine Princes, for aides against his faithleſſe Rebels; the Monkes charge him, that he counterfeited his Bishops Seales, and writ abroad, that all Englishmen were become Infidels and Apoſtates from Christs faith, and therefore such should come to subdue them, and take their poſſeſſions: [t] when hee faid, a Stag which hee kild, had never the leſſe fat, though he never heard a Maſſe; they charged him he doubted of the Reſurrection of the dead; [u] and in saying, hee never ſped well after his yeelding to the Pope, that he faid he was unfortunate ſince he was reconciled unto God: that, [x] when hee gave leave to a ſervant of his owne, to enter any religious Order, hee gave him leave to be of what Religion and Faith hee liſt. That moreover, [y] he offered his Kingdome to a Saracen, & would embrace the Turkiſh faith, though this tale were told by one Robert of London (a [z] wicked Maſſe-Prieſt, or rather a Monſter, [a] having a face like a Iew, with one arme long, and another ſhort, his like a Iew, with one arme long, and another ſhort, his fingers deformedly growing together two and two,) with ſuch ſenceles improbabilities, as [b] that he found that Mooriſh King reading of Saint Pauls Epiſtles, and that he refuſed the Kingdome of England being offered him, with the like. That laſtly [c] it was revealed to a Monke, King Iohn was in Hell; though a Poet for ſo ſaying, is by M. P. (& who made no doubt of King Iohns ſalvation) cenſured for a * Reprobate. Theſe all are demonſtrations of ſo incredible hatred, as ſhould rather alleviate their Authors credit, then the kings; whoſe Raigne had it not fallen in the time of ſo turbulent a Pope, ſo ambitious Neighbour Princes, ſo diſloyall Subjects, nor his Story into the hands of exaſperated Writers, he had appeared a King of as great renowne, as miſfortunes. His workes of devotion inferiour to none; as his Foundations declare at [h] Beauley, [i] Farrington, [k] Malmesbury, and [l] Dublin, and that other for Nunnes at Godſtow by Oxford, [m] for which ſome have interpreted that Prophecie of Merlin, as meant of him;

Sith Virgin-gifts to Maids hee gave,
Monges bleſſed Saints God will him ſave.

His Acts and Orders for the Weale-publike were beyond moſt: he being either the firſt, or the chiefeſt, who appointed thoſe noble Formes of Civill government in [o] London, and [p] moſt Cities, and Incorporate Townes of England, endowing them alſo with their greateſt Franchiſes; The [q] firſt who cauſed Sterling-money to be here coyned; The [r] firſt, who ordained the Honourable Ceremonies in Creating of Earles; The firſt, who [s] ſetled the Rates and Meaſures for Wine, Bread, Cloth, and ſuch like Neceſſaries of Commerce; The firſt, who planted Engliſh Lawes and Officers in Ireland, and both annexed that Kingdome, and faſtned Wales to the Crowne of England, thereby making amends for his loſſes in France; and thence, amongſt all the Engliſh Monarchs, he was the firſt who enlarged the Royall Style, with Lord of Ireland: a matter of greater import for Englands Peace, then all the French Titles ever yet have prooved. Whoſe whole courſe of Life and Actions, we cannot ſhut up with any truer Eulogy, then that which an ancient Authour hath conferred on him: Princeps quidem Magnus erat, ſed minus felix; atque ut Marius, utramque fortunam expertus; Doubtleſſe, he was a Prince more Great then happy, and one, who, like Marius, had tried both ſides of Fortunes wheele.

His Wives.

(64) Alice, the firſt wife of King Iohn, was the eldeſt of the two daughters, and heires apparent at that time, of Humbert the ſecond, Earle of Maurien, now called Savoy: her Mother was Clemence, daughter of Berthold, the fourth Duke of Leringen, who had beene the divorced wife of Henry the Lyon, Duke of Saxonie. This marriage was in their childhoode concluded by their Parents at Mounferrant in Averne, in February, Anno 1173; he ſhould have had with her, her Fathers Earledome, but all altered by her untimely death; and after enſued the death of her Mother, the new marriage of her Father, and iſſue male of the ſame, whereof the Dukes of Saxony are deſcended.

(65) Iſabel, his ſecond Wife (by * ſome called Hawiſia, or Avis) though the youngeſt of the three Siſters, yet was in regard of this marriage, the ſole Heire of William Earle of Glouceſter, Sonne of Earle Robert, the Naturall Sonne of King Henry the firſt; her Mother was Hawis the daughter of Robert Boſſu Earle of Leiceſter. She was married unto him when hee was Earle of Mortoine, in the firſt yeare of his brother Richards Raigne: and after ten yeares having no iſſue by him, was (the firſt yeare of his Raigne) divorced from him, under pretence of Conſanguinity, and married to Geffrey Mandevill Earle of Eſſex, and laſtly, to Hubert de Burgo Earle of Kent, but dyed without any Iſſue by them.

(66) Iſabel alſo his laſt Wife, was Daughter and Heire of Aimer Earle of Angoleſme; her Mother was Alice daughter of Peter, Lord of Courteney, fifth Son of Lewis the Groſſe, King of France. She was married unto him in the firſt yeare of his raigne, and crowned by Hubert Archbiſhop of Canterbury, 8. Id. Octob. Anno 1200. and ſurviving him, was married to Hugh Brun Earle of March, and Lord of Luſignian and Valence in Poyctou, to whom firſt ſhe ſhould have beene married, but yet (as ſeemeth) contrived her affection to him till now. By him ſhe had divers Children, (greatly advanced by the King, Henry 3. their halfe-Brother, and as greatly maligned by his Subjects) Hugh Earle of March and Angoleſme, Guy of Luſignian, ſlaine in the battle at Lewiſe, William of Valence Earle of Pembroke, Aymer of Valence Biſhop of Wincheſter, Geffrey of Luſignan Lord of Haſtings.

His Iſſue.

(67) Henry, the eldeſt Sonne of King Iohn, and Iſabel his laſt Wife, was borne at Wincheſter, 1. Octob. 10. of his Fathers Raigne, Anno 1208. King Iohn dying at Newarke, (* whither hee was brought in a Horſe-litter from Swinſhed,) the Barons malice was ended, their offence amended, Lewis of France rejected, and the yong Prince ſeated on his Fathers throne.

(68) Richard, his ſecond ſon by the ſame Queene, was borne the next yeare after Henry; by whom afterward he was made Knight, created Earle of Cornwall, and appointed Earle of Poyctou. After the death of William Earle of Holland, Emperour of the Weſt, he was by the Electors choſen to ſucceede him in the Empire, and crowned King of Romanes, and of Almayn at the City of Acon in Germany, by Conrade Archbiſhop of Coleyne, Maij 27. being the Aſcention day, Anno 1257. deceaſing at the Caſtle of Berkhamſted, April 20. Ann. 1271. the 13. yeare of his Empire, his his body was buried in his Monaſtery of Hailes in Glouceſterſhire, but * his Heart at Oxford in Reuly Abbey (founded by him) under a Pyramis of admirable work. Hee had three wives, the firſt was Iſabel daughter of William Marſhall Earle of Pembroke, widdow of Gilbert Clare Earle of Glouceſter; by whom he had iſſue, Henry ſlaine at Viterbo in Italy, and Iohn, both dying without iſſue. His ſecond wife was Sanches, (daughter of Raimund Earle of Prouince, and ſiſter to Queene Eleanor his brothers wife) who was crowned with him at Acon, and had iſſue by him Edmund Earle of Cornwall, and others. His laſt wife was Beatrice, Niece to the Archbiſhop of Colyne, who ſeemeth to have ſurvived him, & to have no Iſſue by him.

(69) Ioane, the eldeſt Daughter and Childe of King Iohn, and Queene Iſabel his laſt wife, was the firſt wife of Alexander the ſecond, King of Scots, married unto him in Yorke, Iunij 25. Anno 1221. who returning into England to viſite her Brother, deceaſed at London, and was buried in the Nunnery at Tarent in Dorſetſhire, 4. Martij, in the 21. yeare of her Brother King Henries raigne in England, and the 23. of king Alexander her husbands in Scotland, Anno 1236.

(70) Eleanor their ſecond daughter was firſt married to William Marſhall the younger, Earle of Pembroke: and after his deceaſe without iſſue, and ſeaven yeares Widow-hood, remarried to Simon Montfort Earle of Leiceſter, Sonne of Simon Earle Montfort in France, by Amice Daughter of Robert Blanchmane Earle of Leiceſter) who maintaining the Barons warres againſt King Henry her brother, was ſlaine at the battaile of Eueſham, in the 19. yeare of her brothers raigne, 1265; after whoſe death, ſhe, and her Children were forced to forſake England; ſhe dyed in the Nunnery at Montarges in France. Henry her eldeſt Sonne, was ſlaine with his Father at Eueſham: Simon, the ſecond, was Earle of Bigorre, and anceſtor to a Family of Mountforts in thoſe parts of France.

Almaricke, her third Sonne was firſt a Priеſt, and Treaſurer of the Cathedrall Church in Yorke, and after a Knight, and a valiant ſervitor in ſundry warres beyond the Seas. Guy the fourth Sonne was Earle of Angleria in Italy, and Progenitour of the Mountforts in Tuſcaine, and of the Earles of Campobachi, in the Kingome of Naples. Richard theſift Sonne, remained privily in England, and changing his name from Mountfort to Wellesborne, was anceſtor of the family of Welles bornes in England. She had alſo a daughter named Eleanor, borne in England, brought up in France, and married into Wales to Prince Lewellen ap Griffith.

(71) Iſabel, their youngeſt daughter was born An. 1214. when ſhe was 21. years of age, ſhe was married (being the ſixt and laſt wife) to the Emperour Frederick the ſecond, at the City of Worms in Germany, 20. of Iuly, 1235. She had iſſue by him, Henry appointed to be king of Sicily, and Margaret wife of Albert, Landgrave Thurin: ſhe was Empreſſe ſix years, and died in Child-bed, Decemb. 1. of her husbands Empire, 31. of her brothers reign, 38. An. 1241.

(72) Iane, or Ione, the daughter naturall of King Iohn (by Agatha Daughter of Robert Ferrers, Earle of Darby) married to Lewin Prince of Wales. Anno 1204. her Father gave with her the Caſtle and Lordſhip of Eliſmore in the Marches of Southwales; ſhe (like a moſt loving Child) gave her Father ſecret intelligence of the Treaſons intended againſt him by the Welſh and Engliſh.

(73) Geoffrey Fitz-Roy, a baſe Son, who tranſported ſome Souldiers into France, when Archbiſhop Hubert forbad the King his Father to goe thither.

(74) Richard, who married the Daughter and heire of Fulbert de Dover, who built Chilham Caſtle in Kent, which Caſtle he had with her, and had Iſſue by her, of which ſome families of good eſteeme are deſcended.

CHAPTER IX.

An. Dom. 1216. * Tyrrel. Neuſt.

HEnrie, the eldeſt ſonne of King Iohn, was, when his Father dyed, about * ten yeares of age: which ſtate of child-hood, being moſt unfit to ſucceed in ſo troublous a State, (the furious waves whereof ſeemed farre from being appeaſed) God Almighty, in favour and pitty of his innocency, ſtrengthned with the ſervice of great and worthy men, whereby the free and noble Realme of England was gratiouſly preſerved from French ſervilitie; from whoſe Continent as it was naturally diſparted with a Sea, ſo could it as badly have endured to be joyned thereto by ſubjectiue government. Howbeit the difficulties were not few nor ſleight, which did at firſt empeach this happy preſervation, though they did not hinder it long; for, * he diſpoſing the matter, who ordaineth all things wiſely, and moderates them ſweetly, faire weather was reſtored after ſtormes, and quiet being eſtabliſhed through the Kingdome, the peaceable ſeruants of God had ſpace to breath in.

(2) To effect ſo great a benefit, Wallo the Popes Legate ſtood wholly for advancement of Henry, and expulſion of the French; the authority of whoſe perſwaſions, joyned with his other power and example, drew many of the Prelates ſo farre, that (although their lands and goods were therefore ſpoyled) they would not doe any homage to Lewis; as likewiſe the loyall care of William Marſhall Earle of Pembrooke, did gaine (in time) and ſettle the hearts of the ſecular Lords. Great was the wiſedome, courage and diligence of that Noble Gentleman in ſo broken and jeopardous eſtate; for he, knowing that the maine hopes of his Countrey reſted in the ſafetie of their perſons, in whom the right of Succeſſion was, was, he firſt of all ſecured them within the Citie of Glouceſter, which was at Henries ſervice: There were with the young King, his mother Queene Iſabel, his brother Richard, (afterward King of Romans,) his ſiſters, the ſaid Earle, and many others in great numbers of the chiefe and principall men of all ſorts, who upon perfect notice of King Iohns death, repaired thither to their young Prince, with a purpoſe to conſult and concur in one, for the re-union of minds and bodies to the obedience of the true-borne King. The Earle of Pembroke therefore bringing forth his precious charge, and placing him with all due honour and ceremony in view of the aſſembled States, is reported for the pleaſing of all ſides, to have uſed words to this effect: *Albeit the father of this Prince, whom here you ſee before you, for his evill demeanors hath worthily undergone our perſecution, yet this young Childe, as he is in yeares tender, ſo is hee pure and innocent from thoſe his fathers doings: Wherefore, ſith every man is to be charged with the burthen of his owne tranſgreſſions, neither ſhall the Childe (as Scriptures teach us,) beare the iniquitie of his Father: wee ought of dutie and conſcience, beare our ſelves milder towards this tender Prince, and take compaſſion of his age. And for as much as he is the Kings * lawfull and eldeſt Sonne, and ought to be our Soveraigne, and his Succeſſour, let us with one joynt aſſiſtance appoint him our King and Governour; let us remove from us this Lewis the French Kings ſonne, and ſuppreſſe his people, which are a confuſion and ſhame to our Nation, and the yoakes of their ſervitude let us caſt off from our ſhoulders.*

* Take ſee Annals in Hen. 3.

The great prudence and care of wil. Marſhall.

(3) The entertaining of perſwaſions among the wiſe, is an effect of Truth, not of painted Phraſes; and theſe plaine words of the Earle, (the yong Kings Brother in law) were received with generall applauſe of all that were preſent, ſo that Henry was immediately proclaimed, and ſpeedily crowned (upon the day of S S. Simon and Iude) in the preſence both of Wallo the Popes Legate, (who impoſed on his unexperienced yeares ſome undue oathes of ſervice to the Roman See,) and of Queene Iſabel, with many of the Lords Spirituall and Secular, and ſtore of all other ſorts of people. The ſpeed of which Royall Ceremony (for it was the ninth day after King Iohns death) was not greater then the neceſſity of the State required: for his enemy, (nor onely his, but the enemy of the Engliſh name, Prince Lewis) had (as yet) London, the chiefe ſeat of the Empire, at his devotion many potent Earles, Barons, and martiall male-contents, ſubject to his command, and an Army in the field with which he fought to conſtraine that mirrour of conſtant loyalty, Hubert de Burgo, to render him the moſt important Caſtle in England, that of Dover, committed to his much-approved truſt. The young King on the other ſide was environed with many difficulties, want of money not the leaſt, the moſt part of his Fathers treaſures being drowned. To encounter all which miſchiefes, the ſaid Earle of Pembrooke was by common aſſent of Prelates and Peeres conſtituted Guardian of the yong Kings perſon, and Vice-Governour of the Kingdome.

(4) Letters hereupon iſſuing in the new Kings name, and for his affaires, to all ſuch as had charge in the Common-weale, (with many promiſes of reward and favour,) were accordingly in moſt places obeyed: for the evill-will borne to King Iohn, ſeeming to die with him, and to be buried in the ſame grave, the loyall bloud waxt warme about the coldeſt hearts, re-kindling in them the honeſt deſire of ſhewing themſelves true Engliſhmen. It was alſo a great helpe to the Kings party, that Prince Lewis his followers and Abettours, were, on every Sunday and Holiday, pronounced to ſtand accurſt, and excommunicated. Lewis perceiving, (contrary to his expectation) that King Iohns death was to him nothing availeable, but rather detrimentall, dwels no longer about Dover-Caſtle, but raiſing his ſiege, enters London, and provides the beſt he can for his tottering eſtate, which he fought to ſupport, by putting French Garriſons into Caſtles; The * Tower of London being rendred to him, hee beſiegeth Hertford Caſtle, which after the ſlaughter of many French, being delivered upon faire compoſition, the cuſtody of that Piece was demanded by Richard Fitz-Walter, as by ancient right belonging to him; but Lewis put him off with this anſwere; That hee ſhould have patience, till hee had conquered the Realme, at which time hee would reſtore their rights to every one. The ſecret reaſon which moved Lewis to give this anſwere, was: for that, conſulting with his French upon Fitz-Walters demaund, they gave it for their common opinion: That the Engliſh were not worthy to have ſuch places entruſted to their charge, who were betrayers of their naturall Lord. A juſt reaſon to move Lewis ſo to anſwere, but a farre better to teach others to continue loyall. The Caſtle of Berkhamſted, (whoſe Captaine was one Walerano a valiant Dutch Knight) hopleſſe of ſuccours, was likewiſe rendred, which as the reſt, he ſtuffed with French Garriſons; wherein, how ſoever he provided for his owne Nation during that preſent, hee tooke no wiſe courſe for the maine of his enterpriſe: for ſo apparent jealouſies, (ſeconding and confirming the Vicount Melunes predictions) could not but utterly unſettle the affections of ſuch great ones as had called him in. His next March being to Saint Albans, where he would have conſtrained the Abbot to doe him homage, hee was encountred with this honeſt anſwer: * That he would doe him no homage, unleſſe hee were abſolved from the homage which hee had made to the King of England: yet to purchaſe reſpite of homage, or rather his, and the Townes peace till Candlemas, hee was forced to uſe the mediation both of his * purſe, and of his noble friends.

(5) But thoſe inteſtine cauſes for which the Barons had called Lewis in, falling now to the ground by the death of King Iohn, and the French by their naturall inſolence, ſuſpicions and vanity, miniſtring new reaſons of averſion, were all of them ſtrong motives to diſpoſe the mindes of the Engliſh Lewyſians to returne to due obedience; yet finding themſelves bound in honour, not ſo to leave him ſodainly deſtiture (who upon affiance of their oathes and hoſtages had put himſelfe among them) that hee ſhould thereby fall into Heavries hands; they deſire therefore his abſence, but not his deſtruction. The more handſomely to compaſſe the reſt, an abſtinence from warre was (for a time) concluded betweene the King and Lewis; the rather, for that Lewis had intelligence from Rome, that the curſe which Wallo had denounced againſt him, ſhould ſhortly bee confirmed by the Pope, unleſſe he left England. As this Truce gave Lewis libertie to ſayle back to France for new ſupplies from his Father, (who greatly deſired to conferre with him;) ſo his abſence gave opportunity to his Engliſh, to conſult more freely of their beſt way; that from thence-forth Lewis was never potent in their affections, but * preſently loſt many chiefe Lords and others, who againe became true Engliſh.

(6) Lewis upon his ſpeedy returne out of France, minding to make a ſpeedy diſpatch, ſets out of London his Army of more then twentie thouſand Souldiers, with a purpoſe not onely to free * Mont-Sorrel, (then beſieged by his enemies) but to ſubdue the whole Countrey adjoyning. Odious and grievous to the Countries was this paſſage of the French, which reach as farre as Lincolne, there were among them ſo many ragged Raſcals, the * very ſcumme and filthy froth of that Nation, whoſe beggery was ſo baſe, that they had not cloathes to hang on their backes, to ſupply the which they made many goe naked in all the places where they marched. The Earle of Pembrooke, Governour of the King, * by the Counſell of Wallo, and the Biſhop of Wincheſter, reſolving to ſet the cauſe upon God, and the fortune of a Field, is now with the young King and his aſſiſtant Aſſiſtant Lords, at Newarke, where the generall Aſſembly for that ſervice was appointed. The whole Army after the Muſters, reſted there ſome dayes, which they ſpent not in vanities, but in devotions and receit of the Sacrament, humbling themſelves before the offended Majeſtie of God; and ſo all of them (ſaith Paris) being prepared, reſolve either to returne victorious, or to die in defence of their countrey, their Soveraignes right, and their owne Liberties, and poſſeſſions, all which ſeemed now to lye at ſtake. To give them the greater edge and ſpirit, Wallo with great ſolemnity accurſeth Lewis and his Coajutors, and thus the Army marcheth towards Lincolne, and the Lewyſians there in ſiege of the Caſtle: the King himſelfe being left with a ſtrong guard at Stow, (about eight miles ſhort of Lincolne) accompanied with Wallo and others, there without perill of his perſon to attend Gods pleaſure, in the event of the enterprize.

(7) Vpon their approach, if the Counſell of * ſome Engliſh Lords had beene followed, the Lewyſian Army had iſſued forth of the Citie, and given them battle in the open field; but the Earle of Perch, (the French Generall) thinking the Kings party to bee greater then it was, for that the Noblemen and Banneretes thereof had each of them two Enſignes, the one borne with themſelves, the other advanced among the carriages, which doubled the ſhew of their numbers; they did thereupon change that courſe, cloſed the gates of the Citie, and plyed their endevours againſt the Caſtle more fiercely then before. The Earle of Pembroke therefore lets Falcaſius ſlip in at the Caſtle poſterne with his Arbalaſters, whiles others breake up the South-gate of the City, at which the Kings Army moſt couragiouſly entring, and they of the Caſtle ſallying out in Flancke of the Enemy, ſcattered, & utterly defeated the Lewyſians. The Earle of Pearch, their Generall, being environed with the Royaliſts, and willed to render himſelfe, ſware that he would never become Priſoner to any Engliſh: upon which refuſall he was run through the ſight of his helmet into the braines, and ſo dyed without ſpeaking any word. In this conflict, (being on Saturday in Whitſon-weeke) the force of naturall propenſion was apparent; for notwithſtanding the fiery reſolutions of the Kings people, yet when they ſaw the faces of their kinſmen, friends and countrymen on the other ſide, their fury relented ſo ſtrongly, that the moſt part of the revenge fell upon the Horſes, and not upon the Horſemen, whom onely they laboured to make their Captives. The whole riches of the Lewyſian Campe, and of the City of Lincolne, became the booty and ſpoile of the Kings Army, whereupon this diſcomfiture was called Lewis Fair. Neither did the Clergy of the place eſcape, for the Popes Legate had commanded that they alſo ſhould be riſted to a penny, as perſons excommunicated in partaking with Lewis. The Chaſe was but coldly and fainedly followed upon the flying Barons, otherwiſe nor a man could have eſcaped, wherein yet the chiefeſt Baronswere taken, with about * 400. Knights, beſides Eſquires, and of other ſorts without note or number, though * ſome ſay that this number of Knights were ſlaine, and Matrons and women of the Towne flying by boat, which they had no skill to governe, were drowned. Such as eſcaped the fight were not therefore paſt the danger; for the Country people fell upon them as they fled, killing great numbers, ſo that almoſt all the footmen tooke up their laſt lodgings before they could reach to London, where Lewis was. The Marſhall of France, the Caſtellan of Arras, and about two hundreth Knights came ſafely thither, but were not otherwiſe then fowerly welcome of the Prince, who laid upon their cowardiſe the loſſe of all the reſt. His feare of being taken Priſoner juſtly encreaſing, hee fortifies London by the beſt meanes hee can, and diſpatcheth Poſts into France for more reliefe. This great victory was much the ſtranger, if (as * ſome write the ſame went) that onely there were ſlaine upon both ſides, the Earle of Perch, one of Dubrents Knights, and an obſcure fellow belonging to ſome, or other of the Barons.

(8) The Kings Governour after the victory rode preſently with the gladſome tidings in the height of ſpeede to the King and Legate, who with teares of joy gave God thankes. But the noble Earle nor leaving his worke imperfect, ſeekes to embarre Lewis from forraging about London. Meane while by the diligence of Lady Blanch the wife of Lewis, Euſtace the ruffianly Apoſtata, (who of a Monke becomming a * Demoniacke) was now upon the Sea with a freſh ſupply of men and munition bound for London; But God was no better pleaſed with theſe, then with the other ſcatterlings at Lincolne. For the Engliſh Navie, having the winde of the French, ſinke diverſ of their Ships by tilting at them with the yron Prowes or Beakes of their Gallies; uſing alſo unſlacked lime in duſt or powder, which they threw into the faces of their enemies, and blinded their ſight: ſo were the hopes of Lewis for any preſent ſuccours abſolutely fruſtrated. Euſtace himſelfe, found after long ſearch, and drawne out from the bottome of the Pumpe in a French Ship, at Dover had his head cut off, though * ſome ſay he was ſlaine by Richard, a baſe-ſonne of King Iohn. The newes of which ſucceſſe being brought to the king, did not more rejoyce him, then they wounded Lewis, for the loſſe was not onely great in men, but in all ſorts of riches and proviſions. To give now no reſt to Lewis his declining fortunes, the Earle of Pembroke with a mighty Army beſieged London, and Lewis therein, as well by Water as by Land; ſeeking to drive him by penurie to render the City. It came to capitulation, and in an Ilet in the River of Thames, not farre from Staines, the King, Wallo the Legate, and William Marſhall, the Kings Governour, met with Lewis and the Barons to finiſh the Peace: for Lewis had promiſed to doe as Wallo and the Earle would deviſe, ſo that it might not tend to his diſhonour or ſcandall: Heads or Articles of the agreement which Lewis ſware upon the Goſpell to performe, were, 1. That Lewis, the Barons, and other his partakers ſhould ſtand to the judgement of the Church, (whoſe cenſures they had now ſome yeares contemned) and from thenceforth be and remaine true to the ſame. 2. That hee and his ſhould forthwith depart the land, never to returne againe with a purpoſe to doe harme. 3. That hee ſhould doe his beſt to draw his Father to make reſtitution of all ſuch things in France as belonged to the King of England, and that Lewis when himſelfe was King ſhould quietly part withthem. 4. That Lewis ſhould immediately render to King Henry all holds and places taken in the warre. On the other part, the King, the Legate, and the Earle ſware; 1. That the King ſhould reſtore to the Barons, and others, all their rights and inheritances, with all the Liberties formerly demaunded of his Father. 2. That none (of the Laity) ſhould ſuffer dammage or reproch for taking part on either ſide. 3. That Priſoners ſhould be releaſed, &c. Whereupon Lewis with his adherents was formerly by Wallo abſolved from the ſentence of Excommunication, and ſo they ranne on all ſides into embracements, and parted in the kiſſe of Peace. The * Welſh, who had held with the Barons, were left out of this Concluſion, being thereby laide open to ſpoyle. Thus was * Lewis * driven out of England, whom the Earle of Pembroke brought to the Sea-ſide, and the realme was cleared.

(9) There are * who write how that Lewis had a great ſumme of money paide him for reſtoring the Hoſtages; but Matth. Paris whom * ſome cite to that purpoſe, affirmes no ſuch matter in any printed Copy. Reaſon ſurely is utterly againſt it; for when even the life of Lewis was after a ſore in King Henries hand, with what ſenſe can it ſtand that the King ſhould ſet all the Freſich free without ranſome, and yet himſelfe pay money for the Hoſtages? which alſo were not his, but the Hoſtages of his enemies enemies the Barons; so that, if money were due, it must have come from them, not from the King, who both in honour and profit was rather obliged to the contrary. Writers of that very time doe in plaine words say, The poverty of Lewis was such, that he was compelled to borrow five thousand pounds of the Londoners, to set him out of England: and therefore that other seemes nothing else but a vaine gloze to salve the honour of Lewis, who was plainely driven out of England (after so high hopes) with losse, sorrow, and eternall disgrace, which the French are so sensible of, that they scarce seeme to write of the whole action, otherwise then * laying the misfortune of Lewis upon the Barons mutability.

(10) The Realme of England purged of those forraigne dregs, was not therefore presently freed from other manifold encumbrances, such as after so great a tossing of all lawes and things divine, and humane, doe ordinarily flote up and downe, like the froth and working of a troubled Sea. For divers men presuming upon their former services to the State, or thinking the old bad World would either continue still, or soone returne, if Iustice grew confident against Trespassors, or for what other corrupt motives soever, did dare intollerable things. The *principall Lords of this misrule, were William Earle of Aumarl, Falcasius de Brent with his Garrison soldiers, Robert de Veipont, with others, who having had the Castles and possessions of certaine Bishops and Great men, either to keepe in trust, or otherwise by iniquitie of the times converted violently to their uses; did still with-hold the same, both against the minds of their lawfull owners, and the Kings expresse prohibition. Among others, Robert de Gangi detended the Castle of Newarke, (being the Fee of the Bishop of Lincolne, as was also the towne it self:) against the Kings Armie, conducted by the * Great Marshall Earle of Pembroke, for eight dayes, and did not first yeeld the place, before (by mediation of friends) the Bishop paide to Gangi one hundreth pounds. There was in that great Earle, a perpetuall care to conclude things without bloud-shed, wherein shined his Christian piety and morall wisedome, there being no other so safe way to settle disordered humours. The greater was his losse both to the King and State, by his death, * soone after ensuing, whose * monument yet remaining, doth not so much eternize his memory, as that well-deserved * Epitaph, the Epitome of his noble vertues;

Sum quem Saturnum sibi sensit Hibernia, Solem
Anglia, Mercurium Normannia, Gallia Martem.

Irelands Saturne, Englands Sunne am I,
The Mars of France, and Normans Mercurie.

He left behinde him five sonnes, all Earles of Pembroke successively, and dying without issue; his five Daughters advanced by great marriages, brought as great advantage to their husbands issue, by the inheritances of their issuelesse brethren.

(11) The King, (governed after Marshals death, by Peter Bishop of Winchester, and such * other, whom the Bishop had procured to joyne in administration of publique affaires) seeming now to have settled and calme estate, resolves (for good hopes sake) to be crowned againe; which was performed by Stephen Archbishop of Canterbury at Westminster, with the attendance and confluence of all the Prelates, Peeres, and People. Vpon the * Saturday before his Coronation, the * new worke of the Abbey Church at Westminster, (Paris calls it the Chappell of our Lady,) was begunne, whereof the King himselfe in person laid the first stone, as if hee meant the World should know, his intention was to consecrate his future actions to raise the glory of God. This calme, but new beginning, was almost as speedily distempered and disturbed by sodaine stormes; by reason that, while the King kept his Christmas with great royalty at Oxford, in the company of the Prelates and Peeres of England, William de Forsibus, Earle of Aumarl, incited by Falcasius de Brent, and the like riotous Gentlemen, sodainely departed from the Court without leave, and (whether it were upon discontentment, because the King had againstt the Earles will the last yeare taken *some Castles into his hands, or out of an evill ignorance how to live in quiet) he manned the Castle of Biham, victuals it with the Corne of the Chanons of Bridlington, spoyles the Towne of Deeping, and under shew of repayring to the Parliament, seizeth on the Castle of Fotheringhay, committing many other furious riots in contempt of the King, and breach of his peace; many * others in other places following his lewd example. Yet at length the Earle coming in under the conduct of Walter Archbishop of Yorke, was at the suite of Pandulph (who succeeded Wallo in the place of Legate) pardoned; and the like hurtfull clemency was extended toward his Complices and Retinue, whom the King in regard belike of some former better deserts) for free without punishment or ransome. And to prevent any further disturbances of that nature, Hubert de Burgo, Earle of Kent, for his rare integrity and fidelity (approoved in all King Johns troubles) was also made governour of the Kings person, and chiefe Iusticiar of England, with the generall allowance of all the States. What neede the Land then had of a severe proceeding, wee may judge by this, that Foulk de Brent held the Earledomes of Northampton, Oxford, Bedford, and Buckingham, with the Castles and Holds; Philip de Marc, the Castles of Peke and Nottingham, Nottinghamshire, and Darbishire; and others detained other portions; without any other right, then that which the iniquity of the late tumults gave.

(12) It was no small addition to the troublesomnesse of this time, that certaine * Lords of Wales, and (as * some say) Prince Lewelin himselfe, desirous to rid their Marches of the English, rose in Armes, and laide siege to the Castle of Buelt, which invited King Henry to draw thither with an Armie, but the worke was made easie by the voluntary departure of the Welsh, upon the fame of the Kings approach: which appearances of some ensuing stirres, moved the king to thinke of strengthening himselfe with faithfull alliances; and not long after, Alexander King of Scots came to Yorke, (who in the yeare * before had met King Henry at the same place, and there tooke to wife the Lady Ioan King Henries sister; and Hubert de Burgo, in presence of both the Kings, married the Lady * Margaret sister to Alexander; Boetius * saith, that two great Lords of England married two sisters of King Alexander at that place. About which time, * Isabel Queene Dowager of England, without the leave of her sonne the King, or of his Counsell, croft the Seas, and tooke to husband the Earle of March in France. The yong King supposing his estate at home now somewhat settled, and his eyes beginning to grow cleare-sighted by the benefire of experience, forgets not to looke about his affaires abroad; and first sends * Savarie de Mulcon to be his Lieutenant in Aquitaine, where yet the English held the greater part, and dispatcheth Ambassadours to Philip King of France; for restitution according to the Articles with Lewis: whereunto answere was made, that nothing ought to be restored which by right of warre had beene atchieved; but (as it seemes) there was a Truce for * foure yeares agreed upon betweene the two Monarches, concerning the County of Poictou.

(13) The State both of Church and Commonwealth in those troubled dayes, seeme to have much resemblance; every man daring to attempt in either, what his owne audaciousnesse would suggest, or others connivency permit. But Stephen Archbishop of Canterbury (who himselfe was lately the Ring-leader of disorders both in State and Church) is now become very diligent in his Provinciall Synode at Oxford, Oxford, * about reformation of the Clergie, where also was convented before him an execrable Impostor, who seeing how current all grosseft delusions passed in those daies of blindnesse, was emboldned to suffer himselfe to be wounded in his hands, feete, and side, (an horrour to thinke) that by the resemblance of those bloudy impressions, he might perswade the people (apt to beleeve any thing) that hee was their very Saviour: whose deserved punishment was by immuring betweene two walls, as a monster too impious and unworthy to die by any humane hand. There was immured with him a curs'ed olde beast, who pretended to be Mary the mother of this Christ, and well might be, if their manners be compared; * some adde a third also, who named her selfe Mary Magdalen. The punishment by Crucifixion which * some thinke was executed upon the man at Arbarbery, is neither so credible nor tolerable, as in which Christianity it selfe might seeme to sustaine reproach; it being also against the * ancient law of Constantine, the first famous Christian Emperour, that any should from thence-forth die by crucifixion; but it may be, that it was first so judged (which might cause the relators errours,) though afterward upon sounder deliberation changed into a more fitting censure. But strange it is, that this man deserving (as he did) so severe a judgement at Oxford, S. Francis, whose fiction and imposture was the very same, (for the * wounds, though not for the name, of Christ) * so soon after deserved for it to be canonized at Rome, for a Chiefe of Saints; and perhaps if this Monster had beene at Rome, he had beene likewise Sainctified, or if Saint Farncis had beene at Oxford, he had beene likewise immured.

(14) In the State of the Common-wealth incredible darings (though of inferiour quality to that former) were not wanting, against the majesty of the King; as appeared by Constantine Fitz-Arnulf, a Citizen of London: who upon colour of a popular tumult, by him purposely cherished, (which rose at pastimes of wrestling, and like masteries betweene the Citizens of London, and others of the Suburbes,) attempted to set up a Lewis againe, and in the heat of the sedition, he trayterously cryed, * Mount-Ioy, Mount-Ioy, God for us, and our Lord Lewis. Though the [b] Lord Maior, a discreete man, earnestly perswaded dutifull behaviours, yet Constantine had made the people incapable of good Counsell with his seditious Proclamations, which hee there caused to be [c] published. The secret of this conspiracy was [d] revealed by [e] another Citizen, and without question was farther spred then the compasse of one Citie, even as farre as into the hearts of all such turbulent people, to whom warre was beneficiall, and Quiet banefull. The chiefe Iusticiar hearing of these matters, with forces assembled, entred [f] the Tower, whither hee commaunded the principall men of the Citie to come, who easily put off the blame from themselves upon Fitz-Arnulf. But hee as resolute in his answere, as desperate in the sedition, complayned of himselfe in the hearing of all, that he had done lesse therein then hee ought; yet fifteene thousand Markes sterling hee offered for his life, when hee saw the halter about his necke, (for with his Crier, and his Nephew, the next day hee was hanged,) but no price could redeeme him out of the hand of Iustice: [g] It is said, that he so confidently answered, upon truth of the Articles and Oath betweene the King and Lewis, that the partakers of Lewis should not be troubled; and that, upon this occasion, Lewis denied restitution of such things, as the Articles did mention, pretending that Henry had therein broken first his faith, and thereby made the whole contract frustrate. Execution thus done without noise, or the Londoners privitie, the Iusticiar accompanied with Falcasius and his armed troupes, enters London, apprehends such others as were culpable, and for a terrour to the rest, causeth their [h] hands or feet to be cut off, and then set them at libertie. The King deposed the Magistrates, though some write that the tumult was appeased by the Major; but when the King found, that onely the [i] baser fort were interessed in the disorder, he was reconciled to the Citie, having first thus weeded this chiefe Garden of the English Empire, and pluckt up the roots of the Masterbramble.

(15) This dangerous beginning might have had farre worse proceedings, if the King, though in yeeres tender, yet had not been so provident, as to have foreseene it, and so, with patient connivence at some particular indignities, prevented a publique disquiet. For the Barons, still minding their long desired Liberties, and requiring a confirmation of them by the King, who at the concluded peace with Lewis, had sworne thereto; William Brivere, one of the Kings Councell, answered; that the Liberties which they demand, ought not to be observed, because they were violently extorted. But words growing heereupon, and Archbishop Stephen, (the Barons ancient Abettour) kindling thereat, the young King prudently shut up the whole strife with this speech; All of us have sworne to those Liberties, and that which wee have sworne, all of us are bound to observe. His Deed immediately sealed his Word, (for he saw he durst doe no other,) and Writs were sent forth, to enquire upon Oathes, what Liberties or free Customes were current, in, and from the time of King Henry his Grand-father: by which Act, all mens hopes were raised to expect the full conclusion of all those grievous contentions, which had so long encombred the Kingdome. The like hope was conceived of better successes then before, in forraine affaires, upon newes of the death of King Philip of France, the ever-deadly (and now dead) Enemy of Englands wel-fare; which mooved the King to send the Archbishop of Canterbury, and three other Bishops to Lewis, now crowned King of France, there to demand the Duchie of Normandy, and such other lands on that side of the Sea, as before his departure out of England, hee had sworne to restore: but his answer was; 1. That hee held those possessions by a just title, as hee was ready to shew King Henry, if hee would come to his Court to make his demand: 2. That the King of England had violated his Oath, for that such as were taken at Lincolne were grievously fined. 3. That such Liberties of England, for which the warre was first mooved, and had beene granted at his departure, and since confirmed by Oath, were not onely not observed, but the old wicked ones reduced, and generally farre worse ordained in their place. With which solutions to their demand, the Ambassadours were faine to returne, and Henry left to come by his owne as he could.

(16) The King well perceiving, how unable hee should bee either to recover those his Transmarine Dominions, or almost to maintaine his owne royall estate at home, if such, as by the unruliness of former times having gotten possession of Crowne-Lands, might still with-hold them, resolved to resume them; by advise principally of Stephen Archbishop of Canterbury, and Hubert de Burgo Earle of Kent, who thereby drew upon themselves no small loads of envie. Which recovery of such parcels of the royall Patrimony, though it were no lesse needfull then lawfull; yet by reason the interessed were so many, (and such as wanted no will to tosse the whole Kingdome, rather then forgoe their holdings,) they wisely used all the strengths which Religion or humane policie could give. First therefore [k] there was procured a Briefe from the Pope, by which both the King was declared to bee at libertie to choose his owne Councell, and governe by himselfe, (which, who doubteth but hee might have done without the Popes Bull?) and all men commanded under paine of Censures to restore such things as against law and the Kings will, they detained from him. This put the interessed into a will to raise Armes; meeting for that purpose at Leicester, where the Cestrian Earle and his [l] Confederates consult, how they (under the ſpecious pretext of removing the Earle of Kent, as one whoſe predominating greatneſſe, and evill offices againſt them, were not to be by them endured,) might dereine the Caſtle and other poſſeſſions demanded. But upon notice, that (if forthwith they did not render backe what they unjuſtly held,) they ſhould by name be preſently excommunicated; and that the King, (now at Northampton) had with him not onely an honeſter cauſe, [a] but a greater number of Souldiers, (which they much more feared then all their flaſhes of Excommunication,) they following a [b] wiſer courſe, repayred forthwith to the King, rendring up into his hands all that belonged to the Crowne; but did not lay downe their diſpleaſure, for that, on their petition, the King would not put from him his chiefe Iuſticiar, the object of their Envie.

(17) Meane while Lewis King of France not contented to deny the demaunded reſtitution upon his alleaged pretexts, invades ſuch other parts as [c] King Henry peaceably held in Poictou and Xaintoing; the beſt colour and reaſon given for it, [d] is, That whereas Aquitaine (whereof Xaintoing and Poictou were part) was holden of the Crowne of France by homage, the King of England, being not hindred by ſickneſſe nor other neceſſitie, was not preſent at the Coronation of Lewis, nor excuſed his abſence by Ambaſſadours. In proſecution of which pretence he tooke [e] Rochel, (the principall Port of Xaintoing) with other places, and overthrew in a Battle, Savarie de Malleon alſo, Lieutenant for King Henry in Aquitaine: upon which overthrow the loſſe of thoſe foreſaid Townes, with the whole Countrey of Poictou, (as [f] one ſaith) enſued. Withall, the King loſt the ſervice of the ſaid Savarie, a valiant commaunder, who for ſome indignitie offered unto him by William Longeſpe Earle of Salisbury, (ſ ſent over by King Henry, upon ſome diſtaſte of Savaries doings, with commiſſion to overview his courſes,) ſodainely turned French, among whom he had great credit & preferment. King Henry ill brooking to great a defalcation of his forraine eſtates, determined to have recourſe to the generall aide of his people, for meanes to recover his loſſes, but while (for that purpoſe) hee held [a h] Parliament, the whole Aſſembly was ſodainly troubled with juſt complaints of an inſufferable outrage.

(18) For Henry de Braibrocke, a Iuſtice Itinerant, who with other held the Aſſiſes at Dunſtable, was ſodainely ſurprized, (and impriſoned under ſtrong Garriſon in Bedford-Caſtle,) by the commandement of Falcaſius, enraged, for that thirty verdicts had there paſſed againſt him, upon trialls of title for Lands which hee had forceably entred. The Iudges Wife with her teares ſo mooved the whole Parliament to indignation and pitty, that all other buſineſſes ſet apart, the Clergy as well as the Laity forthwith attended the King to the ſiege. Falcaſius himſelfe flying into Wales, there to contrive a greater body of Rebellion, did leave his brother, Lieutenant in the Caſtle with a deſperate crew, having victuals and munition for an whole yeeres reſiſtance. Yet after two moneths ſiege the Caſtle being taken, the Iudge was enlarged, the Lieutenant and his whole retinue hanged, the pile it ſelfe (as a denne of Theeves) demoliſhed; and an example given what others ſhould truſt unto, who did not in due time ſubmit themſelves to their Soveraigne. This [i] Falcaſius was a Norman by birth, and a baſtard, who comming over in poore ſort under King Iohn, ſo behaved himſelfe in the Kings ſervices, that in regard of his all-daring forwardneſſe, Bedford was given him to defend againſt the Barons; where by rapine and violence hee had drawne together the ſhew of a great fortune, beſides that which he had in marriage with Margaret de Riparis, a great inheritrix, whom King Iohn, to her no leſſe diſcontentment, then diſparagement had beſtowed upon him. But now when this Caſtle, beyond his imaginatio was thus beaten to the earth, and all other his poſſeſſions ſeized by the King; he procures Alexander Biſhop of Coventree to ſafe conduct him to Bedford, where hee throwes himſelfe at the Kings feete, imploring mercy for his former good ſervices. Hee was, after pardon of life hardly gotten, ſent into perpetuall [k] baniſhment; at which time hee with teares deſired the Earle of Warren, (who had in charge to ſee him ſhipt away,) That hee would commend him to the King, and let him know (a ſecret fit for the King to take notice of) that all the troubles which hee had raiſed in the Realme, were by the onely inſtigation of the Barons. Notwithſtanding the King was ſo incenſed for the keeping this Caſtle againſt him, that hee commaunded all [l] Strangers to depart the Realme within a time there limited under great penalty.

(19) The interrupted Counſels of Parliament, and purpoſes of the King for recovery of his Poictovine inheritances, were now againe reſumed; yet the King could not there (but upon condition [m] that he ſhould graunt their Liberties, the ſtring which was ever harped on,) obtaine a fifteenth, nor the good will of the States to furniſh him in his French hoſtilities: Thus the King, [n] drawne with deſire of money (whoſe of his want was very urgent) grants thoſe his Charters under his Seale, and was ſo further wrought on, that oathes were (by royall commandement) taken, to tie all men to the obſervation of the ſaide Graunts, according to the very Letter, if that be the meaning of [o] literaturam juramentum, and not ſomthing elſe. Vpon the ſtrength of this money, (whoſe daily expenſe, like vitall nourishment, keepes all great actions alive,) Richard Earle of Cornwall the Kings brother, William Longeſpe Earle of Saliſbury, and about threeſcore Knighs with competent forces were ſent into Gaſcoign in the Spring; where they ſafely arrived at Burdeaux, and were honourably entertained. This timely arrivall had good effects, for it confirmed the well-diſpoſed, ſetled the irreſolute, and reduced much which had beene extorted by the French. Hugh Earle of the Marches of Poictou, comming by the French Kings direction to remove Earle Richard and the Engliſh from the ſiege of the Riol, was with all his Forces intercepted [p] by an Ambuſcado, and diſcomfited with no ſmall loſſe of men, munition, and carriages. All ſides were in the end contented to pauſe without parliance, and the Engliſh held Aquitaine deſpite their force or practiſes. But William Longeſpe the Kings Vncle ſurvived not long his good ſervices in thoſe parts; who returning (upon buſineſſe of State) into England, ſoone ended his daies at his Caſtle of Saliſbury, with ſo great humility and pietie, that at poynt of death he would not receive the holy Euchariſt in his Bed, (which devotion is alſo reported of King Henry the eight) but upon his bare knees on the ground, which hee moiſtened with aboundance of penitent teares. Vpon which great Earle this Epitaph was made:

Otto in rage of this unexpected revocation, like a brave Romane threw the Popes letters into the fire, yet durſt not diſobey the Contents. And whereas the meſſage it ſelfe had beene ſcanned and ſifted to the very bran, both heere and in * France, and judged to ſavour of ſo univerſall an oppreſſion, as might cauſe a generall diſcreſſion from the Church of Rome; the King in preſence of his Prelates and Peeres, turned off the Popes covetous demand with this thrifty anſwer: The things which the Pope would perſwade unto, doe ſtretch themſelves as farre as the Chriſtian World is wide, and becauſe England is but an Out-Angle thereof, therefore when wee ſee other Kingdomes give us an example, hee ſhall then finde us the more forward to obey.

(21) That difficultie ſo avoyded; the King was earneſtly bent to make a voyage in perſon to the ayde of his brother Earle Richard, who purſued the affaires of Gaſcoigne; which though by the late Earle of Sariſburies death it received ſome mayme, yet by the fortitude and counſell of other noble perſons, it did ſtill proſper. This intention and deſire was ſtaid by the receit of Letters out of France, which declared the King his brothers health, and the good ſucceſſe of affaires. The King, (ſome ſay) among his Counſellors of State, had one William de Perepound, a great Aſtrologer, who fore-told that Lewis King of France ſhould not prevaile; and this affirmation did the rather withhold him at that preſent. There is who * writes, that King Henry (upon the Popes Letters) forbare to attempt any thing in France at that time, leſt he ſhould hinder Lewis, who was then upon an enterpriſe againſt the remaines of the Albigenſes in Languedoc, Province, and the parts about. Theſe men were traduced for Heretikes, and ſo condemned by the See of Rome; but what their Hereſie was, a * Fryer (who writes againſt them) reports, ſaying, *They were of all other the moſt pernicious Sect; for antiquity, ſome holding they were from the Apoſtles time; for generality, there ſcarſe being any Nation where they are not; and laſtly, for ſhew of piety, in that they live juſtly before men, and beleeve all things touching God aright, and all the Articles of the Creede, * onely they blaſpheme and hate the Church of Rome.* No marvaile if this horrible hereſie did trouble his Holineſſe: and therefore, whereas his Predeceſſor, and himſelfe had kept much adoe in Chriſtendome, to excite men to take the ſigne of the Croſſe, and warre againſt the Turke, (which the Fryers did perſwade men unto, teaching, that * whoſoever were polluted with any bainous offence, as Parricide, Inceſt, Sacrideige, hee was preſently acquited both from the ſinne, and the puniſhment of it, if hee thus tooke the Croſſe upon him,) now, becauſe the Earle of Tholous, and his people entertained the foreſaid hereſie, the Croſſe, and holy warres were by the Pope denounced againſt them. Of which Earle yet let us heare the judgement of another * Fryer then living. Thoſe (ſaith hee) who thus tooke the warres and Croſſe againſt him, did it more for feare of the French King, and the Popes Legate, then for zeale of Iuſtice; it ſeeming to many a wrong thus to inveſt a faithfull Chriſtian man, and one who with many teares deſired the Legate to examine the faith of every one of his Cities, and if any one held againſt the Catholike faith, hee would puniſh him, according to the judgement of the Church, and if any City ſhould reſiſt him, hee would enforce it to make ſatisfaction. As for himſelfe, hee offered to bee examined by the Legate touching his faith, and if hee were faulty, hee would make ſatisfaction to God and the Church. But all theſe things the Legate ſcorned, nor could that Catholike Earle finde any favour, unleſſe hee would forſake his Inheritance, and abjure it both for himſelfe, and his heires for ever. Theſe were the Heretikes againſt which Lewis was now imployed by the Pope, and King Henry the while * commanded to furceaſe from impeaching his holy enterprize. Wherein Lewis had ſpent a moneth, in the ſiege of Avinion, and endured (for all his faced Croſſings) marvailous loſſes, by a terrible plague devouring his Army, by a ſtrange kinde of venemous Flyes, diſparching many, by a ſodaine drowning of a great part of his Army, and laſtly, by being himſelfe * poyſoned by * one of his Earles (an unchaſte Rivall of his Bed,) though it was given forth of him, (as * of his late enemy King Iohn, whom ſome thinke that Lewis his friends did make away) that hee dyed onely of a Flux.

(22) The newes of the French Kings death, ſeconded with ſure relations of ſundry diſcontentments, and open factions under the young King (who was but * about twelve yeares of age) bred an hope in King Henries minde, that now the time was come, wherein hee might recover thoſe ancient inheritances which his Fore-fathers held in France: and to advance his hopes, hee had his mother Queene Iſabel (wife to the Earle of March in thoſe parts,) an earneſt ſollicitor. Peter Duke of Britaine was the principall man who tooke offence that himſelfe had not a chiefe hand in directing the young King Lewis; but his prudent mother Queene Blanch, * weakned his party, by drawing his brother Robert Earle of Dreux from him; and albeit the Duke had repaired the breach, by affinity with the Earle of Champaine, (one of the twelve Peeres of that Realme, to whom the Duke married the Lady Blanda his daughter and heire,) yet was the Earle driven by a ſhort warre to continue quiet. The Duke hereupon caſts himſelfe upon King Henry; Sed ſera auxilia Anglica; the Engliſh aydes come ſlowly ſaith Æmilius. Theſe and the like inducements mooved the King to ſend Walter Archbiſhop of Yorke, with others, to the chiefe Men of Normandy, Anjou, and Poictou, that by large promiſes they might procure them to acknowledge Henry for their King, or by partakings, facilitate their reduction to the Engliſh Soveraigntie; who accordingly proſecuted their employment.

(23) Theſe opportunities for that deſigne, moved the King to be-thinke how to gather money, to furniſh ſo chargefull an enterprize; whereby while he fought to provide to recover that which was loſt, hee miniſtreth occaſion to hazard that which he had. The onely great man in Court was now Hubert de Burgo: For the King proteſting himſelfe of age to governe without a Tutor or Protector, did principally conferre with him about all his moſt weightie affaires. Hence grew more envy againſt Hubert, and perill to the King. From * the Londoners, (beſides the granted aydes of a fifteenth, which all degrees were ſubject unto) hee wrung five thouſand Markes, for that they had, (as was alleaged) to his prejudice, given Lewis the like ſumme. In the Parliament at Oxford, by advice of Hubert his Lord Chiefe Iuſtice, hee revokes the Charters of Liberties, which now for about two yeeres had beene practiſed through the Realme: pretending, that at the time of their Grant the King was under age, and had then no liberty either of his perſon or Signature; though otherwiſe, the royall power of the Engliſh Monarchy never pleads pupillage or minoritie. It ſerved the turne for the time, and all men were faine to pay what Hubert's * pleaſure was to aſſeſſe, for obtaining the new Seale. The fortune of ſuch Arts, whereby they were wont to fill Princes Treaſuries, was not alwayes without repentance to the Authors, and Authoriſers. The Clergy was compelled, (under paine of Papall Cenſures) to pay the Fifteenth, not only for their temporall goods, but alſo for their Eccleſiaſticall; and yet in the end, (after ſo much toſſing of the People,) the Kings Ambaſſadours returne out of France, without having effected that which they went about, ſo that the whole enterprize quailed. For Queene Blanch by ſwcere and prudent courſes, ſo prevailed among the factious, that there was left no place for Henry to take ſure hold upon. The Duke of Britaine, (who expected the Engliſh ſuccours not till the Spring,) was ſo neerely preſt, and almoſt oppreſt, with a Winter warre, that hee thought himſelfe beholding to his brother Robert Earle of Druex, for procuring his peace, though it were with such a condition, as ever after left upon him, the by-name of Mauclerke, or Male-doctus. *Hee * acknowledged the Dutchy of Britaine, to be the Fee of the Crowne of France, and that by right it ought to hold thereof*; this acknowledgement, because against all apparant truth, and record, procured to him that By-name. Such conclusion at this present had King Henries French desiignes. Our * ancient Authors write, that this dishonourable homage was done long after, and with an halter about his necke, at such time as the King of England refused to goe in person to his succours, but offered foure Earles, and other competent Forces, which hee refused, as harbouring a revolt in his bosome, and turned Pyrate.

(24) The evill will which the other great Lords secretly harboured against Hubert, (whose Envy the Kings favour in * creating him Earle of Kent had lately encreased,) now openly discovered it selfe, upon this occasion. Richard Earle of Cornwall, the Kings brother, (lately returned with honour out of Gascoigne,) had seized into his hands a certaine Manour, then in the tenure of one Waleran a Dutch Gentleman, (to whom King John, for his good services had formerly given it,) which hee alleaged was parcell of his Earledome of Cornwall. The King hereupon directs his letters to his brother, commanding him to come immediately, and shew a reason of his fact. He doth so, and without any pleaders helpe defended, as just, the seisure which he had made, concluding, among other words, that hee was ready to stand to the judgement of the Kings Court, and Peeres of the realme. When the King, and the chiefe Iusticiar heard him name the Peeres of the Realme, they (suspecting his bent that way) were exceedingly offended; and (said the King) either restore the Manour to Waleran, or thou shalt depart out of the Kingdome, never to returne: at which peremptory sentence, the Earle boldly (but too rashly) answered; that hee neither would give his right to Waleran, nor without the judgement of the Peeres depart the realme. The * Earle in this heate returnes to his lodging; thence (upon surmise that Hubert had perswaded the King to lay hold on him) he posts to Marlebourgh, were finding William Marshall the young Earle of Pembroke, hee enters into a fast confederacy, ratified by oath; and Ranulph Earle of Chester is easily drawne to make another. Letters thence flying about to all their friends, at Stamford there assembled unto them, the Earles of Glouceiter, of Warren, of Hereford, of Warwicke, Earle Ferrars, many Barons, and an huge multitude of armed men. Their strengths being in likelihood able to beare out their darings, they addreste a bold message to the King, by which they require him in Iolty Phrase, to make present amends to his brother for the wrong hee had done; the fault whereof they imputed not to him, but to the chiefe Iusticiar: and that if hee did not without delay restore the Charters of Liberties, which hee had cancelled at Oxford, they would drive him by dint of sword to give them therein competent satisfaction. The King seeing it no safe time to deny their requests, appoints to meet at Northampton in August next; where the Earle of Cornwall (upon his Associates resolute demand of the King) had large amends of any injury sustained, his Patrimony being augmented with large accessions. The moderation and equanimity of the King, (terrified by his Fathers example) peaceably finished this contention, (the matter of the Charters being for the time husht, as seemeth) which might otherwise have cost many thousand lives, and have hazarded the ruine both of King and Kingdome.

(25) That danger was not a little augmented by the insurrections of the Welsh. The King had given the Castle of Mountgomery to his most trusty Counsellor Hubert de Burgo; the Garrison of which place, issuing out, meant to flocke up the Trees, and shrubbes, which grew neere upon an high-way leading through a great wood of * five leagues long, that travailers (ordinarily there spoyled) might passe more safely. The Welsh not suffering that waste, violently assailed the worke-men, and not without slaughter on both sides, drave them into the Castle; which drew the King (who even in little matters used to make one,) to come thither in person, who, with a competent strength, gives not over, till hee had with fire, and other force, consumed the whole Forrest. From whence hee pierceth farther into Wales, and consumes with fire a place called * Crida; where whiles the King is building a Castle to bridle them; * Lewelin drew thither his forces, where many were slaine on both sides, and a man of speciall worth *William de * Braussa*, (or de Bruce) by the Welsh intercepted, as hee went to forrage in the Countrey; * Many great persons there in the Kings Army being secretly confederated with Lewelin. By which treacherous practise, victuals grew so scarce, that the King was compelled to yeeld to a very dishonourable peace, the conditions whereof were: That the King should raze to the ground the new Fort now almost finished; that * William de Bruce should still remaine Prisoner till the Welsh thought good; that Lewelin should give the King toward his expenses three thousand Marks.

(26) These home-bred garboyles thus appeased; whereas Ambassadours had formerly repaired to the King out of Gascoigne, Poictou, and Normandy, to offer him their services for recovery of those his inheritances, if himselfe would come in person with a royall Army, hee about Michaelmas is now ready at Portsmouth for the exploit; whither all his Nobles were come with so great a multitude, not onely out of England, but out of Ireland, Wales, and Galloway, as none of his Ancestors ever had. Many were the motives which encouraged the King to this attempt, but none greater then the busie workings of Queene Dowager his Mother. Lewis King of France had created his brother Alphonse Duke of Poyctou, commanding the Lords of that Countrey to doe their Homages to him; one of these was Hugh Earle of March, now husband to Queene Isabel, who because shee had once beene the Wife of a King, and now the Mother, disdained that even her present husband, though but an Earle, should doe homage to a Subject, and thereby her selfe, (bearing the stile of a Queene,) seeme inferiour to the Lady Ioan, Wife or Duke Alphonse. The Earle was heereupon drawne to a refusall of Homage; and the like spirit shee had breathed into the hearts of the princely family of Lusignian, whose Ancestors had beene Kings of Ierusalem and Cyprus. Nor thus contented to have plotted a party, for her Sonne among the French, shee is charged to have sought by poyson to make riddance of Lewis himselfe, and that her Agents for that purpose were discovered, and executed. But Aemilius shall pardon us, if wee herein credit not his judgement, as also in thinking her the Author of suborning Assasines to murther the King; for that wee finde him singular therein, the * received opinion being, that they were sent under-hand by the Saracens out of Asia, to take away the danger which they fore-saw was comming, in regard King Lewis was so devoutly addicted to Christian piety, and the hatred of Mahomets Infidelity. There were also at the same time great Divisions among the French, Nobility; but the English, (saith Aemilius himselfe) wrought not by treachery; but after the manner of faire warre, which they first by defiance denounced, and then did openly prosecute with sword in hand.

(27) The King of England being thus provided of men, munition, and other necessaries fit for the Field, and now ready to embarke; there was not shipping sufficient to transport halfe the Company. Which enraged the King so farre, that turning himselfe to Earle Hubert, (upon whom hee charged the blame,) hee called him ranke old Traytor, affirming, that that hee had of purpose beene slacke heerein, as in other things, in regard of five thousand Markes, with which the Queene Dowager of France had (as he said) embribed him, and withall ranne at him in great furie with his drawne sword: but Ranulph Earle of Chester and others stept betweene, and saved the King from so foule a blemish, who soone after received him into grace againe. But that assembly was dispersed by the arrivall of a * great man out of Britaine, a principall confederate with the English against Lewis, who shewed the unseasonable time of the yeare, and other reasons; and the enterprize thereupon adjourned to the Spring. So after Easter hee transports from Portsmouth with a full Armie into Britaine. The * fame day in which he set saile from England, himselfe did in person visite the poore and feeble, and dealt large Almes, not refusing to kisse the sicke and leprous. The successe of this voyage is so diversly reported, that without prejudice to an observant Reader, it might bee all left out. Much certainely was not done. The King of Englands purpose * was to have marched through Britaine (where many received him) into Poictou; and as * some write hee did so, and rooke homage in Gascoigne. To empeach this passage, the King of France lay with a great Army at Angiers, and the King of England at Nants in Britaine, expecting the repaire of more force. Fulke Paganel a noble Norman, with about * sixty valiant Knights perswaded the King of England, it was easie for him to reduce Normandy to his obedience; but Hubert de Burgo diverted the King from acceptance of that enterprize. The Normans therefore made an ill journey and an unlucky, for * they prevailed not with King Henry, and for their conspiracy were disseised at home by King Lewis. But whether it were by losse in battle (wherein, if any battle were at all, some say the * French had the better, taking about foure thousand of the English,) or otherwise, this is agreed on, that after the waste of infinite Treasures, and the great diminution of his numbers, the King of England returned * without accomplishment of his purpose; leaving for the defence of Britaine, the three great Earles of Chester, Pembroke and Aumarl, with forces answerable.

(28) It is not unlikely that the dangerous rebellion of the Irish, hastned his returne; for the King of Connaught and his Irish, seeing the King and the Earle of Pembroke (who as Heire to the great Strangbow had goodly possessions in those parts) wholly embusied in the enterprise of Britaine, had invaded the Kings people, with a purpose and hope, utterly to expell and amove our Nation from among them: but their devises proved mischievous to themselves, that rebellious King himselfe being taken prisoner, not without the losse of many thousands of the Irish. The Welsh also soone after brake out againe, whose Prince Lewelin, (in revenge of those Welshmens heads, which Hubert de Burgo had cruelly caused to bee strucken off in cold bloud, and presented to the King,) had burne certaine Churches and Gentlewomen in them; for which, at * Oxford in the presence of the King, all the Nobility, and Clergy, he was solemnly Excommunicated; and the King there gathering a great Army, in person went to represse the Welsh, though not without losse.

(29) Another Garboyle therafter no lesse disturbed the whole land, the * Insolency of the Romans (who were charged to have wrought immemorable confusions and infinite grievances to the King, his Kingdome, Peeres and people) stirring up multitudes through the Land, by a common consent, to seeke by force to shake off the importable yoke of their oppressions. It was alleadged by these reformers, * that they had under-hand the kings Letters Patents, the Lord Chiefe Iustices assent, the Bishop of Londons countenance, and the Sheriffes aide in sundry Shires, whereby the armed troupes tooke heart every where, violently to seize on the Romans Corne, and their other wealth; which booties they imployed to * good purposes, and for relieefe of the poore, the Romans the while hiding their heads, for feare of loosing them. And though the King, on the Popes complaine thereof, seemed to mislike the outrage, yet had the King himselfe no lesse cause to bee mooved with the insolency of the Pope, then were his subjects of those Popelings. For that very time the See of Canterbury being voyd, Ralph Nevill Bishop of Norwich was elected by the Monkes, and gladly approved by the King, whose * most faithfull Chancelour hee was, an unshaken pillar of truth, doing right to all without deleyes, especially to the poore, without declining to the right hand or the left. But the Pope being told he was a Royalist, and one that would joyne with the King and whole kingdome (who now all strugled to shake off the Popes servitude,) and would to the death sticke to that law, and those Appeales, which Stephen Langton solemnely before the Altar in Saint Pauls Church urged against king Iohns submission to the See of Rome; his Election (as being a person very dangerous) was presently pronounced voyd. Whereupon the Monkes chose a second, and him the Pope misliked, for being too olde, and soft spirited, then a third was elected, a man of eminent learning, a Student in the Vniversity of Oxford, and him also the Pope rejected; never resting till they had chosen Edmund of Abington, a man more pleasant to the Romane palace. But the King seeing the Great Emperour Fredericke, even this very time whiles hee was winning the kingdome of Ierusalem from Infidels, so Turkishly in his absence deposed from his owne Empire by the Pope, upon a private spleene; no marvaile, if in this his unripe age, and distracted government, he feared to draw on himselfe by any opposition, so mercilesse an enemy. So that for the time these indignities were winked at in these parts: in France also by the wisedome of * Queene Blanch, and mediation of the Archbishop of Reims, and Phillip, Earle of Bolein of one part, and the Earles of Britaine and Chester on the other, a three yeeres cessation from mutuall hostilities was ratified by oath, between the French and English.

(30) Hubert de Burgo Earle of Kent, Chiefe Iusticiar of England, having with few rubbes hitherto, enioyed the most inward love and favour aswell of this King, as of King Iohn, seemes now to have run the Stage of his best fortunes. For the King (upon occasion of such inrodes and spoyles, as the Prince Lewelin continually made in the Marches of Wales being advertised by Peter Bishop of Winchester, and certaine other of the Councell, once for all to give an end to those braves and insolencies of the Welsh, complained; that he was not able, in regard of his wants; saying, that his Treasurers told him, all the rents of his Exchequer would doe not more then scarce maintaine apparell, houshold and ordinary Almes-deeds. This was not unknowne to the Bishop, and the rest of that faction, who watched this opportunity of purpose to lift the Earle of Kent out of favour: wherfore they boldly answered the King: that if he were poore he might thanke himselfe, who gave away to others such Honours, Custodies, and Dignities, as were vacant, alienating them from his estate; that he was onely to be called a king in name, rather then for any riches which he had; that his Ancestors, magnificent Princes, abounding in all sorts of worldly glorie and wealth, heaped to themselves inestimable treasures, out of no other means, but the Rents and Profits of the Kingdome.

(31) The King stung with this just reprehension, beganne (by their instructions) to call the Sheriffes of Shires, Bayliffs, and other his Officers to a strait account, for all such receits, as appertained to the Exchequer, thrusting some out of their places, and wringing out of all their full * spunges, store of coyne, till hee satisfied himselfe both for the arrerages and intereſt. Out of Ralph Briton * Treasurer of his Chamber, hee screwzed a thousand pounds, and and also put him from his place, into which (by the Bishop of Winchesters suggestion, who now predominated in Court) hee substituted Peter de Orivall a * Poictovine, the Bishops * Nephew or sonne, if Paris say true; and so, saith hee, The Kings coffers otherwise empty and leane, were by these meanes stuffed again, though not to their full surfet. For these were but preparatives to a farther scrutinie and ransacke, intended against the Earle of Kent, whom (upon the * Bishops suggestion) the King removed from the * Prato-Justiciarishp (or high office of his Chiefe Justice) and put in his place Sir Stephen Segrave, a Knight onely in name. Then is a strict and captious account demaunded of the Earle of Kent, for all such things as hee was in any sort chargeable with; as 1. For such receipts or debts, as were due to King John, or to this King Henry himselfe: 2. For the meane profits of such lands, as the King was seised of, from the day of the death of the first great William, Earle of Pembroke, his Iusticiar and Marshall, whether those lands were in England, Wales, Ireland, or Poictou: 3. For such Liberties or free Customes which the King had in Forrests, Warrens, Counties, and elsewhere, and how they were kept or alienated: 4. For such things as the King lost by Huberts negligence) 5. For the wrongs and dammages offered to the Romane, and Italian Clerkes, and to the Popes Nuncios, against the Kings will, by authority of Hubert, who would take no order to correct the mis-doers, as by vertue and nature of his place hee was obliged: 6. For the many escuages comming by Carriages, gifts and presents, or for the rents of Custodies belonging to the Crowne.

(32) To all which heads, the Earle answered; that hee had the Charter of the Kings Father, by which he was freed from giving any account either for things passed, or to come, and that he had given such proofe of his fidelitie unto King Iohn, as hee would not endure to heare him make an accoumpt. Peter Bishop of Winchester replied hereunto, that such a Charter after the death of King Iohn had no force, and therefore the Fathers Charter, and graunt of Priviledge, was no reason why he should not stand accountant to the Son. This defence for many dangers in this sort traversed or avoided, they laboured to draw him in for his head, by charging him with sundry Articles sounding treasonable; as 1. That Hubert had disswaded the Duke of Austria from matching his Daughter with the King, who sought it: 2. that he had hindred the King from entring upon forrain lands to him belonging, whereby the King, Peeres, and people consumed their Treasures vainely: 3. than hee had enriced the Daughter of the King of Scots (whom King Iohn had entrusted to his custody, meaning himselfe to marry her) and traiterously desiled the noble young Lady, whom he married in hope to be King of Scotland, in her right, if shee survived her Brother: 4. that he had stolne out of his Iewel-house a precious stone of wonderfull value, whose vertue was to make him who had it, invincible in Battle, and that hee gave that stone to Lewelin Prince of Wales, the Kings enemy: 5. that he by his letters had caused Lewelin to hang William de Brouse.

(33) The Earle much perplexed with these accusations (whether true or false) could hardly obtaine a short respite to make his answere: Thus; that Hubert (say the * Monkes) who for love of the King, and defence of the Kingdome, had provoked the hatred of all the great Lords, now being forsaken of the King, is left sole and solitary, without friends or comfort: Onely Luke Archbishop of Dublin, never forsooke him, but with prayers and teares besought the King on his behalfe, but could not be heard against so great opposites, on so great pretences. When the cry was thus up, and that the world saw it was no superficiall displeasure, into which the Earle was falne with the murable King, there rise forth many accusations (favouring of much malignity) round about, upon hope to oppresse and bury Hubert under them for ever; as, 1. that hee had poisoned the two noble Earles of Salisbury and Pembroke; 2. that he had also procured Falcasius de Brent, and Richard Archbishop of Canterbury to be made away; 3. that by Sorceries and Enchantments, he had drawne the King to favour him above all other; 4. that in the victory gotten against the French by Sea, he forceably tooke many Prisoners from the Kings Sailers, and made his benefit of their ransomes, contrary to right, and that he had spoyled and disinherited many; 5. that he had without triall unjustly put to death Constantine, for which excesse the Citizens of London required Iustice against the said Hubert. The King hereupon makes Proclamation through the Citie, that all such as could charge Hubert with any wrong, should repaire to Court, and there receive immediate redresse. This strange course of proceeding did so appale and terrifie the Earle, that he forthwith fled to the Priory Church of Morton in Surrey, where among the Channons, he sheltered his head for a time.

(34) The King with his Prelates and Peeres meeting at Lambeth, at the * day appointed for Huberts answere, hee (being made to beleeve that the King would put him to a most fowle death) durst not appeare, or peepe foorth of his sacred refuge. The Londoners were assembled in Armes (by the Kings commaund) to the number of about twenty thousand, under banners displayed, to dragge the Earle out of Sanctuary: but upon the Earle of Chesters wiser Counsell, the prey was taken out of the hands of a bloudy multitude (who mortally hated him for Constantines death) and they returned againe to their City. The Archbishop of Dublin still performing the office of a true friend, over-flippes not this occasion, and by his importunity obtained day for Hubert, till about Twelfe-tide then next ensuing, and the King for his affiuance, during the Interim, gives him letters Patents. Hubert thinking himselfe secure for the present, is now upon his way toward his wife at the Abbey of Saint Edmund in Suffolke, but his enemies so prevailed by their suggestions, that Sir Godfrey de Crancumb Knight, with three hundred armed men, was sent to apprehend the Earle in Essex. Hee having intelligence of their approach, fledde into a Chappell at * Brentwood, which adjoyned to his lodging; from whence those rough Souldiers haled him (hee holding in one * hand a Crucifixe, and in the other the Sacrament) and sent for a Smith to make for him shackles of.yron. But when the Smith understood, that it was for Hubert de Burgo Earle of Kent, hee refused, uttering such words (if Matthew Paris doe not Poetize) as did well shew that honourable thoughts are sometimes found in the hearts of men, whose fortunes are farre from honour; for having first drawne a deepe sigh, hee said; * Doe with mee what yee please, and God have mercy on my soule; but as sure as the Lord lives, I will never make yron shackles for him, but will rather die the worst death that is. For is not this that most loyall and courageous Hubert, who so often hath preserved England from being destroyed by strangers, and restored England to England? Hee who faithfully and constantly served his Soveraigne Lord King Iohn in Gascoigne, Normandy, and elsewhere, that hee was compelled to eate the flesh of Horses, whose high courage even enemies admired? he, that so long defended Dover Castle, the Key of England, against all the exquisite sieges of the French, and by vanquishing them at Sea, brought safetie to the Kingdome? What need I rehearse his excellent doings at Lincolne, and Bedford? Let God be Iudge betweene him and you, for using him so unjustly and inhumanely, repaying good with evill, nay, requiting his most excellent deserts with the worst recompence that can bee. But Sir Godfrey, and his blacke band, regarded not such speeches, but otherwise binding the Earle hard, they set him on Horse-backe, and so convayed him to the Tower of London.

(35) This breach of Sanctuary being made knowne to Roger Bishop of London (whose Diocesse it was) he confidently tels the King, that if the Earle were not restored to the Chappell, hee would excommunicate all the Authors of that outrage. The Earle is accordingly restored: but the Sheriffes of Essex and Hertford, at the Kings commandement, with the powers of their Counties, besiege the Chappell so long, that at last (they having cast a trench about it, that none might goe in or out) the Earle was compelled to come forth and render himselfe; bearing all things with an equall minde, as one that had a cleare conscience before God, which hee professed to have. While the Chappell was thus beset round, the Kings indignation was so violent, that hee forbad all men once to make mention of Hubert in his hearing. No marvaile then if it bee faid, that the Princes indignation is death. The Archbishop of Dublin nevertheless was not dejected, but with prayers and teares besought the King, who remained as yet inexorable, Huberts enemies possessing his soule and senses. Hubert therefore is againe imprisoned in the Tower. There was no sacrifice as it seemes could appease the Kings ire, but that of the Earles Hoord of Gold, and other riches, which the Knights Templars had in their custody upon trust, and without Huberts consent refused to deliver. Hubert therefore willingly yeelds; which when the Depositaries did give up, the value seemed incredible. This hoording perhaps was Huberts crime, whereof being thus purged, he had hope to recover out of these deadly pangs and convulsions of fortune, and himselfe to bee made capable of curing. Well, the King obtaines this precious booty, but his enemies would have his bloud also; saying, sith hee was convicted of theft and fraud, it was meet hee should dye a most shamefull death. It seemes, they thought, that the very finding of so much treasure was a conviction of fraud in the getting, and that the King must bee interpreted to have lost, whatsoever the Earle had gained. But the displeasure of the King was mollified with this golden balme, for he answered them thus; Hubert from his childhood hath (as I have heard) faithfully enough served my Uncle King Richard, and my Father King Iohn, and if he have done ill towards me, hee shall never therefore dye an evill death. For I had rather bee reputed a foolish or a negligent King, then a cruell Tyrant, or a bloody man toward him, who hath long served mee and mine ancestors; nor will I weigh more his evill deeds, which are not as yet manifested, nor prooved true, then all his good deeds, which are plainely knowne to the Realme, and to us all. Hereupon Hubert had all such lands granted unto him, as either King Iohn had given, or himselfe had purchased. There undertooke for him to the King (as sureties) the Earles of Cornwall, and Warren; Marshall, and Ferrars, and himselfe was committed to the * Castle of Devises, there to abide in free Prison, under the Custody of foure Knights, belonging each of them to one of these foure Earles. This Court-storme thus in part over-blowne, let us take our standings, to view what other weather followed, and what countenance of things in this Kingdome did next present it selfe to the world.

(36) The King being naturally, as it seemes, addicted to repose himselfe upon some one mans counsell, was now wholly swayed by Peter de Rupibus Bishop of Winchester, who had therefore wrought the Earle out of grace, that hee might foly raigne, and the predominate in the gentle King. Which the better to effect, the Bishop procures him to displace the * English Officers, and in their roomes to surrogate Poictovines and Britons; who comming over to the number of about two thousand, hee stuffes his Castles with them; and (in briefe) did as it were wholly entrust himselfe, his treasures, strengths, and the Realme to them. So that * Iudgements were committed to the unjust, Lawes to the Out-lawes, Peace to Wranglers, and Iustice to wrong-doers. Such as would have prayed redresse for these abuses, were interrupted, and put off by the Bishop of Winchester. Among them who were removed from their places in Court, was one Sir William de Redune a Knight, and Deputy Marshall to Richard Earle of Pembroke. This was to the Earle very displeasant, which joyned with a consideration of the publike cause and danger, hee aggravates unto him certaine of the great Lords (as was the fashion of those Lording times, upon every difference,) and in the Company of them advanceth confidently to the King, whom in the hearing of many hee reprooveth; for that hee had, through sinister advise, called in the Poictovines, to the oppression of the Realme, of his naturall subjects, of their Lawes and Liberties: humbly therefore hee beseecheth him that hee would speedily reforme such abuses, which threatned the imminent subversion both of the Crowne and Kingdome: which if hee did not, himselfe and other Lords, would so long withdraw their attendance, as hee entertained Strangers. The Bishop hereunto makes answer; That the King might well and lawfully call in what Strangers himselfe thought good, for the defence of the Crowne and Realme, and such, and so many of them, as might bee able to compell his proud and rebellious people to due obedience. When the Oracle would speake no otherwife, they departed from Court greatly discontented; firmely promising one to the other, that in such a cause, which did so touch them all, they would like men stand together while any breath was in their bodies.

(37) Those who were now most potent about the King, nothing sorry for the discontentment of so great a Peere as the Earle Marshall, but counting it a part of their strengths, to use the regall power toward the weakning of the English, nourish in the King his aversion. The mindes of men sufficiently inclining of themselves, to doubt the worst upon such divisions, had their feare increased by sundry prodigies of strange thunders and raines, but especially of foure red Parhelions (or resemblances of the Sunne) besides the Sunne it selfe, (appearing about the parts of Hereford and Worcester) from morning till night in the Skies: and indeed much trouble immediately ensued aswell in England as Wales, and Ireland. The Poictovines, and other Strangers thus bearing the sway, so as the Kings person went guarded with troupes of such, the Earles and Barons being by the Kings command summoned to another Parliament at Oxford, refused to come. While the King was there, one * Robert Bacon, who used there to preach before the King and Prelates, freely told him, that if hee did not remoove from him Peter Bishop of Winchester, and Peter de Rivallis, hee could never bee in quiet. The King did hereupon a little come to himselfe, and Roger Bacon a Clergy-man also of a pleasant wit, did second Roberts advise, telling the King that * Petre and Rupes were most dangerous things at Sea, alluding to the Bishops name, Petrus de Rupibus. The King therefore (as hee had the happinesse in his mutability, to change for his more security) taking that good aduise of Schollers, which hee would not of his Peeres, fumaons a Parliament to bee holden at * Westminster, giving the world to know wirhall, that his purpose was to amend by their advice, whatsoever ought to bee amended.

(38) But the Barons, considering that still there arrived sundry strangers, men of warre with Horse and Armour, and not trusting the Poictovine faith, came not, but presumed to send this traiterous message from the King, that if out of hand hee removed not Peter Bishop of Winchester, and the Poictovines out of his Court, they all of them, by the common assent of the Kingdome, would drive him, and his wicked Counsellors together out of it, and consult about creating a new Soveraigne. The King (whom his fathers example made more timorous,) could easily have beene drawne, to have redeemed the love of his naturall Liegemen, with the disgrace of a few strangers; but the Bishop of Winchester and his friends, infused

(39) This Rebellion had not many great names in it, but tooke strength rather by weight then number: the knowne Actors were the Earle Marshall, the Lord Gilbert Basset, and many other of the inferiour Nobles. The Bishops Arts had plucket from him, the Kings Brother, and the two Earles of Chester and Lincoine, (who dishonourably sold their love* for a thousand Markes,) and otherwise, as it seemed, secured the rest: nevertheleſſe, these may well bee thought, not to have borne any evill will to their now-forsaken confederate, the Earle Marshall, who tooke himselfe to handle the common cause; certainely hee handled his owne safety but ill, as the event shall demonstrate. The Earle hearing these things, contracts strict amity with Lewelin Prince of Wales; whose powers thus knit together, by advantages of the Mountaines, were able to counterpoize any ordinary invasion. To the Kings ayde, Baldwin de Gisnes with many Souldiers came out of Flanders. The King now at Hereford in the midst of his Forces, sends from thence (by Winchesters counsell) the Bishop of Saint Davids, to defye the Earle Marshall; how farre soever this word defie extends it selfe, sure it seemes that the Earle hereupon understood himselfe discharged of that obligation, by which hee was tyed unto the King, and freed to make his defence. The King notwithstanding after some small attempts, and better consideration, did promise and assume, that by advise of his Councell *all that was amisse should (as a * day appointed) bee rectified and amended.* About which time, Hubert de Burgo, having intelligence that the Bishop of Winchester (who was a Poictovine) * plotted his death, escaped out of the Castle of Devises (where he was prisoner) to a neighbour Church, but was haled from thence by the Castle-keepers. (40) The King, at the day and place appointed holds his great Councell or conference with the Lords; but nothing followed for the peace of the Realme; it was not an ordinary passage of speech, which hapned there betweene the Lords, and the Bishop of Winchester. For, when the English Bishops and Barons humbly befought the King, for the honour of Almighty God to take into grace his naturall Subjects, whom (without any tryall by their Peeres) hee called Traytors: the Bishop (offended it seemes, at Peeres) takes the words out of the Kings mouth, and answers; That there are not Peeres in England, as in the Realme of France, and that therefore the King of England, by such Iusticiars as himselfe pleaseth to ordaine, may banish offenders out of the Realme, and by judiciall processe condemne them. The English Bishops relished his speech fo harshly, that with one voyce they threatned to excommunicate and accurse by name the Kings principall wicked Counsellors; but Winchester appealed; then they accursed all such as alienated the heart of the King from his naturall subjects, and all others that perturbed the peace of the Realme.

(41) The Earle Marshall, this while had by force resumed a Castle, which hee had a little before surrendred to the King, which stirred the King to gather his forces at Glocester, and thence to advance towards Wales. But the Earle had politickely barred the Country of all Provisions for man and beast, that the King was faine to strike aside to Grosmont Castle; where the Earle, with his Confederates and the * power of Wales, so awaited their time, that affailing the Kings Campe unawares, there were taken about five hundreth Horſe, with the Sumpters, riches, and carriages of the Army; upon which losse (his men also greatly scattered) the King leaving * two noble Gentlemen with the Poictovines, to make good the Marches against the Welsh, returned more empty and inglorious then before. The Earle found them worke, whom the King had left behind; and (as hee was a man of no lesse courage then deepe wit,) whereas Baldwin de Gisnes (the valiant Flemish Knight) with a thousand Horsemen, thought to have surprized him, who having but a tenth part of that number, came to view the Castle of Monmouth; the Earle alone defended himselfe against twelve of his enemies; and when his Horse was cowardly slaine by them, he pitcht one of them by the legge out of the Saddle, and leapt into it himselfe, never giving ground till his Army came to the rescue, and obtained a faire victory, with the slaughter and captivation of many Poictovines, and others. His other exploits in and about Wales, were not few nor unfortunate; if it were not onely in this, (as what indeed could bee more grievous or unglorious to a noble mind?) for that his Soveraigne was upon the contrary side.

The * King then at Glocster for want of sufficient Forces, departed thence (greatly grieved) to Winchester, abandoning those other parts as it were to wast and ruine. It therefore seemes, that hee was not growne stronger or richer, by the displacing of Hubert Earle of Kent, and the rest, and by taking new into their roomes, who commonly bite and sucke hard till they have glutted themselves, (if at leastwise there be any satiety in avarice) whereas the old officers, having provided in a sort for the maine chance, have the lesse reason to be grievous.

To these letters, (which the Monkes call bloudy) they caused the King to set his Seale, as they themselves also (being eleven) did theirs; upon receit of which lines, the parties signifie backe under the Seale of secresie, that if the Contents of those letters were confirmed by the Kings Letters Patents, they would performe that which was defired. (45) The Kings mind therefore being still exulcerated towards the Earle Marshall, he grievously charged Alexander Bishop of Chester, that hee had too much familiarity with the Earle, affirming that they sought to thrust him from his throne; the Bishop to cleare himselfe from so hainous a scandall, put on his Episcopall habite, and solemnely pronounceth all those accurst, who did but imagine a wickednesse of so fowle a nature, against the Majestie or person of the King: and thereupon by the intercession of other Prelates, he was received into Grace. The King was then at Westminster; where Edmund the Archbishop of Canterbury cleet, with other his Suffragan Bishops, bewailing the estate of the Kingdome, presen themselves before him, telling him, as his loyall Liegeman, "that "the Counsell of Peter Bishop of Winchester, and his "Complices, which now he had, and used, was not sound "nor safe, but cruell and perillous to himselfe and his "*Realme. Meane-while the behaviours of the Marshallne faction (having this backing at Court) grew more and more intolerable: for while the King was at Huntingdon, the Lord Gilbert Basset and others, set fire upon Alkmunbury, a Towne belonging to Stephen de Segrave, the flames whereof were seene of the owner, being then with the King at Huntingdon. They also tooke prisoners upon the Welsh Marches, and according to the Law of Warre (which, saith one, is lawlesse*) did put them to their Ransomes.

* Quo warranto. Matth. Paris.

The King feasile in taking and leaving favourites.

Of Princes Councellors and Favourites.

(46) Nothing had hitherto preserved the King more, then that he could, without great griefe forgoe any favourites, if he were neerely prested; the contrary quality whereof hath been the cause of finall desolation to so many Princes. For albeit the choice of Counsellours ought to be free, yet by common intendment they should be good; or howsoever they are, or are not, it is madnesse to hazzard a Crowne, or leese the love of a whole Nation, rather then to relinquish or diminish a particular dependant. The rights of amity ought nevertheleſſe to remain inviolable, but in such distance that the publike be not perverted, nor interverted for a private. The King therefore in this point not unfortunate, commanded Bishop Peter to betake himselfe to his resident at Winton, without once meadling in affaires of State, but against Peter Rivallis his Treasurer, he was so vehement, that he sware he would plucke out his eyes, were it not for reverence of Holy Orders; commanding also their Poictovines to depart the Realme, never to see his face more.

The King removes the Bishop of Winchester and others from his Councell.

England purged from Poictovines.

(47) Then are the Archbishop of Canterbury with the Bishops of Chester and Rochester sent into Wales to pacifie things there. But the invincible Earle Marshall had now croſt the Seas into Ireland, to take revenge for the spoiles and disseisures, which his hired enemies had made in his lands there; by whose plots, according to that secret agreement, hee was finally taken, and dyed of a wound given him in the backe, as he with admirable manhood defended himselfe. His Body was buryed in Kileennie, (which pleasantly-situated Towne, our Soveraigne King Iames erected into a City,) where himselfe in his life had appointed, in the Oratory of the Minorites: in which Towne, as yet some small tokens of this great name are remaining; for in the East window of the Abbey-Church of S. Iohn Baptiſt, and in the Abbey of S. Dominicke, the ancient Armories of * Marshall, Lord of Kilkennie, are yet extant. The Patrimony of this Earle was shared by the Contractors, according to the purport of the Letters patents: but when the King heard of his death, hee (to the wonder of all that were by) brake forth into teares, bewailing the losse of so brave a Knight, affirming that he had left no Peere behind him in the Kingdome. A blessed King, saith Paris; to love even those who had offended him.

Ann. 1235.

(48) The Archbishop of Canterbury with the other Bishops, repaired to the King at Glocester upon their returne from Leoline Prince of Wales, who pretended hee could not conclude, till the King had received into grace such of the banished Nobility, with whom himselfe had beene Confederated during the late displeasures. The King hereupon mooved with Pittie, sends forth his Proclamations, that all such as were out-lawed or proscribed, should bee at Glocester upon a certaine day, there to bee received into the Kings favour againe, and to have restitution of their inheritances; but lest they might suspect any evill meaſure, it was ordered that they should be in the Churches protection, and come under the safe conduct of the Arch-bishop and the other Prelates. Thither at the time and place limited doth Hubert de Burgo Earle of Kent (and lately chiefe Iusticiar of England) repaire; upon whom, by mediation of the Bishops, the compaſſionate King lookes graciously, receiving him in his Armes with the kisse of peace; in like fort was the Lord Gilbert Basset, and all other of that fellowship, received into favour, their severall livings and rights fully restored; and both Hubert and Basset admitted to bee of his Counsell. And, that nothing might bee wanting to make the joy universall; Gilbert, Brother to the late Earle Marshall, had the whole Earledome conferred upon him, with all the lands and rights thereof wheresoever, notwithstanding the forefaid treacherous conveyance; whom also the King made Knight at Worcester, and delivered into his hands

Howbeit in all these poynts the King may seeme but to have temporized (as thereto driven by overbearing inducements) or else greatly afterward to have changed his judgement, because he openly at one time [a] called the said Richard a bloudy Traitour, and caused this Gilbert to be forcibly kept out of the Court upon a Christmas day.

[a] Mat. Paris ad Ann 1239.

The practise to destroy the late Earle Marshall openly read.

(49) Vpon this reconcilement, the practise, by which the late great Marshall was destroyed, and his possessions dismembred, came to light; the copy of the letters which had beene sent into Ireland, being by commandement of the Archbishop of Canterbury, openly read in the presence of the King, the Prelatse, Earles and Barons: It mooved teares in all of them; the king with an [b] Oath affirming that he knew not the contents of the said letters, though by the urging of the Bishop of Winchester, Rivallis, Segrave, Passelew, with other of his Councell, hee had caused his Seale to be put unto them. At the sound of Summons to make their severall appearances, the Malefactors take sanctuary, the Bishop and Peter de Rivallis in Winchester Church, Segrave in Leicester Abbey, Passelew in the New-Temple, and others otherwhere. In the end, upon the intercession of Edmund Archbishop of Canterbury, who piously endeavoured to extinguish all occasions of further dissention in the Kingdome, and undertooke they should have a lawfull triall, the delinquents appeared at Westminster before the King, who[b] sate in person with his Iusticiars upon the Bench. Peter de Rivallis was first called (for the Bishop came not,) whom the King shot through with an angry eye, saying; O thou Traitour, by thy wicked advice, I was drawne to set my Seale to these treacherous letters for the destruction of the Earle Marshall, the Contents whereof were to me unknowne; and by thine and such like counsell, I banished my naturall Subjects, and turned their minds and hearts from me. By thy bad counsell, and thy Complices, I was mooved to make warre upon them, to my irreparable losse, and the dishonour of my Realme, in which enterprize I wasted my treasure, and lost many worthy persons, together with much of my royall respect. Therefore I exact of thee an account aswell of my treasure, as of the custodies of Wardes, together with many other profites and escheats belonging to my Crowne. Peter denying none of the accusations, but falling to the ground, thus besought him. My Soveraigne Lord and King, I have beene nourished by you, and made rich in worldly substance, confound not your owne Creature, but at least-wise grant me a time of deliberation, that I may render a competent reason for such poynts as I am charged with. Thou shalt (said the King) bee carried to the Tower of London, there to deliberate till I am satisfied: He was so. Stephen de Segrave, the Lord Chiefe Iustice (whom the King also called most wicked Traitour) had time till Michaelmas to make his accounts, at the Archbishops and other Bishops humble entreaty; and for other matters, hee shifted them off from himselfe, by laying the blame upon such as were higer in place then he: into whose office of Chiefe Iustice, Hugh de Pateshull is advanced. The like evasion Robert Passelew had, by leaving the fault upon Walter Bishop of Carleil, who was above him in the Exchequer: and thus were these civill enormities reformed, not without reducing store of Coyne to the King.

(50) As those continuall turmoiles, and plagues of the Sword, much afflicted the land, so this was the third yeare, wherein God inflicted also for sinne, the plague of Famine, whereby the poore did miserably perish, there being no Samaritan to pay for their harbouring, or to annoynt their wounds with the oyle of consolation. Our Authours, to make manifest how odious the mercilesse heart is in the sight of God, relate a storie of that time with protestation, that they doe it, lest so memorable an example should be in time forgotten. Certaine [c] poore, while as yet the Corne was greene, pluckt the eares in the common fields, to sustaine their lives; whereupon the Owners call on the Priest, to curse all such as had so done: but one in their company adjured the Priest in the name of God to exempt his corne from the sentence, saying, it pleased him well, that the poore driven with famine, had taken his corne, and so commended that which they had left to God. The Priest, compelled by importunity of the rest, was entred into the sentence, when by a terrible interrupting tempest of thunder, lightning, winde, haile, and raine, all the Corne-fields about were desolated, as if they had beene troden downe with Horse and Carres; that no kinde of Beast or Fowle would feede upon the Corne thus layd. But (as say our Authors out of the [d] Scripture) seeing [e] they who are pitteous, finde mercie, that honest and compassionate-hearted man, found all his corne and grounds (though interlaced with theirs,) altogether untouche and unharmd. Whereupon (say they) it is more cleare then any light, that as glory to God on high is sung of Angels, so there is peace on Earth to Men who are of good-will. This dearth was in [e] Fraunce and Gascoigne aswell as in England. A Iewish impietie may well bee annexed to want of Christian Charitie. There were brought before the King at Westminster seaven Iewes, who circumcised a Childe, and purposed (in contempt of Christ and Christianitie) to have crucified him in Easter at Norwich.

A miraculous confusion of bard-hearted-nesse toward poore Christians.

[d] Mat. 5. 7. [e] God hath a care of the Ibirall.

(51) These now calmer times, were made more happy, by the marriage of the Emperour Fredericke with the Lady Isabel, the King of Englands sister, a beauteous young Lady, about twenty yeares of age. The messengers arrived in March with the Emperours letters, closed under a Seale of gold; and there were sent to conduct her over, the Archbishop of Collein, and the Duke of Louain. The King brought her to Sandwich, with about three thousand horse in his traine; and being imperially furnished with all worldly abundance, shee tooke shipping in May, and in one dayes and one nights space arrived at Antwerpe, a City of the Empire, and was every where most magnificently entertained: her sweet humility, and excellent beauty, drawing all to love and honour her. At the solemnity of her [g] marriage were present three [h] Kings, eleaven Dukes, thirty Marquesses and Earles, besides the number of great Prelates. On whether superstition, or observation, of the Emperour is noted at this marriage, that hee forbare the Empresses company, till a certaine houre, which his Wisards or Astrologers had assigned, and in the morning hee caused her to be carefully tended as a Woman with childe, and sent word to his Brother the King of England, that he should have a Sonne, so skilfull or confident hee was; and God did favour his judgement, for it proved so. This Imperiall affinity gave a [i] worthy Historian occasion heere to display and emblazon the Majestie and glorie of the English Princes; but amongst them all, none were higher advanced then the Children of King John, one of whose Sonnes was now a [k] King, the other afterward chosen to be an [l] Emperour, and one of his daughters a [m] Queene, this other (here mentioned) an [n] Empresse. And here doth Wendouer end his History, to whom wee have hitherto beene beholding for his labours, sorry we can enjoy his good company no longer.

The first entrance into England was some few yeares past, when the Pope requiring the tenth of all moveable goods in England, Ireland and Wales, towards his wars against the Emperour Fredericke, sent Stephen his Nunce hither to collect it, [q] who brought with him that race of devouring-Monsters under humane shape, called the[r] Popes Merchants, under colour of of supplying with mony such as wanted present pay. The [n] Popes continuall angariations and extortions, under colour also of the Turkish warres, kept these men (if men) still in vse here in England, to the [o] extreame beggering of infinite members, who were inveigled (either by perswasion, or craving, or commanding, or committing, or excommunicating,) to give way to the Popes unsufferable extortions, all men wondering into what bottomelesse gulfe that huge Masse was put, which the Popes Factors had gathered, wherewith all mens hearts were deeply wounded, for that all this unvaluable treasure never was imployed to any publike use, or honour of the Church. Roger Bishop of London (a learned and religious Prelate) burning with zeale of Christian charity, seeing the numbers and mischiefes of these execrable Vsurers, thus still to encrease, first admonished them (whom hee repued no better then Schismatickes) to repent, & leave that wicked trade of life. But when he found them deafe to all advice, armed with the weapons of spirituall justice, he openly pronounceth them accursed, precisely commanding them to packe out of LONDON, WHICH TILL THAT TIME KNEW NOT WHAT SVCH A PLAGVE MEANT, least his flockes should be infected therewith. (53) The King, being now in the best strength of his yeares, tooke to wife the Lady Elenor, second daughter of Raimund Earle of Province, which hee had by the Daughter of Thomas Earle of Savoy. A Lady about twelve or thirteene yeares of age, and altogether as beautifull and princely, as shee was young. Her Father, by [p] reason of warres which he had with the Citizens of Massilia his subjects (who upon pretence they were oppreſt, fought to drive him out of all his territories) was but a poore Prince. Neverthelesse it was the happinesse of his foure Daughters (whose Parentage adorned with rare beautie, and fashioned with excellently-vertuous education, made them fit Brides for any Princes in the world) that each of them had [q] a King to her Husband. The Eldest was married to Lewis the ninth King of France, Elenor to the King of England; Santia (or Cynthia) to Richard his brother king of Romans; Beatrix to Charles the French kings brother, King of Sicilia. The Nuptials were accomplished at [r] Westminster; where also shee was crowned Queene, with incredible state and splendor, the King himselfe wearing his Crowne also. The Citizens of London are noted of much serviceable forwardnesse and magnificence at this royall feast. The Citie was adorned with Silkes, Banners, Crownes, Pals, Tapers, Lamps, and with [s] certaine wonders of wit, and strange shewes; the Citizens richly attired and well mounted, met the King on horse backe. At the Nuptiall dinner, the Trumpets sounding before them, they came in, carring three hundreth and threescore Cups of Gold and Silver, to serve the King and that noble Company with Wine, according to their duties at Coronations. The King had twice or thrice before attempted to marrie, but God ordained otherwise till now; and it was a match made principally after the manner of honest private persons, for love; and not as heads of publike bodies use to do, for seeming worldly strengths and profits. It was also begun and concluded without the privity of the Sates. The Emperour soone after requested the King to send him his Brother Richard, Earle of Cornewall, to make him Generall against the French, whereby the English also might recover their right: but the Emperour was desired to choose any other; for him the States of his Realme, (which were assembled to consult thereupon) would not forgoe, because he was but young, and next heire to the Crowne, if the king should die without children. This answere was given to the Emperours Ambassadours at Merton neere London, where also the Statutes, called of Merton, were at the same time enacted.

(54) The humorous Lords beganne now againe to relapse into their wonted giddinesse, taking it in great indignity, that the king was so much ruled by his wives uncle, William de Valentia; in so much that the king with drawing himselfe into the Tower of London, thither none of the Lords would come. Vpon better advice therefore he returnes to his Palace; where some great Officers, and others, were put from the Privie Councell, and their places, not without the admiration of many. But the Bishop of Chichester, chosen Lord Chancellor in the kings minority, being required by the king to deliver [t] up the Seale, refused, alleaging, more stourly then loyally, that as he had received it with the publike allowance of the Parliament, so without the same assent hee would not resigne it. Which thwartings of his Peeres & Prelates, incited the king (it seemeth) to resume againe into his favour some of those his Counsellors which hee had formerly dis-courted, as Peter de Rivallis, and Stephen de Segrave. But (whether on discontent hereof or no) Richard the kings brother (whose service was formerly denied to the Emperour,) the Earles Marshall, Chester, * Lincolne, and Sarisbury, with many other honourable Souldiers assumed the vow to fight in Palistine against Gods enemies, for accomplishment whereof they departed thither * the second yeere after. Meane-while the king, to secure himselfe from dangers neerer home, travailes toward Yorke, to settle a peace betweene himselfe and Alexander king of Scots; who, the rather upon Confidence of Leolines amity, (which toward the English was but * shadowie, and alwayes suspected) demanded Northumberland. Neverthelesse, by the wisedome of friends, and moderation of both the Princes, they parted in peace, the king of England being eſſewhere to lay out lands to a certaine * value, lest he should dismember his kingdome by forgoing so great and necessary a frontire. The Scottish king claimed that County from king John, who by his deed enfeoffed him thereof, as in portion with his Daughter, which king Alexander had married.

Complaint of the kings raigne more grievous then juſt.

(57) There is in Mathew Paris much complaine of the State of England at this time, which by the Kings flexibility (ſaith he) was become the ordinary prey, ſometime of one ſort of ſtrangers, and ſometime of another, Poictovins, Italians, Almaines, and Provincios. Indeed the Genius, and common humor of a Nation, is not eaſily alterable: and our Miſoxenie (or hatred to ſtrangers) was no new qualitie; for * Horace noted it before, or about, Chriſts birth: and Engliſhmen can hardly ſee when they are well to keep them ſo. But no kind of Strangers at that time more infeſted England (ſaith our * Monke) then the Romans, of which here ſwarmed three ſorts, *Vſurers, which were the Popes Marchants, Italian Clerks, moſt vile and illiterate perſons, which armed with the Popes Bulls, poſſeſſed themſelves (againſt all right of Priviledges) of ſpirituall revenues, and if any withſtoode them, they were by the Popes owne warrant excommunicated; laſtly, the * Farmers and Proctors for the Romans, who cunningly ſcraping together whatſoever was of price in the Land, ſent it over Sea to the Maſters, who there lived in deliciouſneſſe on the Patrimony of him that was crucified, and in pride on other mens goods.* Inſomuch, *that holy men with heart-breakings, teares, and deadly * groanes*, profeſſed it was better for them to dye, then to ſee thoſe miſeries on their Nation and holy men. So that the daughter of Sion was become like an impudent Harlot. And as theſe Papall Engines dealt here in England, ſo did they with others * at Rome, the Governours of that Church not ſeeking to winne mens ſoules, but their money, oppreſſing the religious by puniſhments, uſuries, and Simonie, without any care of juſtice and honeſty. Which made the Greeke Church at this time to fall quite away, and oppoſe it ſelfe againſt the Romane. Doubtleſſe England had no leſſe cauſe ſo to doe, then had the Greekes; but as Pope Gregory knew that his onely way to keepe England faſt, was to hold cloſe with the King; ſo the King alſo ſaw no way to ſtrengthen himſelfe againſt his Barons, but by holding in with the Pope, though with ſo many unſufferable miſchiefes. And for ſome ſuch purpoſe of the Kings, newly now arrived Cardinall Otto, the Popes Legate, greatly againſt the liking both of the Peeres, and of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who not onely reproved the King thereof, as of a thing dangerous to the Kingdome, but ſoone after alſo tooke his journey to Rome, to make ſome complaints, neither would hee ſtay, though the Legate recalled him by his authority, which ever after cauſed much hatred betwixt them. Yet ſundry good offices were at firſt performed by the Legate. The treaty of peace begun betweene the two Kings of England, and Scotland at Yorke, was againe reſumed in the ſame City, where Otto interpoſed himſelfe toward making a finall agreement, which enſued. There were alſo aſſembled, the Earles and Barons, who by the princely offices * of Alexander King of Scots, were reconciled to the King their Soveraigne, if this be the time which Boetius meanes, and not the next yeare. Otto had formerly accorded many of them among themſelves, whoſe diſagreements had emperild the State of the Realme, ſo that for a time nothing but calmneſſe and amity appeared. Yet ſoone after they ſtormed to ſee the King ſo * addicted to the will of the Romans, eſpecially the Legate, for which Richard Earle of Cornwall reproved him, as carrying himſelfe more like the Popes Penſioner then a King. Notwithſtanding the King was ſo provident of his State, that the Legate calling his * Nationall Councell, thither came from the King, John Earle of Lincolne, John Fitz-Geoffrey, and William de Kele a Canon of Pauls, to forbid the Legate on the behalfe of the King and Kingdome, not to attempt any thing againſt the Crowne or royall dignitie.

Matth. Paris.

(58) Simon de Mountfort (afterward created Earle of Leiceſter) had now wrought himſelfe into ſuch favour, that the King with his owne hand ſecretly gave Elienor, (widdow of the laſt William Marſhall Earle of Pembroke) to him in mariage, notwithſtanding that ſhe had vowed her ſelfe a Nunne. When this was once knowne to Richard Earle of Cornwall, and the angry Lords, they all tooke ſuch ſnuffe thereat, becauſe they were not firſt conſulted with, in regard the King had promiſed to doe no weighty matter without them, that none but Hubert de Burgo Earle of Kent adhered to the forſaken King. The head of this defection was the Earle of Cornwall, of whom men generally had hope, that hee would now free the Land from the miſerable oppreſſions both of Romans and other Strangers. Him therefore the Legate undertakes, but found him ſtiffe and untractable at firſt. For when he truely and fatherly told him: That if all the people of the land roſe againſt the King, yet hee being his owne brother ought alwayes to ſtand faſt with him againſt the whole world, and not to make himſelfe Captaine of the enemie, &c. The Earle roundly replied; * That none ought to marvaile, if he being the only Heire apparant, had a care of the Kingdomes Hate, when there was no treaſure in the publike ceſſers for defence thereof, though it were environed with enemies: That it was moreover wondred at, for ſomuch as the king his brother did moſt ſtand in need of helpe, and good diſcretion, that he would not take example by ſuch as were wiſe; as neither of the Emperour, who having married their ſiſter, retained her with him, but ſent backe all that attended her, not giving to any of them either lands or money, although himſelfe did abound in both; nor the example of the king of France, who tooke the ſame courſe, though hee married the eldeſt ſiſter of the Engliſh Queene, &c. The Legate upon theſe and many other ſhrewde ſharpe ſpeeches, takes with him Peter Biſhop of Winchcſter, and deales with the King, who required time to anſwere; which the Lords granted, and met at London ſtrongly appointed upon the day. There, while the quarrell hung in ſuſpenſe, Simon de Mountfort had with money, faire words, and much entreatie of Mediators, reconciled himſelfe to the fierce young Earle, and ſo alſo had John Earle of Lincolne, another marke of the publique envie. This practiſe (which Earle Richard entertained without his Confederates privity) had profitable effects; for the controlling Lords loſt thereby their Generall, and hee greatly weakened himſelfe in the opinion of the Lords and People; both which were poyats of advantage and ſafetie for the King. But Simon feeling himſelfe as yet upon no ſure ground, leſt his Wife with-childe at Kenilworth, not ceaſing, till by the favour of the Emperours letters, and * exceſſive bribes, (by which juſtice was overcome, and made captive to the Romane avarice) he had obtained at Rome a diſpenſation for that marriage, which yet was * doubted, whether it could be lawfull, becauſe ſhee had taken the * Ring, though neither the habit of a Nunne, nor the vaile. Howſoever, the King did afterward ſodainely breake with him, objecting that Mountfort had * firſt corrupted her, and hee to cover his Sifters ſhame, was content to give her in Marriage.

This execrable wretch having been a Courtier, and one of the Kings [b] Knights, ſuppoſing to have found the King in his owne retiring Bed, had about mid-night gotten in at the Chamber-window; but God (in whoſe ſpeciall protection the lives of Princes are) diſappointed him, for the King was elſe-where in bed with the Queene. And worthily: for (as [d] a vulgar Chronicler hereupon faith truely,) in wounding and killing a Prince, the Traytor is guilty of Homicide, of Parricide, of [e] Chriſticide, nay of Deicide. William de Marſico, who was faid to be the Inſtigator of this Treaſon, knowing his danger, became a Pyrate, and fortified the Iſle of Lundey in Severne, where he did much miſchiefe, the ſituation of that little Iland being ſo inexpugnable. (62) After so many mischiefes patiently brooked, at last the King, upon receit of Letters from the Emperour (whom as his brother in law, he was loath to offend,) commanded Otto the Popes Legate, in regard of the great enmities betweene the Pope and Emperour, to depart out of England. There was also strait commandement given to the Italian Vsurers, to leave the most [d] pure earth of his Realme, (meaning that his owne people was most innocent and free from such a sinne,) but (saith * one, who durst write any thing he thought) by giving the King money, which is too much used to justifie the wicked, they for a great part remained still, as loath to forsake such fat Pastures. And the Legate himselfe also stayed so long, till the Pope by wily inducements and [e] forged calumniations had drawne the King, both to relinquish the Emperour his brother in Law, and to suffer the Papall Excommunication to passe here against him, and money also to be gathered to his impeachment. A briefe taste of all the Popes proceedings against this glorious Emperour, wee may take from the Nobilitie of France, who (when the Pope offered the Empire unto Robert the French Kings brother) in their grand Counsell refused to accept it, charging the Pope with the Spirit of audacious rashnesse, for deposing the Emperour, not convicted of any fault, and whom a Generall Councell nicely ought to censure, not the Pope, to whom no credit ought to be given, being his Capitall enemie. For that themselves knew hee was a vertuous and victorious Emperour, and one who had in him more religion then the Pope had. Our Legate Otto (who now at length is gone) was no sooner departed, but Peter of Savoy, the Queenes Vncle, arrived, to whom the King gave the Earledome of Richmond, and entertained otherwise most magnificently. This and the like largesse to strangers, drew on the King much evill will, who also in favour of his Queene, procured her Vncle Bonifacius to bee chosen Archbishop of Canterbury in place of [f] Edmund, who weary of his life in England, by reason that hee could not redresse the Popes detestable exactions and oppressions, made choyse of a voluntary Exile at Pounmey in France, where hee dyed with the honour and opinion of a Saint.

(63) The Kings imployments hitherto have (almost wholly) beene taken up either in the impatiencie of civill disturbations, or in the too patient sufferance of some forraigne grievances, nourished within his kingdome; which gave him perhaps little leasure, minde, or meanes, to pursue any transmarine designe. But now better provided with money, then with men, (and yet not sufficiently with money) hee takes ship immediately after Easter towards Poictou, where the Earle of March (now husband to Queene Isabel his mother) expected his arrivall. Hee committed the Government of the Realme in his absence to the Archbishop of Yorke. Thirtie Hogsheads, or 5 Barrels fraught with sterling money were shipt for that service. There also went with him Richard Earle of Cornewall, (who was returned, with much honour, out of the Holy-land not long before) and seaven other Earles, with about three hundreth Knights, besides other souldiers. To resist the English, the King of France (who had given Poictou to his brother Alfonse) assembled an Armie royall of foure thousand men of Armes, excellently well appointed, and about twenty thousand choyse Souldiers; with a thousand Carts to carry their other necessaries. King Henry understanding that the King of France lay before Fromtenay, (Castle belonging to the Earle of March,) seeking to force it by assaults, sent a messenger of defiance to him as a breaker of Truce. Lewis, a most just and valiant Prince, denyed that ever hee brake the Truce, but that the King of England, by maintenance of his Rebels, did rather seeme to infringe the peace. Nevertheleſſe he offered (so as the English would not protect his enemies, the Earle of March and others) to give him Poictou, and a great part of Normandy, in satisfaction of his [h] Fathers Oath, and moreover, to enlarge the last Truce with a longer terme of yeares. These so honourable, safe, and profitable conditions, by the practise of the Poictovines (who feared the French Kings indignation would proove too heavie for them to beare, if the English abandoned their cause) were unfortunately refused.

The French Kings preparations to resist.

(64) When the French King heard hereof, it repented him that he had humbled himselfe so farre; telling his Lords, that he neither feared his Cousen of England, nor all his forces, but onely that Oath, (for restoring of the Lands in France) which his father made when he was in England. This scruple did so trouble the Kings minde, on the behalfe of his dead Father, that hee would admit no comfort, till one of his Lords told him, that the King of England, by putting Constantine Fitz-Arnulf to death, for having spoken some words in honour of King Lewis (his Father) had first broken the Truce. This satisfied the French. That whole businesse is thus concluded by [i] Tilius; Hugh Earle of March overcome with the pride and perswasions of his wife Isabel, would not doe homage to Alfonse the French Kings brother: for Ihee was a cause to draw the English thither, where things thriving on his part but meanely, Hugh is constrained in the end to doe both homage and fealty unto Alfonse. This onely must be added, that he did unfaithfully provide for his private safety, without the knowledge of the King of England, at such time as he * pretended otherwise.

h Hee is with Isabel, Queene Dowager, to get weithgh to draw her Sonne the King into France. Chron. Dunst. 170.

(65) This treachery loft the King all Poictou, for whereas he principally took care for money, presuming upon the Earle for men, when it came to the point, the Earle was not only not provided, but sware by the throat of God, hee never promised any such matter, and denyed he had set his Seale to any writing concerning such promises, and that if any such sealed writing were (as the King and his brother the Earle of Cornewall affirmed) their mother his wife had forged it. They were now in sight of the French Host before Taillbourg in Xaintfoing when this improvident expostulation was made. The King of England manifestly seeing his perill, and having by his brother Earle Richards mediation (whom many of the French did greatly honour, because he had by compostition been a meane at his arrivall to free them from the Sarasens in the Holy-land,) raised his Campe by night, and retreated with much more haste then good speed. Not long after this, the faire City of Xaintes in Xaintfoing, upon displeasure conceived by the Citizens against the king, because he had given the same to the Lord Hugh his halfe-brother, (sonne to the Earle of March) first contrived a perfidious revolt so closely, that if first the said Lord Hugh, & then Guy de Lusignian his elder brother, had not in good time signified the danger, the King and all the English had beene surprized by the French. There was none, (among all the mutable Poictovins) found respective of honour and loyalty, but onely one called Herold, Captaine of the famous Castle of Mirabell, who in great sorrow repaired to the King of England, praying counsell and assistance, where the King with a downe-cast looke gave him this answere: Thou dost see (O Hertold) that my forces are scarse sufficient to defend my selfe. Our Lord and Saviour was betrayed by his Disciple Iudas, and therefore who shall besafe? Behold the Earle of March, whom I tooke and reverenced as my Father, hath given a pernicious president. I have trusted in a staffe of reed, and the splinters thereof have wounded my hand. Thou art the onely man who hast behaved thy selfe honestly: whatsoever therefore thou doest possesse of mine, by any just Title, take it to thee as thine owne, I give it thee: Provide otherwise otherwise for thy selfe, as thou dost thinke it most expedient. The King of France, in whom all magnanimity, bounty, and Christian vertues did shine, hearing what Hertold had said and done, commended the man, and manner so highly, that saying, He loved and allowed such as he; The Castle was entrusted backe to the same Captaine, when with many teares and other signes of sorrow, hee had surrendred himselfe and it to Lewis. (66) Meane while the King looking carefully into the double-dealings of the Poictovines, who were the limitanie or border-subjects of the English dominions in Aquitaine, and by a nature proper to free March-men, which lie betweene the hammer and the Anvill, are enured to all sorts of devices how to save themselves, and delude others, wisely withdrawes his * large Pensions, which they by deep dissimulations and improfitable shewes of assistance had shared among them, for which they repayed nothing but secret scoffes of their Patron and Pay-master. The Earle of March whatsoever his Fees were from the King his Sonne in Law, made but an evill bargaine in the end: for, besides that the French King tooke from him no small portion of his Estate, he was openly appeached of Treason in the French Court, by a valiant Knight, who offered to proove the truth of his accusation by Battell. Isabel, whom the French in paſſion called Iezabel, because her pride and turbulent practises had procured all those evils, fled upon the newes to a Nunnerie. In the end yet her husband being aged, by the diligence and care of friends avoyded the Combate, and was suffered to returne home. The King (whose comming had beene long expected in England,) having ordained one Sir Nicholas de Molis his * Lieutenant in Aquitaine, is now under Saile, although the Gascoignes, because his presence was greatly beneficiall, had fought all the wayes they could to detaine him longer. Being returned, by reason of that unadvised and lossefull voyage into France, hee was compelled to be burthenous to his Subjects, as well by the levie of Escuage, as of loane and otherwise. The Iewes also felt the gripe of his wants so farre, that even Christians commiserated: whose Gold hee received with his owne hands, but their Silver by others. These and other importunate corrasions, were not made onely to fill up such breaches as the French affaires had produced, but also to spend in entertainments and showes.

The Poictovins policy in this last turne to deceive the King of his money.

The free assistance of his Subjects, Lords to the Kings demand for money.

(67) Neither will the Majestie and honour of the Kingdome permit, that such kindes of expense should be wanting, when publique occasions doe require; in which respects they are not onely usefull, but absolutely necessary, because Common-weales are partly founded upon the opinion which Subjects and Neighbours have of their power and riches, and their estimate is commonly made by that which is outwardly seene at such times. This care, besides the great love hee bare to his Wives kindred and Countrey-men, made him purvey for money in this manner; for in December the Lady Beatrix Countesse of Province, * mother to the Queenes of England and France, having with her the Lady Cincia, Cynthia, or Scientia, (for by all those names she is called in Authours) and a princely traine, in all points excellently well furnished, landed at Dover, where innumerable of the best sorts gave her welcome and attendance. London was hung with rich Ornaments, from the Bridge thereof to Westminster. The King therefore punishing the Keepers for their sloath, commanded that the sonne of Griffith (prisoner with his Father) should from thenceforth bee more narrowly watched. Not long after the which, David Prince of Wales provoked by wrongs, (chiefly done by the * Earle of Hereford) invaded the English Marshes, whom the Earles of Glouceſter and Hereford, and other mighty men in those parts, having the Kings consent and assistance, did withstand, yet fighting but with variable fortune. (69) About which time, many seditious persons were in the Court of England, which a hoped that warre with Scotland would bring them this commoditie, that the oppressions they did to the people should rest unpunished; for Lawes and Iustice have no place in time of battell. Their hope thus tooke beginning. Alexander King of Scots had married the Lady Mary, a goodly Gentle-woman, daughter to the Lord Ingelram de Cowcie, who (as all Frenchmen) being a deadly enemy to the King of England, had laboured to weaken that strength of amitie, which was betweene the two Kings of England and of Scots, as a point necessary or profitable for the tranquilitie of France. Their hope thus had ending; the said Ingelram by the stumbling of his Horse in a Foord, being cast out of the Saddle, and pitchr into the depth of the River, while his foote hung fast in the stirrop, his sword at the same time falling out of the sheath, and running him through, did moft strangely end his life by a triple death, with whom it seemed the humour of battell between the two Sister Nations likewise dyed: for not long after (notwithstanding the great preparations on both sides) all quarrels were absolutely b concluded, with relation to such Articles as had been formerly made betweene them at Yorke. The King of England had with him five thousand horse-men most fairely armed and appointed; besides a most puissant number of serviceable men on foote. The Welshmen feared and expected, that upon this agreement, the King would turne all his forces against them; but hee knowing it needlesse to use such numbers for that service, sent onely three hundreth men of Armes, under the Conduct of Sir Hubert Fitz-Matthew, to represse their attempts, but through their owne rashnesse, and the Welshmens valiancie, he and his people were with losse at that time scattered. The newes of this bad successe troubled the King neerely, for finall remedy whereof, he resolved to lead a full Army thither. But when to furnish this desigue hee prayed more Subsidie of the States of this Realme, they with one voyce and with one minde contradicted; though also his debts to Merchant-strangers for Wines, and other necessaries, were so many and continually called for, as hee could scarce passe abroad without their clamours. Nevertheless, the newes which hee received out of Aquitaine, where his Seneschall Nicholas de Molis had wonne the day in battell against the King of Navarre, did somewhat mitigate the sowrenesse of these over-thwarts; and for replenishment of Coffers, Robert Passelew so ordered the matter, by fining such as had encroched upon the Kings Forrests, that he unexpectedly beganne againe to make them over-flow.

(70) The great helpes which the King found by the new supply of his Treasure, made him daily consider, how to augment the same; and how to stop all undue Out-lets, by which it was ordinarily impaired. Vpon the departure of Otto the Popes Legate, who had well stuffed his owne and his Masters Cofers (and had no lesse filled the peoples hearts with repinings, and their mouthes with curses of him) there was some hope the Romish horse-leaches would for a while had left sucking the best juyce of the Land; but it proved otherwise, new Agents, Legats, and Factors, still comming over, as if England had beene a Well which could never bee drawne dry, and Rome a bottomelesse Gulfe which could never be filled full. Whereupon, before this, the King writ his letters both to this Pope, and to his Predecessor Gregorie 9. desiring them to surcease from thus afflicting England with their exactions; but neither one nor other of them would vouchsafe to bridle their owne wilfull motions, as if God and S. Peter (whose steps they follow not) had even bent their bowes against that Church of Rome. With which contempt the King had the more reason to be incensed, because the Pope had endeavoured to free David Prince of Wales from his homage made to King Henry, pretending that if it were done by feare or force, it was of no force, but utterly void. Notwithstanding the Pope seeing the King and State resolved to the contrary, was desirous not onely to hold fast the Kings goodwill, but also to come into England; to which purpose hee caused his Cardinals to write their perswasory Letters to the King, as a thing tending much to his safety, and to his Kingdomes immortall glory, to enjoy the Lord Popes presence, who did long to see the delicacies of Westminster, and the riches of London: but the Kings Counsell told him, that the Romans Rapines and Simonies had enough stained Englands purity, though the Pope himselfe came not personally to spoile and prey upon the wealth of this Church and Kingdome. The like deniall of entrance he had found both in France and Arragon, it being said, that the Pope was but like a mouse in a Sachell, or a Snake in ones bosome, who did but ill repay their Hosts for their lodging, and the infamies of the Popes Court deserved no other, whose filth (saith our Monke) sent forth a steme and stench as high as the very clouds. The Pope, though he could not come himselfe, yet he had his pipes and conducts to convay this stench into this land, and the wealth of it back in lieu thereof. Which was now so factioured by his Chaplaine Martin, that certaine of the Peeres commiserating the incessant depredation of the Land, tooke order for strickt watch at all the Ports in England, that all letters, comming daily from the Pope to picke mens purses, should be stopt. But soone after, a more generall redresse was intended against so unmercifull tyranny: the King finding by diligent inquiry, in every Shire, that the annuall revenues here, wherewith the Court of Rome had fraudulently and violently enriched Italians, amounted to threescore thousand Markes, to the great both wonder and anger of the King; which made him now begin to detest the insatiable greedinesse of the Court of Rome. Hereupon, for that the Pope had now summoned a Generall Councell at Lions, Ambassadors were thither sent, there publikely, in the name of the whole Kingdome, both to complaine and crave redresse of the Popes too long suffered extortions, (which were particularly there rehearsed, and which as being detestable to God and Man, they would no longer endure); and to disavow all subjection unjustly pretended from King Iohn, as whereunto both the then Archbishop openly contradicted, and the Nobles and State never consented, nor ever would. The Pope, (ashamed be like to be so taxed in so great an Assembly) is noted to have fate long silent, not so much as lifting up his eyes from the ground, till at length hee cut off their importunity with this briefe answere, That so difficult a matter would aske longer deliberation; which vaine delay enraged Earle Bygod, and the rest of the Kings Agents, that with threats and terrible oaths, they sware to remedy that themselves, which the Pope would not. And indeed the Nobles at home had already begun so to doe; having commanded Martin (the Popes Agent) to depart out of hand, for if hee stayed, he and all his company should be cut in pieces; who presently packing away, (the King also wishing the Divell to take him, having thus preyed upon his land) so enraged the Pope with tidings of this usage, that his Holinesse said; It is high time that we make a quicke end with the Emperour, that so wee may crush these petty Kings (meaning the English and French, who both denied him entrance into their land) who spurne against us; for the great Dragon being once crushed, those lesser poore Snakes will soone bee troden under.

(71) The Welsh affaires, by reason of the casuall death of Fitz-Matthew, growing daily lesse tractable then other, the King againe prepares to represse their insolencies in person. Before he sets forward hee came into London to the Church of Saint Paul, to the intent that before his departure hee might take his leave of the Citizens in a popular and loving manner. And because neither warre nor want could make him forget his magnificence, and bounty, he caused the East-part of the great Church at Westminster to bee taken downe, and by advise of expert Worke-men newly to be builded and joyned to the West. The effect of the Kings expedition into Wales was, that after he had fortified the Castle of Gannocke in North-Wales, upon the passage into Anglesey, and by the Irishmen wasted that fertile Iland, hee was himselfe enforced by sharpenesse of the weather, and for want of victuals, to returne about the end of October, having taken all courses he could to starve the Welsh, forbidding the Irish upon paine of death to bring any reliefe into Wales; and left that they of Cheshire, or the neighbour parts should give them any succour, bee so spoyled them of all their provisions, that they were scarce able to feede themselves; and if the Welsh compelled by famine ventred out of their strengthes or fastnesses, in or about Snowdon, the Garrison Souldiers of Gannocke were ready to intercept and kill them; and on the other side, the Lords of Brumfield and Powys, though Welsh-men, held with the King, so that they were miserably straitned. The King pawned his Iewels to his brother Richard at this journey for three thousand Markes, which holpe to piece out the charge thereof. Paris hath a long list of great names, which dying about this time, left neither name, nor issue to preserve the memory of their Greatnesse; but none so strange as of the Marshals, five Brethren of them successively Earles of Fembroke, and all dying issueless; which hee attributeth to the judgement of God, for the iniquity of their Father, and of themselves, who would never restore certaine Manours, which their Father in warre time had taken in Ireland from the Bishop of Ferns, an holy Irish-man, who often required restitution, and for want thereof, did put them under Gods curse and his. * One doth indeed observe, that the Irish-Saints are vindicative; but certainely the examples of punishments for Sacriledge, and violent extortions are terrible in holy Scripture; and most fearefull was the sentence it selfe which Gods Prophet pronounced against Ahab for * Naboths Vineyard; agreeing with the very plague which this yeare fell upon the house of the Marshals.

(72) The Popes fury was now so much inflamed against King Henry and the English, for so disgracing him publikely in the Generall Councell, * that hee used lofty threats, if once the Emperour were quelled, to tame England also; and whetted on the French King, to enter on the Land, promising him all the helpes of the Church, and Papall power. But the just King, not onely refused so unjust an offer, (as having no title to England, themselves also knit by kindred, and by truce, their Queenes being sisters, the attempt bloudy for Christians, &c.) but further ratified the former truce, and enlarged it with the addition of more yeeres, because King Lewis was prepared to make warre against the Infidels, which voyage King Henry would not hinder, but advance. And that nothing might disturbe the peacefull life, with which the King of England was most delighted, David Prince of Wales departed out of the vale of the dying, (as Paris elegantly saith) into the vale of the dead. The King seeing all things quiet and safe about him, doth now convert his whole cares to the reformation of the inward maladies of his dominions, calling the estates of the Land together for that purpose. To whom hee there delivered in writing, sundry * Articles of the grievances and oppressions of his Kingdome, and the Church. 1. That the Pope extorts great Contributions of the Clergy, without the Kings assent, against the rights and liberties of the Kingdome. 2. That Patrons cannot bestow Church-livings on fit men; but the Pope gives them to his Romans, who can speake no English, (nor celebrate divine service, nor preach, nor keepe hospitality, nor care for soules, &c.) but onely beggar the Land with carrying away the Coyne. 3. That the Popes Provisions and Pensions are unsufferable. 4. That Englishmen are drawne forth of the land to end their causes. 5. That the Pope by his Non obstante overthrowes Oathes, Customes, Charters, Grants, Statutes, Priviledges, Rights, &c. Whereupon, the King, Bishops, Nobles, Abbots, and Priors, did all write * their severall complaints to the Pope, requiring speedy redresse of those infinit wrongs to the King, the Kingdome, the Clergy, the Nobles, and the People, who would rather dye, then thus daily endure those oppressions. Notwithstanding sundry Prelates (either out of ambition or feare) under-hand furthered the Popes desires, when secretely hee craved an annuall tallage of the Clergy for maintenance of his Souldiers; and that the State should take no notice thereof, the Pope caused his Agents to make them * sweare, not to reveale this their Contribution to any man living, for the space of halfe a yeere. Yet the King came to the knowledge thereof; and sent forth his writs, Forbidding under great penalty that the money should bee carried forth of the land. This the Kings displeasure was much augmented upon the returne of his messengers from the Councell of Lyons, who related how proudly the Pope rejected the just complaints of the State, saying, the King himselfe did Frederixe, and holding his people as Schismatickes. Which incensed the King to publish his Proclamation in every City and Towne, That none of his subjects should dare to contribute any money to the Pope: but it came to no effect, for that some * Popizing Bishops and ambitious Clerkes (of his Councell) fearing the Papall threats, where no cause of feare was, drew him to leave his purpose womanly, which hee manfully undertooke.

(73) The Bishop of Worcester (a principall worker heercin) was said to * have had authority from the Pope to interdict the land, which perhaps was it which the King so greatly feared, and which the Monke said, was not worth the fearing. The Earle of Cornemall also with others (who favoured not the Emperour Fredericks cause) laboured to change the Kings mind, so that the wonted extortions were as current as ever; insomuch that a * Cardinall truely told the Pope, that England was to the Pope as Balaams Asse, which being so often wronged, spurgalled, and cudgeled, it was no marvaile, if at length shee opened her mouth to complaine: and for themselves and their Roman Court, they were like Ismael, * every mans hand against them, and theirs against every man. But if we should so often insist on the relation of this Kingdomes distresses, as the Popes endlesse Corasions from yeere to yeere, and the States remedilesse complaints, give us occasion, wee should but cloy the Reader with rufull matter, which * Monks themselves have mournefully and copiously endited unto us, and set forth the too servile affections of our owne Ancestors, who still entred new consultations about the disease, but never brought the medicine unto a perfect receipt. For upon fresh angariations from Rome, the King * againe assembles his State to thinke of redresse, * the Common-wealth, as well of Laity as Clergy, being brought to the point of utter desolation, as the like was never heard in any age, whereof they againe made their lamentable complaint to the King, whose duety it was to protect the Land from such wrongs and dangers. Their onely remedy was, againe to write letters to the Pope, which slender meanes hee could as sleightly put off; and though (to stop the clamour for the present) hee promised never to send any Legates into England, but on entreaty of the State, yet daily did he send his raking Clerkes, with the power, though not the Title, and Enlignes of Legates, both into England and Ireland, so to delude the King, and still purloyne his Subjects.

(74) The State of the Kingdome still requiring reformation, there assembled againe at London certaine Prelates, Earles, and others, at the Kings commandement, where after so much purloyning by others, now the Kings owne errand and affaires was to get money for himselfe. But they (who gave such way to the Popes collections) were now all close-close-handed, and open-mouthed; for, besides their undutifull upbraiding the King with some oversights they untruly and seditiously charged him to have done contrary to the example of his magnificent Predecessors, In that his chiefe Iustice, Chancellor and Treasurer were of his owne chusing, and not by the Common Councell of the Realme, as they ought. The King inwardly touched herewith, yet seeing no other helpe, promiseth redresse and change for the better. Whereunto they answered; that they would expect a while with patience, and as the King shall carry himselfe toward them, so will they performe their obeysance to him. So the meeting was adjourned from that Candlemas till Midsummer; at which time also there was nothing done, but all parts rose discontented. The cause of that discontentment was, for that the King, in stead of satisfying their audacious demands, answered them, That they sought to bridle him at their surly pleasures, proudly forbidding that in him, which was lawfull for themselves. For that every private man may use, what, and whose Counsell he list; every master of a family preferre or remoove what officers in his house he list; which yet they sancily denyed unto him, their Lord and Soveraigne, as if servants and vassals were to rule their Lords; whereas indeed hee is no King but a servant, who must bow at others becke. That therefore hee would neither place nor displace either Chancellour, Iustitiar, or Treasurer, as they thought good. Neverthelesse he required money at their hands, to recover such forreine lands as concerned as well them as him, to see it done. Hereupon the Parliament brake up, and the King was left to furnish himselfe otherwise so well as hee could, even by sale of his Iewels, Plate, and other precious stuffe, after a dishonourable manner.

An. Dom. 1249. A. Reg. 33. Simon Earle of Leicester returnes with honour out of Gascoigne.

(77) The affaires of Gascoigne (which one Guasto de Biard had greatly troubled) by the manhood and wit of Simon Earle of Leicester were now brought into better quiet, which made his presence (being returned, as it seemeth for more supplies, which went again with him) very acceptable in the Court of England. The King intending to furnish that enterprise afresh against the comming Spring-time, left no meanes unthought of, which either by Art or strong entreaty he could use, to replenish his exhausted Coffers. In which he embased too much the Royall name and dignitie, telling some (and perhaps truly) whose bountie hee craved, that it was more almes to aid him with money, then one that went begging from dore to dore. Meane while the King neglects not his administration of Iustice; for, whereas the whole Countie of Hampshire swarmed with Felons and murther ous Robbers, himselfe so ordered the matter, sitting in person in Winchester-Castle, that the infamie and danger of those places were cleared by hanging the Offendors; many of which were very wealthy, and some the Kings owne Servants: Walter de Clifford also (a Baron of the Marches of Wales) for enforcing an officer (whom he had otherwise handled badly) to eate the Kings Writ, Waxe and all, ranne so farre into the Kings displeasure thereby, that while he lived, he was made the lesse able to feede himselfe; paying to the King a very great summe of money, and hardly escaping without confiscation of his whole patrimonie. The King desirous to be friends with the Citizens of London, to whom of late he had beene overhard, publikely reconciled himselfe unto them, whom for that cause he had commanded to appeare at Westminster, and there immediatly received the badge of the Crosse at the hand of Boniface Archbishop of Canterbury; but whatsoever his intention was, it never came into action on his part. In the meane time, contrary to his Fore-fathers example, hee so much abridged the expences of his house, and his Almes, that he under-went some dishonourable imputation. Neverthelesse he wisely wound himself out of many a Merchants debt; whereto he wrung great helpes from the Iewes, (as the ordinary Clippers and defacers of his Coyne,) and the forgers of Seales and Charters; from one of whom hee had at times drawne thirty thousand markes Sterling, besides two hundreth markes in Gold.

An. Dom. 1250. A. Reg. 34. Walter Clifford makes an officer eate the Kings Writ, (waxe and all).

(78) It seemeth an inseparable quality in his nature, to be extreamely violent, in doing whatsoever he had a minde to doe, and that sometime without the due respect to secular Majestie; as in the course hee tooke for advancing his halfe-brother Aethelmare to the Bishoprick of Winchester. For not contenting himself to have sent his messengers to the Covent by them to worke the election, hee came thither in person, where the Chapter being set in the Cathedral Church, he entred, and placing himselfe in the Presidents seat, makes to them a speech in the nature of a Sermon, taking for his Theme those words of David: Iustice and Peace kisse each other. Whereon hee shewed them, That, whereas Iustice belonged to him, and to such as had the rule of Nations, and to the Clergie calmenesse and Peace, both these should that day kisse together, if they elected his brother for their Bishop: For which he gave them many reasons, but concluded, if they did otherwise, they should feele his Princely displeasure. When therefore they publish ed to the King their Choise, they did it with this reservation, (because Aethelmare was to remaine under the title of the Elect of Winchester, for that hee was not a Priest) if such an election might stand by Law, or lawfull favour. But the Pope, who meant to make his advantage hereof, as well as the King, exacted of him for confirmation of the same election, five hundreth Markes of Church-revenewes, to bee passed over unto the Earle of Burgundies Sonne a Childe; which makes * the Monke to breake forth into this bitter lamentation; O Pope, the Chiefe of Fathers, why dost thou suffer thus the Christian world to bee defiled? worthily, therefore art thou * driven out of thine owne City and See, and like a runnagate and another Cham, art inforced to wander up and downe. O God, thou God of just revenge, when wilt thou draw forth thy sword to imbrue it in the blood of such oppressors? Though in these universall abuses, the Pope would neither redresse himselfe nor others, yet God raised up a stout and learned Prelate, Robert Grosseste Bishop of Lincolne, who undertooke to reforme the Monkes and Friars; but they (who knew Rome was from the beginning * Asylum Latronum) appealed to the Pope. Whereupon the aged Bishop going to his Holinesse, tolde him that all offenders escaped, by his opening his bosome to such as brought him Bribes; who snapping him up with angry countenance and speech, sent him home with reproach. The Pope was at this time at Lyons, where not long after the Councell breaking up, Cardinall Hugo made a Sermon of farewell to the Citizens: wherein, amongst other benefits which the Popes lying in their City had brought them, hee told them this was a * Principall, that whereas at their comming there were three or foure Whore-houses in Lyons, now at their departing they left but one, but indeed that reached from the East-Gate of the City to the West. Whereby we see, France had some part of the Popes Almes, as well as England.

(77) The King now wholly intented upon encrease of treasure, neither gave any rich presents according to the ancient Custome of England, nor robed himselfe in royall estate, but shortned yet more the allowances of his household and entertainements, without any regard to Majesty or rumour. And to spare his owne charge the rather, he invites himselfe sometime to this man, and sometime to that, but no where contenting himselfe with his dyet and hospitage, unlesse both hee, his Queene, and Sonne Edward, yea and chiefe favourites in Court, were presented with great and coftly gifts, which they tooke not as of Courtesie, but as due. This was the unhonourable face of the Kings estate at that time. is converted to aliens, and our houses to strangers. The matter seemed the more grievous, for that their pride and violence were intollerable. About this time the clause Non obstante (brought in first by the Pope) was taken up in England by the King, in his grants and other writings, as * Non obstante priore mandato, Non obstante * antiqua libertate, &c. This our ancient Author cals an odious and detestable clause: and Roger de Thurkeby Iustitiar, fetching a deepe sigh at the sight thereof, cryed out both of the times and it, saying, * it was a streame derived from that sulphurious fountaine of the Clergy.

Alexander the third King of Scots, espouseth the Lady Margaret.

(78) Another of the Kings Iusticiars, and a learned Knight, Sir Henry de Bath, (whose Lady, because her selfe was well descended, filled him with pride,) was so confidently greedy, the better to satisfie her ambition, that in one circuit, hee appropriated to himselfe above two hundreth pound lands, Corruption in Iustice (which must needs bee suspected to be there, where excessive wealth is gotten by the Officers of Iustice) is but a sandy ground worke of a vainely hoped greatnesse, and may well bee reputed in the number of crying sinnes; and this mooved a Knight, Sir Philip de Arci, to appeach him before the King, both for unfaithfulnesse in his office, and treason against the King. The King had no hold of himselfe, after hee was once throughly kindled. Bath knowes it, and therefore writes to his Wives friends to come strong in his defence, that the King should not dare to call him to his tryall; yet withall hee feekes all secret meanes how to appease the King; who understanding of this combination, was the more enflamed. The Earle of Cornewall his brother could not appease him; no, not though hee knit up his interceffion with these minatory words; Wee must not forsake Gentlemen in their right, nor in preserving the peace of the tottering Kingdome. In March there was holden a Parliament at London; there the King caused Bath to be sharpely prosecuted. Thither Sir Henry Bath repaires, strongly attended with Knights and Gentlemen of his owne friends, and his Wives, to daunt the edge of Iustice, which hee deservedly feared. The accusations were many, (for all men were called to say what they could against him,) and among all, these two, most haynous: That hee troubled the whole Realme, and stirred all the Barons thereof against the King, so that a generall rebellion was to be feared, (which one of his fellow-Iustiiars did openly testifie:) That hee had for reward discharged a convicted Malefactor out of prison without punishment, in prejudice of the King, and to the perill of his associate Iustitiars. The King was so enraged herewith, that seeing no other way to punish him, being so strongly backed, he mounted into an higher place then before, and cryes out, Whosoever kils Henry de Bath shall bee quit of his death, and I heere doe acquit him; and presently departs. Nevertheless, although hee left behind him many men, who would have readily executed the Kings terrible doome; yet by the wisedome of Sir John Mansell, (one of the Kings private Counsellors) they were restrained. His words are worthy to be remembred; Gentlemen, and friends, it is not necessary for us to put that presently in execution which the King hath in his anger commanded. It may bee when his wrath is over-blowne, hee will bee sorry hee said it. Moreover, if any outrage bee done to Bath, loe heere are his friends, who will take all sorts of revenge. Sir Henry escaping thus from so present a danger, found meanes upon promise of * money and great mediation of friends, to obtaine his peace and safety; for at this time, Iustice and all things grew saileable. The North-East part of Wales was committed to Alan de Zouch, who had it in Farme for eleven hundreth Markes yeerely, whereas John de Gray (whom he supplanted in the place) paid but five hundreth, so * miserable Wales was het out to such as would give most.

The young King of Scots is suiter to the King for bringing Philip Lovell into favour againe.

The most witty and princely intimations of the young King, to the King his father in Law.

Philip Lovell reconciled to the King.

(79) Alexander the third, succeeding his Father in the Kingdome of Scotland, comming in Christmas to Yorke, there espoused, though very young, the Lady Margaret, daughter to King Henry. There were present the two Kings in person, with a most choise multitude of either Nation, the English being in number above a thousand Knights, besides greater States, as Prelates, Earles, and Barons, and of the Scots about sixe hundreth Knights and Gentlemen, all of them well appointed. There was also two Queenes, the Mother of the Bride, (who was to be Queene) and the Widow, or Queene Dowager of Scotland, who for that cause was returned out of France, attended upon in royall manner with many Lords and Gentlemen of France. The Scots were lodged in one place of the City by themselves. Vpon Christmas day the King of England gave the order of Knighthood to the King of Scots, and at the same time to twenty others richly apparrelled. Vpon the next day the princely couple were espoused. Take a scantling of the cheere and multitude of guests by this. The Archbishop of Yorke, who was Prince (as it were) of the Northerne parts (and the common hoft of all that most noble fellowship, which cost him about foure thousand markes) gave toward that Feast sixe hundreth fat Oxen, all which were spent in the first generall service; and whatsoever the vaine * Stage-play of the World might affoord, either for pompe or delight, was there all enjoyed. More worthy to bee remembred, then that magnificent gluttony, (the naturall vice of these our Nations) was the orderly and no childish action of the young Bridegroome, in reconciling Philip Lovell (whom King Henry had lately fined and discourted for taking Bribes) to the King his Lord. King Alexander undertaking the businesse, and finding a fit time, presents himselfe to the King of England upon his knees, holding up his hands, neither would he rise, though earnestly requested, but with a gesture which seemed to draw teares of joy and love from the eyes of such as * late round about, professing his intent, saith; My Lord King, your Majesty knowes, that though I my selfe am a King, and through your goodnesse honoured with the Girdle of Knight-hood, yet that I am withall both a Child, as well in age as in Knowledge, and also an Orphan, my father being dead, and my mother leaving mee; though at your sending for, hee is now pleased to bee present, therefore from henceforth, and for ever after, I heere doe take you, both for Father and Mother, that you may supply both their wants, and with your paternall care, helpe and protect all mine insufficiencies. The King scarce able to refraine from tender teares, or to hold downe his throbbings, said no more but onely this one word, Willingly. The princely Child replyed thereupon: I will make experiment of that, and know it by proofe; seeing you have graciously heard mee hitherto, in trying whether I shall reape the effect of my first suit. Then hee declared his request, and had it; so that Lovell was afterward Treasurer.

Simon Earle of Leicester rather to bee called Simon, as the Gascoignes faid.

(80) The State and fidelity of the Gascoignes was so desperately shaken and plunged by the revenges which Simon de Montfort (to whom the King had given the government of their Country for sixe yeeres,) had exercised upon them, for that they had accused him to the King of tyrannous and proditorious dealing, and affirmed, that his name ought rather to be Simon then Simon, that but for the vent of their Wives, (in which respect their subjection to England was very beneficiall to their Common-weale) it was thought they would generally have revolted. But the King though ready thus to leese Gascoigne, would yet needs hope to obtaine Normandy, and his other Lands in France without blowes. The King of France (whose conscience was wonderfully tender and sincere) had indeed written out of Palestine to that purpose, as thinking King Henries title was better then his owne: but the French, among whom their Kings misfortunes in the losse of Damiata in Ægypt, which was wholly * ascribed to the Popes avarice, who for money released those who should have ayded him,) had brought him into the lesse regard then his excellent vertues merited, did universally and constantly refuse, adding, that before the King of England should have any more Land among them, hee must passe through a thousand sharpe Lances, and a thousand bloudy Swords when the Lances were burst. On the other side, the King of England was but in little credit with his people; for, whereas (by an agreement betweene the Pope and him,) the Tenths of the Clergy through England during three yeeres should have beene received towards his charges in his preented journey to the Holy-land, yet in a generall Assembly at Westminster, very few were drawne to give their names to that service, notwithstanding that two Bishops and the Abbot of Westminster laboured in their Sermons all they could to stirre the people to that martiall Pilgrimage, and though the King himselfe in all their view tooke a most solemne Oath, that within three yeere hee would set forward; the onely reason of their unwillingnesse growing upon suspition, that he onely sought (as the Pope had given him example) to draw by this colour the treasure of the Realme into his hands. This their diffidence of sincerity in him, made him the rather incline to foster and favour strangers, and that with a kind of pervicacy, though himselfe by manifold neglects of his word, had worthily bred that diffidence.

The common opinion of the Kings defigne for the Holy-Land.

(81) The King could more hardly finde followers in such an enterprize, for that his people had no conceit of his valour, but faid: What reason encourageth him, who was never trained up in Martiall discipline, nor hath mannaged an Horse, nor drawne a Sword, nor charged a staffe, nor shooke a Target; to hope for a triumph over the Saracens, against whom the Chevalry of France hath miscarried? or wherefore dreames hee of recovery of more Land, who could not keepe that which hee had in forraigne parts? concluding, that hee was a man onely borne to draine their purses, to empty his owne, and to multiply debts. This was the opinion of men, and behind his backe; but not onely of men, for Isabell Countesse of Arundel, Widow of Henry Earle of Arundel, a young Lady, receiving the repulse at the Kings hands in a matter which shee alledged to bee hers in equity, durst say thus to his face: O my Lord King; why doe you turne away from justice? wee cannot now obtaine that which is right in your Court; you are placed as a meane betweene God and us, but you neither governe us, nor your selfe, neither dread you to vexe the Church diversly, as it hath not onely felt in present, but often heretofore. Moreover you doubt not manifoldly to afflict the Nobles of the Kingdome. The King fired at so free a speech, with a scornefull and angry countenance, answered with a loud voyce; O my Lady Countesse, What? have the Lords of England, because you have tongue at will, made a Charter, and hyred you to bee their Orator and Advocate? whereunto the Countesse replyed: Not so my Lord, for they have made to mee no Charter, but that Charter which your Father made, and which your selfe confirmed, swearing to keepe the same inviolably and constantly, and often extorting money, upon promise that the Liberties therein contained should bee faithfully observed, you have not kept, but without regard to honour or conscience, broken. Therefore are you found to bee a manifest violater of your faith and oath. For where are the Liberties of England so often fairely engrost in writing? so often granted? so often bought? Therefore though a woman, and all the naturall loyall people of the Land, appeale against you to the Tribunall of the fearefull Iudge, and Heaven and Earth shall beare us witnesse, that we are used unjustly, and God the Lord of revenges right us. The King abashed at these words, asked her, If shee did not looke to obtaine her suite upon favour, in regard shee was his Kinswoman? whereunto shee answered: That seeing hee had denyed that which the Law gave, how could shee hope to obtaine her suite by favour? Therefore (said shee) I doe appeale to the presence of Christ, against those also your Counsellors, who bewitch and dull your judgement, and draw you out of the path of truth, gaping onely after their owne commodity. But the King (saith Paris) remained incorrigible, and the Lady lost both her charges, hopes, and travell.

A perillous bold dialogue betweene the Countesse of Arundel, and the King.

An. Dom. 1253. A. Reg. 37.

(82) Thus harsh were the former yeeres to the King and Kingdome: let us see what more gentle or rougher accidents rise unto us in the next. But it then at the first little better appeares; for the King having bought out the time which Simon de Montfort had in the government of Gascoigne (which now hee gives to Prince Edward) was truely advertised, that Guasto de Biard was turned Spanish, and laboured by all the meanes hee could to plucke that part from the English obedience. Alfonse King of Spaine, claimed the same by vertue of a Charter made thereof by Henry the second; confirmed by Richard and John Kings of England. Simon Earle of Leicester thus displaced, to let the World see that hee would not for any preferment incurre the suspition of disloyalty, refused most honourable offers, which (after the death of Lady Blanch, Queene Dowager, and Rectrix of France,) the French Nobility made him, if hee would with his counsell and Force helpe to sustaine that Monarchy, while Lewis their King was absent. In the meane time the King of England (all old matters being buried in oblivion, upon hope of future amendment) for advancement of his martiall Pilgrimage, had large aydes granted him in Parliament; but upon condition that hee should now at last, once for all, submit himselfe to governe by a Law, not at his pleasure, confirming the Charters of Liberties, against the breakers whereof a most solemne curse was pronounced by the Kings assent. The Archbishop, Bishop, and the rest of the Prelates pontifically apparelled, pronounced that curse with Tapers burning, which when they had throwne away upon the pavement, where they lay extinguished and smoaking, the King (having layde his hand on his breast all the while,) sware to keepe all Liberties upon paine of that execratory sentence; as hee was a Man, a Christian, a Knight, and a King annointed and crowned. The businesses of Gascoigne soone after called him to a neerer warre, whither upon his promise made to the Gascoignes, he set faile, leaving his sonne Prince Edward, and his Kingdome to the government of his Brother, the Earle of Cornwall, and the Queene his Wife: his arrivall there giving a light and stay to all the affaires thereof. Such holds as held against him, hee reduced to obedience, but with too faulty a Clemency, sparing most open Traitors, whereas if an English-man had offended, hee was sure to smart for it, and that rather more then lesse.

The King of Spaine claimes Gascoigne.

Simon Earle of Leicester, refuseth high honour in France to avoide the suspition of disloyalty to England.

(83) His fearenow was, lest the Gascoignes should draw in the Spaniards, and relinquish his soveraigne-ty. To prevent this, hee very prudently and seasonably sent Ambassadours to Alfonse King of Spaine and Castile, to desire that the Lady Eleanor his Sister, might bee given in marriage to Prince Edward. The motion was well approoved, and besides that, they brought Letters Patents from the King of Spaine, in which, among all other Clauses it was contained, that the King of Spaine did quit his claime and whole right, which by vertue of any Grants from Henry, Richard, and John, Kings of England, he had, or ought to have. Hereupon hee sends both for his Sonne, (whom the King of Spaine desired might bee convayed to him, onely with a noble intent to see and doe him honour) and for his Wife the Queene. Among other Acts of sincerity and love, Alfonse sent to the King of England good advice: that, after the example of good Kings and Princes, hee should bee a Lambe toward his subjects, and Servitors, and a Lion to Aliens and Rebels. Simon Earle of Leicester with a gallant Troupe of Souldiers offered his service to the King, who admiring the Earles charity, received him with all joy possible: at which reconciliation, the the Gascoignes * who feared him like lightning, were so appalled, that they came * droppingly in, and became good Subjects. That valorous Earle was thereunto mooved by that great, free, and noble Prelate, Robert Grosted, called *the * Maull of the Romans*, as being a great curbe in those dayes of the Popes ungodly courses towards his State of England; against which he writ a * famous letter to his Holinesse, learnedly proving, that his detestable, abhominable, soule-murdering actions, did evince him to bee an Heretick, worthy of death, to bee Antichrist, and to sit in the Chaire of pestilence, as next to Lucifer himselfe, and that hee had no power to excommunicate such as resisted those his actions. With which Catholike Letter, the Pope was besides himselfe for rage, swearing by Saint Peter and Saint Paul, that hee could finde in his heart to make that doting Prelate a mirrour of confusion to all the world for his sawcinesse. But some wiser Cardinals advised him from any sharper course against him, telling the Pope that all was true hee said of their Courts abuses; that hee was Holier then any of themselves, and one who had no Peere amongst all other Prelates for sanctitie or learning; and therefore it were best to hush the matter, for feare of stirring coales, especially sith it was knowne, that at length there would bee a departure from their Church. This noble Prelate dyed this very yeere, with opinion of a Saint in despite of the Pope, (who would have had his bones throwne out of the Church) leaving this * Prophetical farewell at his very last gaspe; that the Church would never bee set free from such her Egyptian servitude, but by the dint of bloody sword.

(84) Soone after the Queenes arriving in Gascoigne, when all things were rightly prepared, Prince Edward was thence sent into Spaine, where, at the Citie of Burgos hee married the Lady Eleanor, sister to the King, with great honour, having first received Knight-hood at his hand; which done, hee returnes with his Bride to Burdeaux, from whence they all together came safe thorow France into England. What treasure this noble young Princesse brought in portion to her Husband, wee cannot say; but the King forthwith gave his Sonne Gascoigne, Ireland, Wales, Bristow, Stanford, and Grantham. Hee had drawne upon himselfe a debt, in this and other his actions, of above three hundred thousand Markes; the King of France being not long before returned from the Holy-Land, gave them both safe-conduct in their passage, and did to him, and his whole noble company all the honour which the wit of man, or the most goodly Kingdome of France could affoord. There were at Paris in this entertainment Beatrix the Countesse of Province, and foure Queenes her Daughters. The King of England had in his owne Housshold traine, a thousand choice and excellent Horse, beside Carriages, Sumpters, and Coursers. He was lodged in the Pallace of the old Temple, being an house almost capable of an Armie, where the next morning he commanded that all forts of poore should bee releeved with his charitie and Almes. The magnificence of the great Feast of the Kings, at the King of Englands charge, shall be expressed in our Authors owne words, who is bold to affirme, that Assuerus, Arthur, Charles the Great, had never any such. After dinner, the King sent to the French Lords, and men of Armes, Plate, Buckles of Gold, and other royall presents. The King of England sate at the Table on the right hand of the French King, and the King of Navarre on the left. But the French King contended much in curtesie to the contrary, till King Henry obstinately refused saying, the King of France was his Lord, and should be, for there was reason, meaning, because hee held his Lands in France of him. To whom the most just and gratious King Lewis with a soft voice answered; Would to God every one had his right without offence, meaning such other lands as the English Crowne had right unto. At another time he gave the reason why the Peeres of France would not consent to the restitution of Normandy, for that the Normans would never learne to keepe their Borders in quiet. The English King did to himselfe, and to the English name great honour, in his whole behaviour and carriage, which was full of Charity towards the poore (a vertue for which in those dayes Kings chiefly fought to be commended) of Majestie, Magnificence, and all sorts of royall liberalitie and gentlenesse. The King and Court of France brought him an whole dayes journey upon the way. Hee staid a while at Bologne for a winde, but returned safe, having peaceably meatured a way thorow France, out of Gascoigne; which his Martiall Nephewes, Kings of England, trode afterward in another manner, drawing lines of blood and fire over all France, the most pleasant, rich, and spacious Realme of Christendome.

An. Dom. 1255. Edmund the Kings second Sonne King of Sicilia.

(85) Eleanor Prince Edwards wife landed at Dover in great State. On the other side, Edmund the Kings second sonne, by a Ring, which the Pope sent (so to ingage King Henry in his warres against Manfredus, the Sonne of the late Emperour Frederick) was solemnly invested in the Kingdome of Sicily. The Ambassadour was a Bishop, who forthwith departed, for indeed his errand was in shew glorious, but in truth both delusory and unprofitable, aswell because the King had already unreasonably interessed himselfe in this quarrell, (the Pope having changed his vowe against the Turkes, into this against Christians,) as also, for that the Roman Armie which (by the Popes fetches) warred most at his charge; was (notwithstanding the Popes blessings) utterly overthrowne, before this ayrie honour could be setled in the Lord Edmund, whom yet his Father (whose credulity the Pope for his owne ends had shamefully inveigled, by drawing him into obligarions of * two hundreth and fifty thousand pounds) openly tearmed and used as the King of Sicilie, (for which also hee used this annexed Scale) highly pleasing himselfe in the variety of a wastfull Title, to his owne, and *his whole Kingdomes * extreame impoverishment.*

Edmund King of Sicil.

An. Dom. 1256. A. Reg. 40.

(86) The Calamities of the Kingdome in these exhaustings, was the more lamentable, because they were countenanced by the King, who should have repelled them. But the Pope having no so easie way to bee supplied as by the King, nor the King any but by the People, both Pope and King were well accorded to grinde the people each for the others uses; the King to satisfie the Popes Avarice; the Pope to advance the Kings Ambition. The gayning of the Kingdome of Sicilie must bee the colour, for which the King was resolved to goe in person; and therefore Rostandus (the Popes Agent) sent to gather the Tenth of all England, Scotland and Ireland, for the Popes use: and the Kings, indifferently, had called a great Councell the former yeare, and adiourned it * till this; where he also required all the Prelates to binde themselves to the Popes Marchants, as having received of them a great summe of money, which was imployed to the use of their Churches. At which guilefull and untrue devise, the Prelates replyed they would rather dye then suffer such oppression, and that they held it a manifester Martyrdome to dye in such a cause, then was the death of Thomas Becket. The Nobles also peremptorily refused either to recover Sicilie, or to beare the charge thereof, being both impossible; the one for the strength of Manfredus, the other for the present poverty of England. And indeede soone after the Pope and Manfrede were made friends, and so King Henry and King Edmund beguiled, one of his great expences, the other of his high hopes. The King was herewith wakened out of a sweete dreame wherein till then he continued, feeding his minde with the hope to leave to either of his Sonnes a Kingdome; though neither so hee rested quiet till hee had almost throwne the Crowne into the gulphes of irrecoverable debts and usury. The young King of Scots and his Queene, about this time came into England to visite their best friends, the King and Queene of this Kingdome, which lay wholly open to their honour and uses. The King, to let his Sonne in law see how welcome hee was, did bestow upon him the Earledome of Huntingdon; They, and their Queenes, with almost all the great Lords and Ladies of England met at Woodstocke by Oxford, from whence they came to London. The King was unwilling to deny his Sonne in law and Daughter any thing, for at their earnest suit he pardoned Sir William de Lile Knight, Sheriffe of Northamptonshire, who was prooved to have practised by most fowle suborned treacherie to spoile another Gentleman of his estate: for which the said Lile had dyed a shamefull, but a worthy, death by drawing and hanging, had not his Wives teares and prayers made the King and Queene of Scots their intercessors. Thus the young Princes returned into Scotland, worthily well contented.

(87) The King, much the fresher to undergoe serious affaires, by reason of the late comfort he had in his Childe the Queene of Scots, bestirres himselfe and comes in person into the Exchequer among the Barons thereof, when the Court was set, and made sharpe orders against all Sheriffes and Bayliffes of Townes incorporate, who did not yeerely appeare at the Exchequer, to pay such money of the Kings as was come to their hands. At the same time all the Sheriffes of England were emerced, because they had not distreined all those which had such estates in Land, as the law limiteth, to take the order of Knighthoode, or pay their fines. Which of the Lords could say now, that the King would not proove a good Husband? Howbeit the case of the people seemed nothing relieved, for (saith Paris) there were so many petty Tyrants, by the negligence or connivence of one, that the auncient State of England, when it had many Kings, seemed to be brought in againe.

(88) Occasions of expence, like the heads of Hydra, daily encreased. The Welsh (oppreſt by Geoffrey de Langley, an officer upon the Marches) rose in armes, and ministred one of those occasions, but that Prince Edward, to whom his Father had given Wales, was left therein to himselfe, for his Father could spare no money. The Prince therefore borrowes some thousands of Markes of his Vncle Richard, and with his owne and them wageth Souldiers; his servants behaved themselves most violently every where, taking without paiment, or paying with blowes; and it was the humour also of their young Master, who had store of martiall and stirring fire in his bosome. The Welsh therefore would not for any perswasions bee drawne to lay downe weapons, but having about ten thousand of their countrey horsemen, and many more on foot, tooke a solemne Oath, that they would stand together for their libertie and ancient lawes, holding it better to die with honour, then to live a wretched life in shame and servitude. And indeed they did great things under Prince Lewelyn ap Gruffith, by whose meanes they valiantly recovered all the Inland-countrey of North-Wales, with other places; and in one fight slew above two thousand Englishmen, and drave the rest out of the field. They also spoyled the land, to the very * gates of Chester. This they had the greater opportunitie to doe, for that the King, while he built kingdomes in the Clouds, and plunged himselfe into the Abysses of Vsury, suffered some few, his Sonne, his Brother, the Earle of Gloucester, and his halfe-brothers, with their families, to trample right and reason underfoot, and with his hatred to enrich themselves, his owne meanes daily consuming, and mens minds more and more alienated from him, as men that despaired of redresse and justice. The Welsh also persisting in their enterprise, made Prince Edward retire in a battaile, and he complaining to his Father, had no other comfort but this: What is that to mee? the land is thine of my gift. Put forth thy strength at first, and get honour in thy youth, that from thenceforth thy enemies may stand in feare of thee. As for me, I have somewhat else to doe.

(89) The greatest worldly forreine honour that (since Constantine) ever fell upon any English subject, was at this time, in regard both of his birth and riches, derived and tendred to Richard Earle of Cornewall, brother to the King, to whom was sent an honourable Ambassage out of Germany, who, in humble manner declared, that the Princes of the sacred Roman Empire had elected him King of Romans, beseeching him to accept of that their common choise. In testimonie whereof the Archbishop of Collein, high Chancellor of the Empire, Prince Elector, and other great Lords of Almaine, had sent their writing under seale, affirming, That never was any one with so generall consent and universall good liking elected to that place as hee, his name carrying it clearely without any contradiction among them. Vpon receipt of this most honourable invitation and offer, there was much debatement in the Chappell, where they sate upon the Earles behalfe, whether he should accept thereof, or no; but while all of them stood in doubt, the King puts in a deciding voyce, saying: Least my Brother bee thought faint-hearted, my opinion and requeſt is, that hee would not refuse to accept this honour, which God and man have tendred unto him. This made the squadron of the negatives to give way, and at least-wise to become Neutrals, till all objections were answered, as they were all of them by one or other, concluding in their speeches to the Earle; That he should bee warned, and withall stirred up to the Service of God, in acceptance of this highest place, by the example of Robert Curthose Duke of Normandy (eldest Sonne of William the first, King of England) to whom the Kingdome of Ierusalem, for the intent to rule the inheritance of Christ, was offered; which hee refusing to accept, did afterward feele the grievous wrath of God, and never had happy dayes after. To these and many other reasons, the King, his halfe-brothers, and specially the Elect Bishop of Winchester encouraged him, with one voyce, affirming, that this honour would exalt the English name for ever: The Earle therefore putting on the man, with a free and cheerefull voyce, answered: And I relying upon the goodnesse of Almightie God, though I am insufficient, and unworthy, to avoid the note of faintnesse, doe thankfully accept this burthen and honour, which Heaven (I hope) hath put into my hands. And then turning himselfe to the Bishops who were present, among which Richard Bishop of Bangor (from whose mouth our * Author wrote those things) was one, he concluded and said: Let mee before I depart out of this Chappell die, and suddenly be burnt with the fi. of Hell; if I doe accept thereof either for ambition, or avarice; but only to restore the Empire (which God grant) to a better estate, estate, and to governe them, who have willingly elected mee for their Lord, in modest, just, and honourable manner. These words exhaled joyfull teares from many of the hearers, and the Ambassadors returned to deliver the newes of this acceptance, who from thenceforth was King of Romans, that is, Emperour Elect, which title is used till they receive the Crowne Imperiall; though to all other purposes he is Emperour: so that King of Romans seemes to answer to the Title of Cæsar, which under the ancient Roman Emperours was given to the heire apparant of the Empire, or Coadjutors. After the German Ambassadors were gone, the King permitteth his Brother to send some over to sound the truth of the Electors and Peoples affections, which (in regard the English were originally Germans, and by late affinity incorporated, and for that English (saith Paris) was in a sort agreeable to the Almaine tongue) they found entire, and with that certitude returne. The King of England heereby seemed to have his desiges for recovery of Normandy, greatly strengthned, the Almaines and French hardly brooking one the other; but howsoever, sure it is that his Brother then ew King, had occasion to spend the golden Oyle, which was so long in gathering, to maintaine the light of this Imperiall lampe; and without question hee might bee liberall, for hee was reputed to possesse so much ready coyne, as would every day for tenne yeares afforde him an hundreth Markes upon the maine stocke, without reckoning his rents and revenues in Germany, and the English dominions. (90) In the meane time, while his brothers royall preparations were in hand, the King being for a weekes space at the Abbey of S. Albans, certaine Masters of Oxford brought a great complaint against the Bishop of Lincolne, for some encroachments upon the * ancient Liberties of that Vniversitie, to whom the King was gracious, and assigned a day; and Matthew Paris, whom the King in honour of his learned paines, admitted every day to his Table, and Chamber, said to him upon this Complaint; * My Leige, for Gods love have a care of the shaken state of the Church. The Vniversitie of Paris (the Nurse, and mother of so many holy Prelates) is not a little disquieted. If at the same time the Vniversitie of Oxford should be disturbed, which is the second Schoole of the Church, yea, the fundamentall base thereof, it is greatly to bee feared, least the whole Church doe fall to ruine. Whereunto the King made answer, God forbid that should happen at all, but chiefly in his dayes. Which in the Parliament then at hand, he accordingly provided for, to their contentation. The memory of the King seemes by this to have been excellent, for beside that he recounted to Paris all the Kings of England which had beene Canonized Saints, all the Princes Electors, and great Princes of Germany and France, hee called to minde the names of about two hundreth and fiftie Baronies in England.

(91) At this Parliament, (which was exceeding great) holden at London, the King in sight and view of all the people, brings forth his younger Sonne Edmund, attired like an Italian of Apulia, (which Country is a member of the Kingdome of Sicilia) and used this speech: Behold here good people, my Son Edmund, whom God of his gracious goodnesse hath called to the excellency of kingly dignity; how comely and well-worthy he is of all your favours, and how cruell and tyrannicall they are, who at this pinch, would deny him effectuall and timely helpe, both with advice and money? The sum of all was to draw a vast contribution from the Clergy for atchievement of this shadow (it proved no better) into his Coffers. Nevertheleſſe he obtained a grant of above fifty thousand Markes, upon covenant that the liberties of the Realme should bee really and finally once for ever established: which was done. There were present in this Parliament six Archbishops, Canterbury, Torke, Dublin, Collein, Messana in Sicilia, and Tarentum in Apulia. The politike Germans knew what they did in choosing Richard their King, for they saw a cloud of gold and silver would dissolve it selfe into showres among them at his arrivall; and all elections of strangers turne to their profit, because none is chosen that relies wholly upon the rents of the Empire.

(92) It was a worthy care in this King, that when by the provision of his Brother Richard King of Romans, there arrived in the River of Thames fifty saile of German Ships, laden with Corne, to relieve the great dearth, which then raigned through the Land, hee caused proclamation to be made, That no Citizen of London should buy any of that Corne to store up, which they were wont to doe, to the intent they might sell it the dearer afterward, to such as wanted. But no warning, prayers, advices, nor sense of wants were able to make him frugall of his expence; whereby he was miserably streightned, neither would the Laity in Parliament contribute any thing, but (hammering some great attemps in their thoughts) in plaine words concluded, That they neither would, nor could any longer endure such (as they called them) extortions. Moreover, they there uttered many grievances, and Simon Earle of Leicester complained of the dishonor and injury done him by William de Valence, calling him Traitor; so that against the Session to be holden upon prorogation, hee, the Earle of Gloucester, and Marshall, confederated themselves and (pretending the feare of strangers, the Kings favorites,) determined to come strong to Oxford at Saint Barnabas day. They also sent Messengers to the King of France, praying at least so much assistance, as that hee would not hinder the good purpose which they held of ordaining

Thus they prepared to abate (as it seemed) or banish the loftinesse and insolency of the Poictovines and of other Forreiners, by whom the King was powerfully led, for they despaired of redresse at his hands, who like another Proteus (Paris saith) tooke all shapes upon him to serve his turnes, and then slipt out at his pleasure, no promises, or ties, being strong enough to hold him. These were the beginnings of bloudy evils, and the seed-sparkes of those factious fires which afterward brake forth, from the sight and sense whereof, many thousands were taken by death, whose mortall stroake of pestilence raged over England, specially among the poore, through scarcity of food.

(93) When the time appointed for the Parliament at Oxford was come, the seditious Earles and Barons (with whom * sundry Bishops had taken Counsell against the King, the Lords annointed) repaired thither, and sternely propounded sundry traiterous Articles to the King, to which they required his assent. The chiefe poynts were, That the King would unfainedly keepe and observe the Charter of liberties, which hee had so often granted, and sworne to maintaine inviolable; That such a one should bee in the place of Chiefe Iustitiar, who would iudge according to right, without respect to poore, or rich, &c. Then they renewed their confederacy, solemnely swearing, That neither for life, nor death, nor love, nor hate, they would be drawne to relent in their purpose, till they had cleared England (in which themselves and their fore-fathers were borne) from upstarts and aliens, and had procured laudable Statutes, Those turbulent Nobles had yet a further plot, then all this; which was first broached (saith Mat: Westminster) by the disloyall Bishops, which was, *that 24. persons should there be chosen, to have the whole administration of the King and State, and yearely appointment of all great Officers, reserving onely to the king the * highest place at meetings, and salutations of honour in publike places.* And because they would not be crossed in their purposes, they came exquisitely armed & appointed, that so the King & his Aliens should be enforced, if they would not willingly assent. To all these their ordinations, the King and Prince Edward, was enforced to sweare, for feare of perpetuall imprisonment, the traiterous Lords having, by an Edict, threatned death to all that resisted. Whereupon all the Peeres and Prelates tooke their Corporall Oath to bee faithfull in this their infidelity, and made all who would abide in the Kingdome, to sweare they would stand to the tryall of their Peeres: the Archbishops and Bishops solemnely accursing all that should rebell against it. The * Monks themselves detesting this impudent treason, aske, with what forehead, especially Prelates, durst thus impaire the kingly Majesty, expressly against their sworne fidelity to him: This conjuration they so prosecured, that when William de Valence the Kings halfe-brother, denied with Oaths to render up any Castle which was given him, the Earle of Leicester, and the rest of the Barons answered, they would either have his Castles or his head. This violent proceeding so terrified the Poictovines, that sodainly they left Oxford, and shortly fled into France, where also the Barons had made them odious. Hugh Bigod, brother to the Earle Marshall, was made chiefe Iustitiar. The people seemed wholly theirs, which made the Barons so rough and peremptory in all their conferences, that when the Lord Henry, sonne to the King of Almain, refused to combine or take their oath, without his fathers consent, they roundly bad him know, That if his Father himselfe would not hold with the Baronage of England, hee should not have a furrow of earth among them. And least any thing which might tend to their securitie should seeme to be omitted, they using the kings name, commanded London to stand upon her guard, by keeping their Citie gates carefully shut, and by maintaining strong watches night by night, upon pretence of danger to the Realme through the practises of strangers; and after they dispatched thither certaine fit Agents, who in the Guild-hall made knowne their commission, which was directly to understand, Whether they would immutably adhere to the Barons and obey their constitutions, by manfully aiding and effectually supplying them in the common cause. Whereunto the Citizens condescended, binding themselves thereunto under the publike Seale of London.

(94) The Barons did as yet forbeare to declare, what those reformatorie Provisions should bee, because the Earle of Gloucester (a principall man among them) was in danger of death, whose sicknesse did perplex and suspend their proceedings, and the manner of his maladie did put them in doubt of their owne safeties, making them grow in distrust of their Cooks, their Butlers, and Sewers, for the Earle his body breaking out into pustules, and his haire, nailes, teeth and skinne it selfe, falling away, was (as many others, of which some died) thought to be poysoned. But whether they were or no, the Poictovins and strangers had the blame laid upon them, to make them the more odious to the Commons. But the Earle partly recovered his health in time, by the benefit of medicines and diligent attendance. The * poisons were said to have beene tempered in the house of Elias a Iew, afterward baptized. The King himselfe perhaps would not have beene sorry, if that he, Simon Earle of Leicester, and some few others of the Barons had beene with God, for how soever his body was among them, yet his heart was not at quiet, which in this wise well appeared. For being in the moneth of Iune upon the river of Thames in his Barge, the aire sodainely grew darke, and there ensued a terrible shower with thunder and lightning, of which the King impatient commands himselfe to bee set on land at the next place which was Durham house, whereas then, the Earle of Leicester lay. The Earle being ther of certified came out to entertaioe him, saying, Sir, why are you afraid: the tempest is now past: whereunto he answered with a severe looke: I feare thunder and lightning above measure, but by the head of God, I doe more feare thee then all the thunder and lightning of the world. Whereunto the Earle replied: My Liege, it is injurious & incredible, that you should stand in feare of me, who have alwaies beene loyall both to you and your Realme, whereas you ought to feare your enemies, such as destroy the Realme, and abuse you with bad Counsells. The Barons therefore remaining firme in their first purpose, send messengers abroad to will all such as had beene wronged by the Kings halfe-brothers, and other Poictovines and strangers, to present their grievances to the Barons, and to prosecute them. Moreover (because sundry other petty-tyrants of the English nation, encouraged by their example, had exceeded their limits, in oppressing their inferiours) they procured the King to appoint foure Knights Commissioners in every Shire, to enquire of all such injuries, and certifie the same under their seales within a certaine time limited.

(95) The Barons in the meane time neglected not their enterprize, at whose instance (principally of Hugh Bigod the new chiefe Iustitiar) Philip Lovel the Kings Treasurer, for abuses committed in the Kings Forrests and game, about Stony-Stratford, and many Officers of the Exchequer, were likewise removed, to give roome to such as the Barons better liked. The Sheriffes likewise of Shires, their practises, and extortions, were diligently seene into, and it was ordained, that as well the givers as the takers of bribes should bee severely punisht. The Welsh seeing these round proceedings in England, the peace and reformishment whereof they feared, laboured for reconciliation but could not then obtaine it.

(96) Richard King of Romans, having a desire to see the King his brother, and his lands in England, not without a purpose to bring an Army, or such a number of men as might greatly strengthen the King against the Barons, as they suspected, was advertised that that they provided for his resistance as well by Land as Sea. This made him, his Wife, and Sonne, to lay aside that purpose, and to arrive in a private manner at Dover with a small traine, in which there were onely two Earles, and about nine Knights. The King met him with great congratulation at the Sea side, but nor King, nor hee could bee suffered to enter into Dover Castle, because (forsooth) it was the principall Key of England; for the safegard whereof they openly exacted an Oath of him at Canterbury in this manner. The holy Gospels being laid upon the Pulpit in the Chapter-house at Cantrbury, the Barons reverently brought in thither the Kings of England and of Almaine; then Richard Earle of Glocester (for Simon Earle of Leicester was gone with others into France, to deale with the King and States thereof about a perpetuall league) standing in the midst openly, and in humble sort, cals Richard King of Romans unto him, by the name onely of Richard Earle of Cornwall, who obeyed accordingly, to whom he distinctly minisired the Oath following: *Heare all men, that I Richard Earle of Cornwall sweare upon the holy Gospels, to be faithfull and forward to reforme with you the Kingdome of England, hitherto by the counsell of wicked men too much deformed. And I will be an effectuall Coadiutor to expell the * Rebels and troubles of the Realme, from out the same. This oath will I observe upon paine to forfeit all the lands I have in England.* On the other side (had the King knowne how to use it) there fell out such dissention betweene the Earles of Glocester and Leicester, that Leicester departed from England discontented, saying, he tooke no joy to live among men so mutable and deceitfull. Nevertheless such meanes were used, that these two chiefe Captaines of the Barons, brake not forth into any farther division. Thus whiles the Barons using the Kings name, disposed of all things, and Simon de Montfort Earle of Leicester, was gone with others to transact with the French about an indissoluble league, the King himselfe through desire not to * be interrupted with forraine matters, if warre should rise at home, or through want of money or better advice, was induced (if not betrayed) to an act of little honour, though it carried with it the face of profit and setled quiet.

(97) For (the affaires of the realme thus strangely managed) the King in person sailes over into France, there to demand a peaceable restitution of such Signiories as Philip and Lewis (Father of this Lewis) had injuriously withdrawne from his Father King John. The French replied, that no restitution was due for many respects, specially, because the * ancient grant made to Rollo the first Duke of Normandy, was not voluntary, but extorted by feare and force of Armes, in the daies of the weake state of France. The King having * no disposition to recover his claimes by battle, and destitute of money wherewith to wage an Army, but principally for that his owne Peeres and people stood on their guard against him, did * unwillingly ratifie a conclusion; the Articles whereof were, that the King of France should quietly hold the Dukedome of Normandy, and Earledome of Anjou (* Main also, Touraine and Poicton) for * three hundred thousand small pounds of Tourain, and upon promise to receive other lands to the yearely value of twenty thousand pounds. Polydor saith, that the reputed limits of the English Pale in France, were from thenceforth the river of Charent in Xanctoing, and the mountaines Pyrenes; and that hee should peaceably have Angoumois, Quercy, and Limain, being Countries marching upon Gascoigne, in lieu of the rest, yet so as the King of England should * hold them of the Crowne of France by homage and fealtie. Vpon these Articles the King acquitted, and for ever renounced all his challenge to Normandy, and the other lands, and thenceforth abridged his Stile, and changed his Seale, using a Scepter in place of a Sword: whereon these Monkish and mockish verses were written,

(98) The King (at these unworthy rates) having secured himselfe from the French, labours to vindicate the Regall power out of the usurping Barons hands (whose over-toppings at home had driven him to those forraine indignities,) alleadging, that the Oath which his Sonne and hee had taken at Oxford, was voide, in regard it was compulsory, that the Barons also, who pretended the profite of the Realme, fought onely their owne honour and gaine, contrary to their decrees. For his more securitie * he takes the Tower of London, preparing force by the helpe of his Brother King of Romans. There followed a grievous perturbation of the Realme, although at this time it brake not forth into the extreamitie, Armes being laid downe for a little space. Edward the Kings eldest Sonne would not traverse the oath he had made at Oxford, but held with the * Barons for the present. The King, the Queene, and his selected friends, still remaine upon their guard in the Tower; where he (in the yeare before) had burst up the locks of the ancient Depositum, or dead stocke of the Crowne, to employ against the Barons. was notwithstanding brought about againe by the Queenes speciall diligence; and Dover and Rochester Castles (whither hee went in person) are delivered vnto him. This makes him resolve to pursue the Barons; the rather also for that the French King (who much condemned the Barons vnjust courses) had promised his assistance. Henry therefore thrusts out the Barons Chancellor, and Chiefe Iusticiar, placing Walter Merton and Philip Basset, men of much more loyall affections in their roomes. The Barons hearing of this, hasten in Armes to Winchester, where the King was, who (having intelligence by his faithfull Clerke, Sir John Mansell) got backe into the Tower of London. The King of France was made Vmpire in the quarrell. The * cause was heard at Amiens, where he gave iudgement with the King of England against the Barons, pronouncing all the Statutes and Acts made at Oxford, to be vtterly void: provided nevertheleſſe, that the Charter of Liberties which King John had made to the Engliſh nation, ſhould in no ſort bee thereby infringed. This proviſo animated Simon Earle of Leiceſter, and the Barons, to maintaine all the Statutes of Oxford, (becauſe they were pretendedly founded upon that Charter) notwithſtanding that juſt judgement which King Lewis had given. The ſecret confederacie with Lewelin Prince of Wales, miniſtred to the Barons no little encouragement; who about this time waſted the Dominions of Prince Edward in the Marches of Wales. This judgement of the French King did much diſadvantage the Barons, of whom divers being drawne with perſwaſions, gifts, and promiſes, revolted from Simon Montfort. There was now a taking of Townes and Priſoners on all hands. Prince Edward (who now was wholly for his Father, in deſpite of the Barons) takes the Caſtle of Briſtol, and fines the Citie at a thouſand pounds. Simon Montfort executeth his greateſt revenges upon the Queenes friends which were Aliens, not ſparing the Kings. Marching forward, he recovers Glaſter-Caſtle, enters Worceſter and Bridgenorth; laſtly, ſurpriſeth the Ile of Ely, ſubduing that faſtneſſe or ſenny ſtrength to the Barons uſe. Sir John Manſel the Kings Councellour, fearing the event of things, flies ſecretly from the Tower where the King was. Henry ſonne to the King of Almain, was after this taken by the Barons. Meane-while Prince Edward fortifies Windſor-Caſtle with Strangers: Mutuall wearineſſe at length begat a deſire of Peace, and the * King had yeelded that the Statutes of Oxford ſhould ſtand: but the Queene was vtterly againſt it, not without cauſe; for it did enfeeble the arbitration on which the French King had made. The Queenes oppoſition in this point was knowne to the Londoners; which put the baſer ſort into ſo lewd a rage, that ſhee being to ſhoote the Bridge from the Tower toward Windſor, they with dart and ſtones and villanous words forced her to returne. Prince Edward under the conduct of the Biſhop of Worceſter, came from the Caſtle of Briſtol (by reaſon of quarrell betweene his men of warre and the Burgers) and contrary to his promiſe entred into Windſor-Caſtle; but afterward going forth to meet Simon Montfort at Kingſton upon Thames, with purpoſe to offer peace, the ſaid Simon got Windſor-Caſtle, and would not permit him to depart. At London yet in a Parliament, matters were pierced againe, and the Kings ſide grew ſtronger daily.

(99) There were with him his brother King of Romans, his Sonne Edward, William de Valence (whom Prince Edward had brought out of France) John Comyn of Scotland, with a multitude of valiant Scots, (whoſe King was Henries ſonne in law,) John de Baliol Lord of Galloway, Robert de Brus, &c. with whom hee marcheth from London to Oxford, where the Rendevou of his friends and forces was appointed. The King meaning to make that place (where his chiefe blow was given him) his chiefe ſeate to conſult for remedies, diſmiſſed thence all the Students, by reaſon of their multitude, [b] being above 15000. (ſaith William Riſhanger who then lived) of thoſe only whoſe names were entred into the Matriculation booke, amongſt whom being ſo many young Nobles, the King doubted how they might bee affected to the Barons. Whereupon many of them went to Northampton, where then the Barons were ſtrong; and thither the King comming with his hoaſt, and breaking in at the Towne-walls upon Paſſion-Sunday, encountred his enemies, amonſt whom the [c] Students of Oxford had a banner by themſelves advanced right againſt the King, and they did more annoy him in the fight, then the reſt of the Barons: which the King (who at length prevailed) had vowed ſharpely to revenge, but that his Councellors told him, thoſe Students were the ſonnes and kindred of the Great-men of the Land, whom if he puniſhed, even the Nobles who now ſtood for him, would take Armes againſt him. The King there tooke Simon Montfort the younger, and fourteene other principall Barons and [d] Knights Banerers, fortie other Knights, beſides Eſquiers, &c. Encouraged with this ſucceſſe, hee advanceth the Standard royall toward Nottingham, burning and waſting the Barons Lands whereſoever he came. To divert this tempeſt, Simon Montfort haſteneth to London, and attempts the taking of Rocheſter-Caſtle, which John Earle of Warren defended for the King: who comming to raiſe the ſiege, takes Kingſton-Caſtle, which belonged to the Earle of Glouceſter; then unexpectedly falling upon ſuch as maintained the ſiege of Rocheſter, while Simon was abſent, kils very many, and ſcatters the reſt. Then ſeiſeth he the Caſtle of Tunbridge, and therein the Counteſſe of Glouceſter, whom, notwithſtanding he nobly ſet at large, as profeſſing not to warre againſt Ladies; from thence the Cloud of power borne upon the wings of indignation, ſpeeds to Winchelſea, and receive the Cinque-Portmen to grace, ſeeling at laſt in Lewis, where himſelfe reſted in the Priorie, and his ſonne in the Caſtle, whither the Barons ſent Letters to him, proteſting their loyall obſervance to his perſon, but all hoſtilitie to their enemies which were about him.

(100) But the King flaming with deſire of revenge, ſets ſlight by theſe vowed (but fained) fidelities; and returnes a full defiance as to Traitors, profeſſing that he takes the wrong of his friends, as his owne, and their enemies as his. The King of Almaine, Prince Edward, with other of the Kings chiefe friends, ſent their like letters of defiance. The Barons, loath to let it come to the hazardous and unkind triall of Steele, (though they then encamped about ſixe miles from Lewis,) not acquitting themſelves in this repulſe, iterate their meſſage, with an offer to pay to the King thirtie thouſand pounds, in ſatisfaction of ſuch hurts as their people had done through the Realme; ſo as the Statutes of Oxford might ſtand. The King of Almaine (whoſe honour they had toucht, and ſpoiled part of his inheritances) hindred all harkening to any their offers.

(101) It came to a battell; wherein Simon de Montford commands his trayterous Army to weare white Croſſes on breaſt and backe, to ſhew they fought for Iuſtice; great was the effuſion of bloud on both parts; chiefly of the Scots upon the Kings ſide, and of the Londoners upon the Earles ſide; whoſe Battalion, (lead by the Lord Segrave,) Prince Edward moſt furiouſly charged, and had the execution of them for about foure miles, which he purſued the more bloudily, in revenge of the extreame diſgrace which they had offered upon London-Bridge to the Queene his Mother, and after that the Garriſon of Tunbridge followes, and ſlew many at Croyden. But while the Prince ſpent himſelf in that revenge, his Father (who, having his Horſe ſlaine under him, had yeelded himſelfe priſoner to Simon de Monfort) his uncle the King of Romans, and others great Peeres were taken, and the whole hope of that day loſt. There fell in all on both ſides, about five thouſand. Prince Edward returning from the ſlaughter of the Londoners, would Prince Edward and liberty from the King of Romans yeeld by compoſition.

An. Dom. 1265. A.Reg. 49. The Earle of Leiceſter carries the King about till he had gotten all the chiefe ſtrengths of the Realme.

would have re-enforced the Battaile, but the Barons offered peace; which upon the next day was concluded for the preſent, ſo that Prince Edward, and Henry Son to the King of Romans, ſhould alſo render themſelves priſoners, and the two Kings, till ſuch time as all quarrels might receive an happier concluſion by calme deliberation. Thus was Simon Earle of Leiceſter in poſſeſſion of both the Kings and of their elder ſonnes; ſo fortunate may Treaſon and Rebellion bee for a time, but in the end it ſpeeds as it deſerves.

(102) By this advantage this Kingly Rebell got all the chiefe Caſtles of the Kingdome into his hand, leading his Soveraigne as his Priſoner about the Country (yet with all outward reſpect and honour) the rather to procure a more quiet ſurrender. The King of Romans he impriſoned in the Tower, Prince Edward and the Lord Henry in Dover. The Earle feeling now his owne greatneſſe, began to be leſſe tractable; neither could the Popes authority, interpoſing it ſelfe for the King, prevaile. For as the Pope by Apoſtolike cenſure before had abſolved the King and others from his Oath to the Proviſions of Oxford, ſo now hee ſent his * Cardinall Legate to excommunicate all the favorers of thoſe Acts, and impugners of the King; but theſe men * leaving the materiall ſword to truſt unto, made no reckoning of the Spirituall, pretended they appealed to the Pope, or to better times, or a generall Councell, or to God himſelfe: ſo great account made theſe croſſed ſouldiers of the Popes curſe. Notwithſtanding the loyall bloud of Roger de Mortimer, and many other high-ſpirited men of Armes, could not brooke their Kings ſo baſe uſage and dangerous eſtate, but make head in vaine. For Simon treacherouſly combines himſelfe with Lewelin Prince of Wales, and with their joynt forces takes Hereford Caſtle; thither they remove Prince Edward from Dover. The loyall band was hereby compelled to capitulate, and deliver hoſtages. O the fearefull point, to which England was brought at this preſent, but God (in whoſe protection it was) delivered it. Simon and the Earle of Glouceſter fall at debate about their dividing and ſhares in the ſpoiles, (for what ever they pretended for the Kingdome, their owne greatneſſe and gaine was the motive,) and ſomewhat alſo the unequall altitude of his ſaid partner the Earle of Leiceſter, together with the perill of his Countrey mooved him. Who thereupon confederates with Roger Mortimer, and his aſſociates, to whom not long after John Earle of Warren, Surrey, and Suſſex, and William de Valence Earle of Pembroke with others are joyned; and not long after Prince Edward by eſcape from the Caſtle of Hereford, commeth in ſafety to Wigmore. There were that laboured to attone the two Earles of Leiceſter and Glocester, but offence and indignation had taken too deepe roote. Meane while thou, O Henry, art ſhewed up and downe by the Arch-rebellious Earle of Leiceſter, to countenance thine owne deſtruction.

(103) The Prince therefore ſeeing that he muſt reſolutely ſtand for the liberty of the Realme and of his Father, friends and poſterity, raiſeth an Army, confederates himſelfe with the people and Counties of Hereford, Worceſter, Shropſhire and Cheſter. Glocester he enters by force, and drives the defendants into the Caſtle, which after yeelds. Simon Monifort with Lewelin Prince of Wales, doe in the meane time ſpoile their enemies lands in * Monmouth and Glamorganſhires, the King in perſon, not in ſpirit, being preſent. Prince Edward, and the Earle of Glocester on the other ſide, ſpeed to the Caſtle of Kenelworth, kept againſt them by Simon ſonne of the Earle of Leiceſter; there they intercept the Earle of Oxford with about thirteene Knights Banneres before they could reach the Caſtle, (whither they were haſtning, Newes came then that the Earle of Leiceſter was returned with the King in his company out of Southwales, neere to Worceſter. Thither the Prince advanceth to fight with him. The Earle hearing of his approach, encampes at Eueſham with his whole power. Vpon the third of Auguſt the noble Edward ſets out of Worceſter, and ſtrikes betweene Simon Montfort and his way to Kenelworth, and the next day turnes backe toward Eueſham; the Earle of Glocester with his force, and Roger de Mortimer (as they had agreed) with his battalion, drawing thither by two other wayes; ſo that Simon thus ſhut up and incloſed, muſt either fight or yeeld. They joyne in battell in a goodly large field before the Towne of Eueſham; where the Earles hoſt being aſſailed on all ſides, was with much ſlaughter (of the Welſh eſpecially) utterly in the end diſtreſſed and diſcomfited. At the houre of his death it thundered and lightned, and ſo great a darkneſſe ſpread the skie, that men were amazed. The Earles head, (which was ſent to Worceſter Caſtle to the Ladie Mortimer) his hands, and feet, were chopt off. In this cruell battell the King himſelfe (being wounded unawares with a Iavelin) was almoſt ſlaine. Let us now behold how this victory is uſed. The King being thus reſtored to liberty, cals a Parliament at Winchester, by authoritie whereof hee ſeiſeth into his hands the Charters and freedomes of the Citie of London, and of many other Towns for their Rebellion. Thoſe that were taken in the battell, are committed to ſafe cuſtody, and all ſuch as had beene upon the Earles ſide were diſinherited, a rateable diſtribution being made of their eſtates to the Kings well-deſerving friends. Simon and Guy de Montfort, the Earles ſonnes, were chiefe of the attainted; their mother the Counteſſe with all her goods was ſent in ſafetie out of England never to returne. Simon the eldeſt brother fought to preſerve himſelfe, and the remaines of his Fathers miſfortunes in the Ile of Axholme.

(104) The King meaning to take all refuge from him, is together with his brother the King of Romans, Ottobon the Popes Legate, (who was lately arrived) and a puiſſant armie, at Northampton, with purpoſe to oppreſſe him by warre. Simon had friends about the King, but the Earle of Glocester maligning his reſtitution to full grace, it was concluded (upon his ſubmiſſion) that he ſhould live in exile, and for his maintenance receive onely five hundreth markes by the yeere. But the Caſtle of Kenelworth would not yeeld, driving the King to an halfe yeares ſiege; who alſo in the end was content to give the garriſon pardon for life and limme, licenſing it to part with bag and baggage. In the meane while, the other outlawes, and diſinherited men, made ſundry excurſions out of the Ile of Elie. Temperate men, deſirous to pacifie all theſe evils, would gladly have had the King to pardon thoſe tranſgreſſions, and reſtore their lands upon reaſonable fines. This propoſition found a ſowre enemie of Roger Mortimer, who had by the Kings gift gotten much of their Land, which mooved the Earle of Glocester (who favoured the other courſe) to indignation and diſtruſt, ſo that he withdrew himſelfe. Not long after which, hee by his meſſengers beſought the King, to remove ſtrangers from about him, to ſee that the Statutes of Oxford were obſerved through the Kingdome, and to keepe ſuch promiſes as he had made at Eveſham: Otherwiſe the King muſt not marvell, if he did that which himſelfe thought beſt. The Legate Cardinall Ottobon, about the ſame time (to hinder the growth of any new rebellion) excommunicated the Biſhops of Winchester, Worceſter, London and Chicheſter for having adhered to Simon Montfort, and alſo declared that the Clergie were to pay their tenths, for ſeven yeares next enſuing, to the King. On the other ſide, all the undone and diſinherited men (except the ſonnes of Simon Montfort and Robert Earle of Derby) were offered to be put to ranſome, and for certaine fines to be reſtored to their Lands; but they required to have them without redemption, expoſtulating with the King and Legate many grievances. When words had no better operation, the King and Prince Edward beſiege the Ile of Elie on all ſides. This being knowne to the Earle of Glocester, who (although he had under his ſcale promiſed never to take armes againſt the King and Prince, but only in his owne defence) gathers a force

(195) Domesticke peace now beginning to shine in the English Hemisphere, Prince Edward his brother, the Lord Edmund, the Earle of Glocester, with many other Noblemen of England, with intent of a more honourable warfare, take the Crosse upon them at Northampton, by the delivery of Ostoben, who not long after returned into Italie. Then was the kings peace proclaimed through England, all men being upon paine of death commanded to forbeare to make spoyles, or take booties violently, as they of late had been accustomed. The Prince, seeing the Realme thus acquitted, doth the more willingly (having his Fathers consent) yeeld to goe with Lewis King of France, into the Holy-land, who, toward his furniture in that voyage, lends him thirty thousand markes: for assurance whereof, the Prince morgageth Aquitaine unto him. But what true setled peace may we judge it, when John de Warren Earle of Surrey, the kings halfe-brother, (upon the increase of words betweene them) durst kill Alan le Zouch the chiefe Iustice, with his owne hand in Westminster Hall? A plaine and fearefull example of favourites potency. That all things yet might not run out of square, the King held a Parliament at Marlborough, where the Statutes called of Marlborough were enacted. The old king and his Queene henceforward enjoyed the blessing of a quiet estate at home, with the more leisure to pray therein for their Sons faire successe in Palestine, whose vertues had there raised an admiration of him among the Infidels. That quiet nevertheless was a little interrupted by an incendiary outrage at Norwich, where the Citizens set on fire the Priorie Church. The king being kindled with another kinde of fire, sware hee would in person see a revenge taken; and dispatching first away Sir Thomas Trivet, (before whom a great multitude were found guilty, and condemned to be drawne and hanged) himselfe, having in his company one Bishop and the Earle of Glocester, followed; where beholding the deformed ruines, he could hardly refraine from teares. The Bishop having therefore excommunicated the nocent, and the King condemned the Towne in three thousand markes, toward the re-edification of that Church, as also to pay one hundreth pounds for a Cup weighing ten pounds in gold, he purposed to returne toward London. This publike act of zeale to religion and Iustice, was the last which he did, as a King; for now he was come to that, which hee was to enter into as a mortall man: At the Abbey of S. Edmund in Suffolke, he fell grievously sicke, where while he lay, * he caused the Earle of Glouceſter to be sworne to keepe the Realme for his Sonne; the Prelates, Earles, and Barons of the Land, being assembled to be present at his departure. Therefore after he had in Christian manner prepared his soule, by acknowleding his sinnes, and receiving it spirituall consolations, he rendred up the same to his Redeemer. His Will was short, for his Creditors and the Poore shared all his goods. The space of time which he raigned, is almost an old mans age, and absolutely the longest number of yeares, that ever any King of England raigned, not excepting Ethelbert the first Christian King, if (which is * written by some) he raigned fifty six yeares, and as many dayes more, as are between the feast of Simon & Iude, and * Saint Edmund the Archbishop, which are about twenty. A Prince whose * devotion was greater then his discretion, as wee see in his permitting the depredation of himselfe and his whole kingdome by Papall over-swayings, the errour of whose Government, concurring with the tumultuous treasons of his Nobles, did precipitate him into many mischiefes, out of which yet God almighty did strangely deliver him; for if he had not beene divinely protected, there is no cause for a reasonable man to doubt, but that his end had proved as headlong, as some of his owne, and his Barons actions seemed to threaten. The royall remaines of this happily-dying Prince were with all the due pompe of exequies interred in Westminster, the great and sumptuous new worke whereof he began, but finished not; the description of whose life, being full of diverticles and abrupt passages, as a maze or labyrinth, here at last hath found a place of rest for it selfe and us.

His Wife.

(196) Eleanor the wife of King Henry, was the second of the five daughters of Raymond Earle of Province, sonne of Earle Alfonse, sonne of Alfonse the first King of Arragon; her mother was Beatrice, daughter of Thomas Earle of Savoy, sister of the Earles Amee, and Peter, and the Archbishop Boniface of Canterbury. She was married to him at Canterbury, Ianu.24. An. 1236. *Reg.*20. Crowned at Westminster the 19. of the same moneth: was his wife 37 yeare, his widow 19. died a Nun at Almesbery, the 25. of Iune, in the 20. yeare of her sonnes raigne 1291, and was buried in her Monastery, the 11. of September following.

His Issue.

Edward their eldest son was borne at Westminster, the 28. day of Iune, the 24. yeare of his Fathers Raign 1239. he was surnamed Longshancke, of his tall and slender body, made knight in Spaine by Alfonse King of Castile, created Earle of Chester by his Father, after the issue male extinct of the former Earles, and succeeded his Father in the kingdome of England.

(197) Edmund their second sonne, borne Ian. 26. A.1245. and of his Fathers raigne, 29. was surnamed Crouched-backe, of bowing in his backe, say some, but more likely of wearing the signe of the Crosse, (anciently called a Crouch*) upon his backe, which was usually worne of such as vowed voyages to Ierusalem, as he had done. He was invested titular King of Sicilia and Apulia, and created Earle of Lancaster, (on whose person originally the great contention of Lancaster and Yorke was founded) and having of the grant of his Father, the lands of Simon Montfort and Robert Ferrers, (disinherited in the Barons warres) was by vertue of the same grant Earle of Leicester and Derby, and high Steward of England. Hee had two wives, the first was Avelin, daughter and heire of William Earle of Albemarle, by whom he left no issue, the second was Queene Blanch, daughter of Robert Earle of Artoys, (brother of Saint Lewis King of France) widow of Henry of Champaigne, King of Navarre, and mother of Ioane Queene of France and Navarre, the wife of Philip the faire. By her he had issue three sons and one daughter. Thomas, who after his Father was Earle of Lancaster, and having married Alice, daughter and heire of Henry Lacie Earle of Lincolne, was beheaded at Pomfret without issue: Henry Lord of Monmouth, who after his brothers death was Earle of Lancaster, and Father of Henry the first Duke of Lancaster: John, who died without marriage: and Marie, married to Henry Lord Percie, Mother of Henry, the first Earle of Northumberland. This Earle Edmund died at Bayon in Gascoigne, Iune 5. An. 1296. and of King Edward his brothers raigne 24. when hee had lived fiftie yeares, foure moneths and nineteene daies; whose body halfe a yeare after his death, was convaied into England, and lieth entombed at

(199) John, the fourth sonne of King Henry and Queene Eleanor, (bearing the name of King John his Grand-father,) deceased yong, and at Westminster his bones lye enterred with his brother Richard.

(200) William, the fift sonne of King Henry and Queene Eleanor, is mentioned by Thomas Pickering, (a Priest of the monastery of Whitby in Yorkeshire, who lived in the time of King Henry the fixt, and wrote a large Genealogy of the Kings of England, and their issues,) and that hee dying in his child-hood, was buried within the New-Temple, by Fleete-street in London.

(201) Henry, the sixt sonne of King Henry and Queene Eleanor, is also reported by the same Pickering, to have dyed young, and to be buried at Westminster.

(202) Margaret, the eldest daughter of King Henry and Queene Eleanor, borne the twenty sixt yeere of her Fathers raigne, 1241. was the first wife of Alexander the third, King of Scotland, married to him at Yorke, Ann. 1251. by whom she had issue, Alexander and David, (who dyed both before their Father without issue,) and Margaret Queene of Norway, wife of King Erike, and mother of Margaret the heire of Scotland, and Norway, that dyed unmarried: she was Queene twenty two yeeres, lived thirty three, deceased before her Husband, in the twenty third yeere of his Raigne, the first of her brother Edwards in England, and was buried at the Abbey of Dunfermling in Scotland.

(113) Beatrice, the second daughter of King Henry and Queene Eleanor, was borne at Burdeaux in Gascoigne, Iune 25. An. Dom. 1242. of her Fathers raigne 27. At theage of eighteene yeeres, she was marryed to John the first Duke of Britaine, (sonne of John the last Earle of the same,) and had issue by him, Arthur Duke of Britanny, John Earle of Richmont, Peter, and Blanch married to Philip, Son of Robert Earle of Artoys; Eleanor, a Nunne at Almsbery, and Mary married to Guy Earle of Saint Paul: when she had beene his Wife twelve yeeres, and lived thirty yeeres, she deceased in Britanny, in the first yeere of the Raigne of her brother King Edward, and was buried at London, in the Quire of the Grey-Fryars within Newgate.

(114) Katherine, the third daughter of King Henry and Queene Eleanor, was borne at London, *An.*1252. of her fathers raigne 37. *Novem.*25. being Saint Katherines day, whose name was therefore given unto her, at the font, by Boniface Archbishop of Canterbury, her mothers Vncle, who christned her, and was her God-father. She dyed young, and at Westminster her bones lye enterred, with her brother Richard and Iohn, in the space betweene the Chappels of King Edward, and Saint Bennet.

EDWARD

Edward I.

EDVVARD THE FIRST, LORD OF IRELAND, AND DVKE OF AQVITAINE, &c. THE FORTIE-SEVENTH MONARCH OF ENGLAND, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND ISSVE.

Monarch 47.

CHAPTER X.

An. Dom. 1273.

EDVVARD, who followed King Henry in wearing the English Crowne, but farre out-went him in all regall vertues, was abroad at the time of his fathers death, ſtill purſuing his high deſires for the Holy Wars: wherein what he performed, (being yet but a Prince) againſt the publique enemies of Chriſtians, it ſhall not be impertinent to touch, before we come to his actions as a King; having already remembred, with what valour and felicitie he had ſubdued his Fathers domeſticke enemies, ſetled the peace of his kingdome, and re-eſtabliſhed the raignes of Soveraignty in his Fathers hands, which thoſe potent Rebels had formerly extorted.

(2) King Lewis of France, whoſe perſwaſions had enflamed this noble-ſpirited Prince to aſſociate him in this glorious quarrell, having firſt ſet forth for the enterpriſe, lay now in ſiege of Tunis in Africa, where Prince Edward with all his forces arriving, the French King (greatly rejoycing in his wiſhed preſence,) together with the King of Navarre, and other Princes of his Army, went forth to meet him, and received him in the kiſſe of Peace. This place which they beleaguered, was (as then) not great, yet by reaſon of the ſituation, it * greatly impeached the Chriſtians in their paſſages through thoſe Seas; being built out of the ſcattered ribs, and waſted ruines of that mighty and famous City Carthage, rivall once in Majeſtie and Ambition with ancient Rome, as contending with her about the Empire of the World. Therefore to ſecure the Mediterranean Seas, it was thought neceſſarie to beginne that enterpriſe for Aſia, with this in Africa; but not long after Lewis yeelding up his holy Soule to GOD at the ſiege, and ſickneſſe (by reaſon of the heats in thoſe Regions, for it was Auguſt) raigning in in the Chriſtian Campe, Charles King of Sicille, whom Lewis (before his deceaſe) had ſent for, to take charge of the whole enterpriſe, arrives; and after ſharpe re-enforcement of the ſiege, (where Edward gave frequent proofe of his great valour and prudence,) Charles is content to forbeare extremity, (to which the Sarazens were brought) upon capitulations with them, contrary to Edwards minde, being wholly ſet to ſubdue, convert or roote them out.

Prince Edward unwilling to any peace with the Sarazens.

Paul. Æmil.

(3) Yet the points of the treaty and truce (though granted for many yeeres) carried ſhew of honour, being theſe: 1. That all Chriſtian Captives ſhould be ſet free without ranſome: 2. That in the Cities of that Kingdome, the Chriſtian faith might freely bee taught: 3. That all ſuch as were willing, might freely receive ſacred Baptiſme: 4. That the Sarazens ſhould repay to the Chriſtian Kings, their charges: 5. That the King of Tunis ſhould remaine tributary to the King of Sicilie. The ſiege hereupon was raiſed, to the griefe and indignation of Edward, who would not (as is reported) partake nor ſhare in any of the Treaſure, which by reaſon of the truce was payed by the Sarazens, as accounting it to bee wickedly gotten, and contrary to the Tenour of the vow, which for the honour and advancement of Chriſtian Religion had beene made. The event alſo ſeeming to confirme no leſſe; for the wrath of Heaven (ſaith our * Author) purſued King Charles, brother to the late King Lewis, and finding him out upon the Sea in his returne toward Sicilie, tooke ſeverer revenge by terrible weather, as well upon him, as almoſt his whole Army, which periſhed in the waters, together with the impious treaſure brought from Tunis, and all other his furniture of State and Houſhold. Which when Prince Edward underſtood, hee ſware, By the Bloud of our Lord, that though all his Companions in Armes and Country-men ſhould abandon him, yet hee and Fowin his * Lackey alone would enter into * Ptolomais, and keepe the vow which hee had made, whiles ſoule and body held together. A noble reſolution, and as faithfully performed; but not with ſo ſmall attendance; for the Engliſh hearing his fervent aſſeveration, promiſed with one heart to accompany him, and that (in all likely-hood) the more willingly, becauſe it is not obſerved, that the tempeſt had any way damnified Edward, or his fellowſhip. Hee forthwith therefore ſets ſaile toward Acon, into which he entred ſafe not above foure dayes before the City ſhould have beene yeelded to the Sarazens, from which precipitation theſe ſuccours out of England withheld it. The Sultan of Babylon, who lay about Acon with a puiſſant hoaſt, and had begun to aſſault the breaches, hearing this, not long after raiſed his ſiege, and without the fruition of his deſire withdrew to his owne Dominions.

(4) Edward undoubtedly was not more tall of perſonage, then ſtout of courage, and upon truſt thereof, doing ſome things, which perhaps a Prince of his hopes, and fortunes, might with good reaſon have forborne. His undaunted courage againſt thoſe Infidels may be geſſed by the like againſt a domeſtick Rebell. Among thoſe who were out-lawed for Rebellion and Treaſon, after the Battell of Eveſham for partaking with Simon Earle of Leiceſter, was one Sir Adam Gurdon a Knight of the parts about Winchester, who with certaine his Complices kept out of the way of the Kings officers, but made the Kings high-way betweene Wilton and Fernham, (which by reaſon of woods and windings was fit to ſhelter enemies) very dangerous for ſuch as meant to paſſe, but doing moſt miſchiefe to the lands and goods of ſuch as were the Kings friends. Edward hearing of this mans ſingular courage, gets intelligence of a fit time, and comes upon him with a ſtrong band of followers, but hee, nothing terrified, prepares himſelfe to fight for his life to the laſt gaſpe. The Prince hereupon commands that none of his men ſhould dare to interrupt their combate, and forthwith with equall courage exchanged mighty blowes without winning ground each of other. Edward delighted with the bravery of Adams ſpirit, and proofe of his manhood, had him yeeld, promiſing him life, and his Lands againe; who preſently throwing away his weapons, enjoyed the full benefit of Prince Edwards promiſe. The happineſſe of that age, wherein Sword and Shield were the ordinary weapons, and afforded much aſſurance in fight, might ſomewhat excuſe the Prince from the note of temerity, which otherwiſe, in hazarding his Princely perſon againſt a private Gentleman, hee could hardly have eſcaped. But here at Acon hee refuſed no occaſion of putting forth the naturall ſtrengthes of his firme-compacted body, till by the Sultans retreat the moſt honourable opportunities were ſubtracted.

Edwards voluntary ſingle fight with Sir Adam Gurdon.

* Paul. Æmil. in Lud. 9.

(5) All this while did that renowned and vertuous Lady, Eleanor Wife of Prince Edward, endure with him an inſeparable companion of all his fortunes, and was at Acon delivered of a Daughter, baptized there by the name of Joan. But if God had not better provided for him, ſhee was not likely to have enjoyed any longer the deare company of her loving Lord and Husband. Amongſt that bloudy Sect of Sarazens, called Aſſaſſini, who, without feare of torments, undertake (upon command of their * Superior) the murther of any eminent Prince, impugning their irreligion, was one Anzacim, often uſed by the Sarazen Admirall of Ioppe, as a Meſſenger betweene him and Edward, whom the Admirall pretended exceedingly to honour for his heroicke parts of minde and body. The deſperate wretch by this employment getting credit and acceſſe, upon his inſinuation of certaine ſecrets to bee imparted, Prince Edward commanded all men to voyde the Chamber, when looking out of a window, the Aſſaſſine, ſodainly with a poyſoned Kniſe gives him three wounds, two in the arme, and one neere the arme pit; whom Edward preſently with his foot threw to the Earth, wrong the Kniſe from the Traytour, (not without wounding himſelfe in the hand,) and with the treſſell of a Table ſmote out his braines. Then calling in his people, hee commands that the body of the Villaine ſhould be hanged up over the Cities Wall, and a live Dogge with him. The Admirall hearing of this Trayterous attempt, is * ſaid to have ſighed for ſorrow, for that hee never know thereof, but meant himſelfe to have become a Chriſtian. But when the Chriſtians underſtood of this curſed aſſault upon the perſon of ſo renowned a Prince, they meant in revenge thereof, to have forthwith invaded the Pagans whereſoever. But the Prince (whoſe firſt care was the ſafety of Chriſtians) ſaid, I forbid you on the behalfe of God, that none of you yet preſume to infeſt the Pagans Army, becauſe many of our people are gone to viſit the holy Sepulchre, who ſhall every one of them bee murthered by the Sarazens, if they ſhall now ſuſtaine any (though but ſmall) vexation at our hands. The ſecond care was of the wounds, which by reaſon of the envenomed blade were feared to be mortall; wherein the Lady Elenor gave ſo rare example of conjugall affection, as her immortall memory doth juſtly impart glory to that whole Sex. For when no medicine could extract the poyſon, ſhe did it with her Tongue, licking daily, while her Husband ſlept, his ranckling wounds, whereby they perfectly cloſed, and yet her ſelfe received no harme; ſo ſoveraigne a medicine is a Wives Tongue, annointed with the vertue of lovely affection.

(6) Thus while Edward abode in forraine parts for the generall ſervice of Chriſtianity, againſt the encreaſing Enemies thereof, (contending then to that lamentable Greatneſſe, wherein our unhappy times behold them;) his Father King Henry dyes, and Prince Edward had the deſeaſt of his preſence ſupplyed by the faith and care of ſuch venerable and noble perſons, as his Father left behinde him at his death. Therefore Robert Kilwarby Archbiſhop of Canterbury; Gilbert Earle of Glocester, with other the chiefe chiefe Prelates and Peeres of the Land, assembling together at the New-Temple in London, acknowledged and proclaimed absent Edward for their Soveraigne Liege Lord; and by the assent of his Mother, the Queene Dowager, provided for the common affaires of the King, and the good estate of the Kingdome. The first newes of his Fathers death were brought unto him, when after his returne from the Holy-Land (which service he was * enforced to forsake, having long in vaine expected the promised aydes of Christians, and Tartars,) hee rested himselfe in Sicilia, with Charles the King thereof; where to the immortall commendation of his piety, and filiall affection (rare in Princes) it is recorded, that the death of his Sonne and Heire, comming first to his eare, and afterward of the King his Father, hee much more sorrowed his Fathers departure, then his Soanes: whereat King Charles greatly marvailed, and demanding the reason, had of him this answer; "The losse of Sonnes is but light, because they "are multiplyed every day: but the death of Parents is "irremediable, because they can never bee had a-"gaine.

* Paul. Æmil. in Lud. 9.

(7) Now, whether it were the terrour of such revenge as followed the captivation of his valiant Predecessor King Richard, or his owne wiser carriage, or the calmer condition of the times, or all of them together, which secured him in his returne: certaine it is, that hee travelled in great safety and honour over-Land from Sicilia to Rome, where he was met upon the way with all the Cardinals, gratulating the honourable successe of his Chevalry against the Turkes, his safe returne, and new Kingdome. At his instance, Pope Gregory * excommunicated the bloudy-handed Guy Monfort (because * his person could not easily be gotten, by reason of his Greatnesse, and power) with all his receivers, and (untill amends were made) put their whole Dominions under interdict, for that the said Guy, (sonne to Simon, late Earle of Leicester, slaine at the battle of Evesham) in revenge of his Fathers death (* for which he mortally hated all King Henries race,) had most butcherly murthered * Henry of Almaine, King Edwards neere Kinsman, upon his returne toward England, in the raigne of the late King Henry, as hee was devoutly serving God in the Church at Viterbo in Italy: which horrible act induced a * Iudicious Author to suspect, that Guy also had a hand in that Assassination on Edward, who had slaine his Father. This Guy being afterward taken by the Admirall of Arragon, to gratifie King Edward, was kept in prison, and the death of Henry revenged * with his. From Rome hee journyed through the Cities of Italy, where he was generally entertained with exceeding joy and honour; and as hee was * entring into Savoy, at the stoope, or descent of the Alpes, very many of the Princlates, and Peeres of England met him, acknowledging their gladnesse for his safety, and their duties to his Soveraignty. In his passage, hee gave notable proofe of his great prowesse and strength at a Turnament (or rather * battell) against * the Earle of Chabloun, and his Burgundians: for the said Count being a gallant man at Armes, after many blowes with the Sword betweene King Edward and him, throwing away his weapon, grasped the King about the Gorget, and hung upon him with the weight of his masse body, in hope to cast him to the Earth; but the King, sitting upright, without any bending, put Spurres to his lusty Horse, and lifted the Count so hanging about his necke, quite from his Saddle, carrying him away, till hee had forceably shooke him off to the ground, who recovering himselfe, and comming to redeeme his disgrace, had such entertainement, as hee was contented to yeeld. In our effeminate and degenerous age, to omit such an atchievement of a King of England in his owne person, had beene haynous and piaculum. Thus his renowne encreasing with his progresse, hee had magnificent e nterrainement in France, of Philip the King, to whom (upon condition to have such territories restored, as were promised to his Father King Henry, when hee sold Normandy to the French) hee did homage for such Signiories, as he held of the Crowne of France.

* Tho. Walsing. Edward I. Themaxvailous strength of Bordyn King Edwards.

(8) And as well to shew his owne moderation and princely temperance, (a vertue which makes every man a King in himselfe, and Kings like to Gods) as also his reverence to the Crowne of France, whose homager hee was for his transmarine Dominions, Guasco de Biern, a valiant man of Armes, being in actuall rebellion against King Edward in his Dutchy of Gascoigne, was admitted to appeale for tryall of his pretended causes to the French King, as the supetior Lord. Many of King Edwards friends and Counsellors were utterly adverse to this favour; as well because the said Guasco had drawne the King to no small charge, and labor, as also for that now he was brought by strait siege to such extremities, as that he could no longer hold out, and himselfe, having all that while put his confidence in wals of stone, and the weapons poine; there was also little reason to allow him an ordinary civill tryall of his pretexts for taking armes; and many perhaps, both thought the example prejudicious to King Edward and his Successors, by giving way to such appeales, and distrusted the justice of the French Court: contrary to all which, the King decreed, and it was fortunate with him; for Guasco (not long after) was condemned in France, and sent with * an Halter about his necke, to prostrate himselfe to justice, or mercy, at King Edwards feete in England, who pardoned him the forfeiture of life, and (when hee had for certaine yeeres kept him prisoner at Winchester) set him at liberty, and sent him backe to his owne, who remained for ever after gratefully firme and loyall.

(9) King Edward (his transmarine affaires thus being setled) arrived in England, where he was after so long desirings most joyfully welcome, and there, in the Church of Westminster (the magnificent new worke of his deceased Father, who had with great cost, and after above fifty yeeres spent therein, almost finished the same) he and his deareft Eleanor were annoynted, and crowned by * Robert Kilwarby Archbishop of Canterbury. There were present at this solemnity Queene Elenor the Kings mother, * Alexander King of Scots, the Duke of Britaine, with multitudes of Peeres and others: where (as * one faith) for the more royall celebration of this great feast, and honor of so martiall a King, there were five hundreth great Horses let loose, every one to take them for his owne, who could.

(10) The finall abolishment of succession of the Welsh bloud in the principality, or chiefedome of Wales now ensued: but yet (as great matters use) not first without some time, and certaine degrees. The originall was this; King Edward having sent for Lewelin Prince of Wales to his Coronation, there to doe him homage; he, excusing the same, was againe (for that cause) admonished to repaire to the Kings Parliament at Westminster: whither likewise he forbare to come, pretending it was danger to his person, but * directing his excuse to the Archbishops of Canterbury, and Yorke, and their Suffragans, professed his readinesse, if it would please the King, either to send a Commission for taking his oath, and fealty, (who bare him a deepe displeasure, ever * since Lewelin had put him, being then but Earle of Chester, to the worse) *or else, to appoint some indifferent place, or give to him for hostiages the * Kings sonne, and Robert Earle of Glocester, with Robert Burnell the Kings Chancellour*. But King Edward dissembling the arrogancy of the demand for the present, went forward in his Parliament, where the first Statutes, called of Westminster, and among them the Statute of Mortmain were enacted. But after the Parliament, the King repaired to his city of Chester, being very neere to Wales, and Lewelin fore-flowed his comming thither also; whereafore the King, resolving (for denial of of Homage) to seize upon the whole Fee of the said Prince, marcht with an Army into Wales; his good fortune there was accidentally augmented by a Prize, which foure ships of Brissol tooke about the Isles of Sillie, wherein the daughter of Simon Mountfort late Earle of Leicester, (who, according to a secret contract betweene their friends, went to be given in marriage to Lewelin) and Aimericke her brother, were surprised, but she found honourable usage of the King her neere kinsman.

(11) Meane-while, Lewelines affaires, by the manhood and diligence of *Pain de * Camoisis*, and others, who had taken West-Wales in, and brought it to the Kings peace, thriving but poorely, and the said Prince feeling the foundations of his safetie beginning manifestly to fayle, and shrinke from under him, * fued for peace, and had it upon such termes, which in likely-hood were not (as * Polidor Virgil would have it seeme) granted by King Edward, lest he should leese his cost, and care, by warring against bogs and mountaines. In the conditions of Peace (which was procured * with great difficulty) the most remarkeable (as carrying the shew of a farre greater riches in the possession of the Welsh, even at that time, then some prejudicated can easily beleeve) * were these. 1. That the Prince should pay to the King for his peace and good-will, fifty thousand pounds sterling, the * payment whereof should be in the Kings will and grace; that is (as we conceive it) how much thereof the Prince should pay or not pay, and when. 2. That the said Prince should have the Isle of Anglesey in Fee-farme of the King, to him, and to the lawfull issue of his body in generall taile, for five thousand Markes ready money, for * gressom, or a fine in hand paid, and the yeerely rent of a thousand Markes. The reft of the Articles (being about eight,) amounted to so much as a plain Conquest, or diffolution of the Principality of Wales, after Lewelins death, who was to enjoy the same, during his time upon conditions.

(12) Now whereas the said Lewelin had three Brethren, David (whom King Edward favoured) Owen, and Rodericke, it was enjoyned to him at this conclusion, (made by the Lord Robert Tiptoft, and certaine other * Commissioners, upon either side appointed) that hee should appease and satisfie his said Brethren: but because David was afterward a principall Actor in the calamities which fell upon himselfe, his house, and his Country, wee must not neglect to speake somewhat particularly of him. This Gentleman for some causes, * flying into England from his Brother Lewelin, for his faithfull service to the State of England, was there honoured (contrary to the manner of his Nation) with the order of Knight-hood, and received also, by the bountie of King Edward, for his maintenance, the Castle of Denbigh, with lands to the yeerely value of one thousand pounds, and the Daughter of the Earle of Derby (being then a Widow) to wife: *with all which bountie, the King did but entertaine a revealer of his secrets, as * some* (not improbably) doe affirme. The State of Wales thus composed, and the Castle of * Aberistwith (which seemes to be the same, that by * another is said to have beene built in West-Wales at Lanpader Vaur) being built by King Edward for assuring those parts, the King (as hee was munificent, and royall) the more to rye Lewelins faith, gave unto him the Lady, of whose surprise at Sea we have mentioned, to be his consort, honouring the Nuptials with his owne presence, and his Queenes. And whereas Alexander King of Scots came about the same season into England to treat with Edward concerning important affaires, and had formerly sent to the Welsh wats, certaine aides of the Scots, the said Alexander, being jealous (on his countries behalfe) that those aides might be interpreted to have beene sent upon duties, obtained Letters testimoniall from King Edward, declaring that they were not sent of duties, or in respect of service due.

(13) Though King Edward were thus desirous to gaine the Welsh Nation rather by his largesse, then puissance, having so honourably used Lewelin, hee could not yet retaine their hearts; for whether it were (which * some, to amove the note of ingratitude, and turbulency from them, affirme,) for that there was partiality used by the English officers in distribution of justice upon the Marches, or (which seems to some as likely) *for that they aspired in vaine to their ancient libertie (being miserably seduced with certaine * blind prophesies)* the Welsh betooke themselves afresh to Armes: for David himselfe, whom the King had laden with so many benefits and graces, became to them a principall leader, and to give them full assurance of his faithfulnesse to their cause (reconciling himselfe to his brother the Prince) he sodainely and treacherously upon Palme-Sunday seised the Castle of * Hawardin, surprising Roger de Clifford, a noble and famous Knight, whom the King had dispatched into those parts, as Iusticiar of all Wales, and slaying such unarmed men as offered to resist that violence: whence marching, he laide siege, together with the Prince his Brother, to the Castle of * Rodolan, doing many outrages, and killing all such as they could reach, yea some (as it is said) whose ransomes * they had taken, though against Lewelins mind. And while King Edward spent his Easter at the Vises in Wiltshire, and afterward visited the Queene his Mother, who lived in the Nunnery at Almesberie, the Welsh, under divers Captaines, had taken sundry of the Kings * strengths and Castles in divers parts. There are extant the * Copies of certaine grievances, exhibited to John Archbishop of Canterbury by the Welsh, at such time as of his owne accord (so say the said Copies) hee interposed himselfe (without the Kings leave) to settle their quiet; which Articles in shew, (for the answers of the English are not set downe) containe indeed sundry great abuses; but the sate of Wales had now involved them all in a desolating warre, and made them uncapable of reliefe. For after the Arch-Bishop had traveled in person to the Prince of Wales, being then in * Snowdon, and returned, without any Conclusion made, * comming unto Oxford, hee there sent out the lightnings of * excommunication against him and his followed adherents: We say seduced, because they did capitulate in such fort, as if they had beene able to make their party good.

(14) But though the old British Principalitie was now to expire, yet it must be confessed, that as Lewelin had an end unworthy of his bloud, being rather unfortunately slaine, then otherwise; so on the other side the same hapned not without revenge: for at one encounter in open field, Gilbert Earle of Glocester lost William Valence, (a younger Cosen of the Kings) slaine in the fight, and foure other Knights, though at the same time also, many of the Welsh left their bodies dead upon the earth, together with the victory to the English: but the day certainly which they had of King Edward himselfe, may not be forgotten, in which the Welsh slew the * Lord William de Audeley, and the Lord Roger Clifford the younger, and got foureteene Ensignes from the English Army, King Edward being enforced to enter into the Castle of Hope for his safetie. These things, though not contemptible, but rather, certaine deceitfull favours, usuall when the ruine of a Nation is by God decreed, could not uphold the cause. For first the Prince, having upon some occasion withdrawne himselfe with some few others from his Army, which then was in the Land of Buelth, was set upon by two principall Gentlemen, John Giffard, and Edmund de Mortimar, with their Forces, and there by the hand of one * Adam Francton was runne through with an Horsemans staffe, who at the first being unknowne, had his head strucken afterward off, and presented to King Edward, at whose commandement it was * crowned with Ivie, and setup for a certaine time upon the Tower of London.

* Tho. Walsingh.

(15) This (saith the * History of Wales) was the end end of Lewelin, betrayed by the men of Buelth, who was the laſt Prince of Britaines blood: and with him (* whom one Verſifier calleth the Captaine, the praiſe, the law, and light of Nations, and another defaceth with as many ignominious attributes) the liberty of that people did alſo dye. For it was not long but that King Edward ſubdued in a manner all Wales, and referring to himſelfe the Coaſt-Townes and ſtrengths toward the Sea, diſtributed the In-Land Countries to the Lords his followers: therein prudently following the counſell of Auguſtus, who thus under pretence of defence for the Provinces, had the bridling of all their forces at his pleaſure. Nevertheleſſe the whole flame was not as yet extinguiſhed, for David the Princes Brother, and * chiefeſt fire-brand in this fatall combuſtion, was at large: who being taken and brought to King Edward at the Caſtle of Ruthlan, could not obtaine admiſſion to his ſight or ſpeech, but was amanded, and ſent Priſoner to Shrewsbury. Thither the King, having ſettled the State of Wales, repayring to a Parliament which he had ſummoned, there to be kept after Michaelmas, cauſed David, having firſt had a Legall triall * before certain Iuſticiars for that cauſe appointed) to be severely put to death, by * hanging, heading, and quartering, whoſe head was ſet up at London, and his quarters in foure other principall Cities of England, to the terrour of all ingratefull and diſloyall perſons. The Welſh Line thus thruſt from the Principalitie, King Edward upon Saint Markes day had a Sonne borne unto him in Wales at Caernarvan, who alſo was called Edward, and raigned after him; and that with the birth of a new Lord, the Welſh might be inured to new Lawes, the King eſtabliſhed (by example of King John his Grand-father in Ireland) the Engliſh Lawes and Offices among them.

(16) But the King, that he might not ſeeme forgetfull of his French affaires, repaired into France, where hee obtained ſundry favours, though they continued not long; and fate in perſon there with the French King in his Parliament at the Citie of Paris, as a Lord or Peere of that Realme, in reſpect of ſuch Lands as he had in thoſe parts. Nor may here be forgotten an Act of ſingular munificence, and charitie in this renowned King, for the redemption of Charles Prince of Achaia, ſonne and Heire of Charles King of Sicilia, who had ſome yeeres before beene taken in a barrell at Sea before Naples; by the Gallies of Sicilia, fighting on the behalfe of the King of Arragon: for whoſe ſpeedier enlargement, King Edward diſburſed thirtie thouſand pounds Sterling, and gave his owne Knights in hoſtage, till Charles had ſent in his two Sonnes, Robert and Lewis, as pledges to Alfonſe King of Arragon: which done, King Edward returned into Gaſcoigne, and there tooke upon him the Croſſe, in full purpoſe to finiſh the journey which once he had undertaken, and had in part performed againſt the Saracens.

(17) In the meane time, to purge England (whither hee was now returned) from ſuch corruptions, and oppreſſions, as under which it groaned, and not neglecting therein his particular gaine, he baniſhed the Iews out of the realm, confiſcating all their goods, leaving them nothing but money to beare their charges. And whereas they by their cruell uſuries had one way eaten his people to the bones, and his Iuſticiars (like another kind of Iewes) had ruined them with delayes in their ſuites, and enriched themſelves with wicked corruptions, he (like a father of his Country) put all thoſe from their offices who were found guiltie (and they were * almoſt all) and puniſhed them otherwiſe in a grievous manner, being firſt in open Parliament convicted. The particulars whereof, by reaſon of the moſt juſt and commendable example, we will not thinke needleſſe (the order of naming them only changed) to recapitulate here. *Sir Ralph Hengham, Chiefe Iuſtice of the higher Bench, 7000. markes. At which time the King conſtrayned all his Iuſtices to ſweare, that from thenceforth they would take no penſion, fee, or gift of any man, except onely a breakfaſt, or the like preſent. O divine and ſtill neceſſary ſeverity, onely able to breake the pernicious combination of men, that under the profeſſion of Law and offices of Iuſtice, make merchandize of honour, juſtice, Law, and conſcience, which cannot in the end but bring forth ruine and confuſion.

(18) That tempeſt now, which * Thomas Erſilton, a Scottiſh Rimer, is ſaid to have obſcurely propheciſed, alluding to the troubles of Scotland, by reaſon of King Alexanders death, hapned about theſe times; which raiſed ſo great, and bloody contentions, that it had almoſt blowne up the regality of that Kingdome by the very roots. For when, by the violent fall from his horſe, King Alexander had moſt unfortunately loſt his life, that Realm was wofully deſtitute of any apparent heire, ſundry perſons ſtanding in competition for the ſame. Theſe things were thought to be fore-ſhewed from heaven by many * fearfull preſages, as extraordinary Mereors, Flouds, Fires, and Peſtilence. But King Edward intending to ſway that affaire, and being upon his way toward the borders, the death of his royall conſort and Queene, which he lamented while himſelfe did live, called him backe to the celebration of her funerals, as her excellent vertues did well deſerve: To our Nation ſhee was a loving mother, and (ſaith * one) the Columne, and pillar (as it were) of the whole Realme. In her honour the K. her husband (who loved her above all worldly creatures) cauſed thoſe many ſimous * trophеis, or croſſes to bee erected, whereſoever her noble Coarſe did reſt; as it was conveyed from Lincolneſhire to buriall in Weſtminſter. Nor could any thing, but the reſpect to other weighтie matters, now preſently in hand, with-hold our pen from paying to her memory a farre more copious commendation.

(19) Thoſe mourning offices as mournfully performed, the King repaires into Northumberland, whither the greateſt, and ſageſt perſons of the Scottiſh nation being come, * themſelves having ſought to him, Edward makes claime to the ſuperiority of Scotland, and requires that the Competitors would quietly aſſent to his award, alleadging that the Crowne of that Realme was held of him: for more credit to which aſſerion he vouched ſundry * books, and acts, whereunto the Scots replied, * That they were ignorant, that any ſuch ſuperioritie belonged to the King of England: neyther could they make anſwere to ſuch things without a King, the head, upon whom it lay to beare ſuch a denunciation, and proteſted, that other anſwere they ought not as then to give, in regard of their Oath, which after the death of Alexander their King, they had made one to the other, and the ſame to keepe under paine of excommunication. Whereupon the King delivered to them his Letters Patents, in which he acknowledged, that the comming of thoſe Scots, on this ſide the Water of Twede, ſhould not be at any other time urged to prejudice them, for comming againe into England: that is, That their example ſhould not ſo bee drawne to an argument of King Edwards right over them; as if they were to come againe upon duty; ſo prudently jealous were thoſe Patriots of their Countries libertie.

(20) The

(20) The names of the Competitors were theſe, according to Walſingham: Ericke, King of Norway, who appeared by his Attorneys; Florence, Earle of Holland; Robert le Brus, Lord of Annandale; John de Baliol, Lord of Galoway; John de Haſtings, Lord of Abergevenny; John Comin, Lord of Badenaw; Patrick de Dunbar, Earle of March; John de Veſci, on his Fathers behalfe; Nicholas de Sules; William de Roſſe. Theſe all peaceably ſubmitted themſelves, for ſo much as concerned their ſeverall Titles to the Scottiſh Crowne, to the finall award and arbitration of King Edward, paſſing thereof an authentick inſtrument unto him; who having given caution to reſtore the Realme of Scotland, (within a certaine prefixed time,) to that partie to whom the Crowne thereof ſhould be adjudged, had ſeiſin delivered to him, the better to put the ſentence in execution, or (ſay the Writers of that nation) they giving him power to conſtraine the parties to ſtand to this ſentence. The whole carriage of which weightie buſineſſe, being ſo diverſly related and cenſured by the Writers of both Nations, (though for the preſent it bee not materiall, both Kingdomes now bleſſedly acknowledging one abſolute Superiour) we will ſo trace the ſteps of truth in a midle way, as reſolving neither to impeach the action of that glorious Vmpire, not prejudicate the right of our noble Siſter-Nation. The State of Scotland now was not without manifeſt peril; for the Scots * denying that their Kingdome was in any point ſubalterne to the Crowne of England, and King Edward either perſwaded that it was, ſo, or reſolving and plotting now to make it ſo, would not neglect the advantage of this* Akephaliſis, or want of a knowne head in Scotland.

(21) Vpon full ventilation therefore and ſcanning of all rights, the maine doubt reſted upon Lord Brus and Baliol, for the reſidue might ſeeme rather to affect the honour of having pretended title in blood to a Diademe, then to have colour to contend with either of them. Great was the adviſe, and deliberation (as there was cauſe) which King Edward tooke therein, for not truſting to his owne judgement, he cauſed (ſaith * Hector Boetius) twelve of the beſt Clerkes or learned men of Scotland, and twelve of England to concurre, as Aſſeſſors, with him in that great deciſion.

(22) While this weighтie cauſe was in debatement; there fell out deadly ſtrife betweene the Engliſh and Normans, occaſioned by one of them caſually ſlaine by the Engliſh; which miſchiefe the King of France forwardly nouriſht, as thirſting for the dutchie of Gaſcoigne, which beſt he might attaine by troubling the forreine affaires of King Edward, whom they ſaw now entangled at home in ſo weighty employments. Whereupon the Normans flew ſundry of the Engliſh, and hung up one upon the maſt of a Ship, whom they had taken at Sea: but, ere long after, threeſcore Engliſh thips encountring with two hundreth ſaile of Normans, laden with wines, after a moſt bloudy battell (wherein many * thouſands of the French were ſlaine) tooke, with their whole fleet, their full revenge and brought them into England.

(23) At laſt yet King Edward returning to Berwicke, having with him the ſaid twenty foure Aſſeſſors, as it were a Iury of either Nation, * and with the good will and aſſent of the Scottiſh Lords, gave ſolemne judgement with Baliol, as being deſcended of the eldeſt Daughter of David, Earle of Huntingdon, a younger ſonne of Scotland; whoſe iſſue (the line of the elder brother being extinct) was to inherit without queſtion. But the ſtrife being betweene the deſcendents of the ſaid David, of which the Lord Robert Bruce was alſo a principall, reaſons of importance were produced, which drew many mens judgement to incline to him, as having a neerer intereſt to that Crowne. But according to the ſentence, Baliol was ſolemnely crowned King of Scotland upon Saint Andrews day, and, in Chriſtmas following, repaired to King Edward, at New-caſtle upon Tyne, and * there (againſt the minds of many Scots) did homage unto him for the whole Kingdome of Scotland.

(24) Meane time the French King purſued the revenge of the Normans, demanding reſtitution, and citing King Edward judicially to appeare to anſwere ſuch wrongs as were done in Aquitaine; who, (deſirous to ſettle his owne affaires at home, or, as ſome write, * eager upon a march for himſelfe in France) while hee diſcovered either his unwillingneſſe to appeare in that kinde, or to warre, ſuffered himſelfe by a French device, to be meerely deceived, and put out of his poſſeſſion of Gaſcoigne, to the great miſcheife, and diſadvantage of the Engliſh: whereupon King Edward highly incenſed, called a Parliament at London, where John King of Scotland was preſent; and had the full conſent of the whole Realme, to re-gaine that honeſtly by the ſword, which was craftily gotten away by a cunning tricke; * renouncing to the French his homage for Aquitaine. Wales alſo was at the ſame time full of troubles; but the fires of rebellion, there raſhly kindled, were, not long after, quenched with the bloud of the Actors, and thouſands of their Complices.

(25) Baliol having thus obtained the Crowne of Scotland, and finding his party, by the homage which hee had made to King Edward, much empaired among the Scots, who greatly repined thereat; for re-gaining their loves, * attempted a ſecret combination with the French againſt the Engliſh; which Edward ignorant of, and * requiring him by vertue of his homage to ayde him with all his powers againſt the King of France, * diſcovered (by Baliols delayes, and traverſes) the ſaid conſpiracy. Whereupon he advanced forward againſt the King of Scots with a puiſſant Army to Newcaſtle upon Tyne: The firſt bloud which was drawne was of the Engliſh, of whom, the Scots * ſlew almoſt one thouſand in a village under the leadrig of one Robert de Ros, who had fled from King Edward. The City of Carlile likewiſe was aſſaulted, and the County of Cumberland ſpoyled by ſeaven Earles of Scotland, and their companies, which to Edward was not greatly diſpleaſing, (as was ſaid) for that the firſt hoſtile acts were done by them, whom he had a full purpoſe to ſubdue, that at laſt hee might bee ſole in Albion; which, had not God reſerved for other times, wee might wonder he effected not.

(26) King Edward therefore preſented himſelfe before the ſtrong Towne of Berwicke with a mighty hoſt, there to auſpicate his entrance to a conqueſt of Scotland; and, after ſummons ſent to the Towne, a-bode one whole day without offer of violence: The Townesmen refuſing to render, had a victory of the Engliſh Marriners, who raſhly entring, with twenty and foure Ships into the harbour, were repulſed, with the loſſe of foure of their veſſels, which was ſoone revenged by the forceable taking of Berwicke, where * Hector Boetius ſaith, there was exerciſed great cruelty by the Engliſh. In the Towne, the Flemiſh Merchants (who were ſmothered by the Engliſh with fire) had a very ſtrong houſe in the manner of a Tower, from whence they leveld, at the entring of the Engliſh, with darts, & javelins, one of which caſually ſlew Richard of Cornewall, a gallant Gentleman, brother to the Earle of Cornwall, which, in an army heated with former contumelies, for the Scots upon the ſlaughter and repulſe which they had made of the Engliſh marriners, publiſhed certaine rimes in deriſion, as together with the remembrance of many freſh ſhrewd turnes, might ſtirre up bloudy effects. After the Towne was thus taken, the Caſtle after ſtood not long out, but rendred it ſelfe. * Sir William Douglas, captaine thereof, was detained priſoner, and (as * ſome write) Sir Robert Cruce: others were ſuffered to depart, upon oath, to beare no armes from thenceforth againſt the K. of England. Towne, and Castle was very great, for it was the key, and common Bulwarke of Scotland.

(27) While the English, at this place, were busie to cast a very deepe ditch, to hinder the foaine inroades of their enemies, Iohn King of Scotland sent two religious men to the King of England with * letters; in which, alledging that hee was by Oath bound to defend his owne Kingdome and people, hee renounced his homage and fealty, as extorted by violence, and voyde in it selfe, being made without assent of the three estates of his Realme. The resignation was admitted, King Edward commanding his Chancellor to record the same for perpetuall memory, as a justification of his proceedings.

* Tho. Walsing.

(28) The Scots hereupon, under the conduct of the Earles of Bucquhan, Menteth, Strathern, Ros, Athol, Marr, and other of their nobility, made an incursion into England, whence with the spoiles of two religious houses, and other booties they returned: But Patricke Earle of Dunbarre came to King Edward submitting himselfe; and the Castle of Dunbarre (by this submission being under King Edwards protection) was re-gained by Scots: for recovery, or lisu-re-gaining whereof, the King sent Iohn Earle of Surrey and Suſſex, and William Earle of Warwicke, who were entertained with battell by the Scottish Nation, of whom the English, * after cruell fight, obtained a victory of great importance, the Chase holding about eight miles, in which the slaughter was not small. The siege of Dunbarre being re-inforced, King Edward had it yeelded unto him, at his comming, wherein were taken three Earles, sixe or seaven Barons, besides many Knights, and Esquires, which were all sent prisoners to divers Castles of England, and (if some say true) not put to the sword (as Hector transported perhaps with hatred to Edward writes) contrary to his word, and faith given.

* Tho. Walsing. Hector Boetius lib. 14. Fabian.

(29) King Edward knowing as well how to use a victory, as to get it, having a present spirit upon all advantages and turnes of fortune, takes the Castle of Rockesbrough, and (for a finall end to this affaire) marcheth to Edenburgh it selfe (the chiefe Towne of Scotland) which * was shortly rendred: Then tooke they Striveling also, and drave Baliol to the * Castle of Forfar: where Iohn Comin Lord of Strabogy submitted himselfe to King Edward. About this time there came to the English campe great numbers of Welsh Souldiers, with whom he releeved many of the English foote-men, tyred with service, sending them back into England. Thither also came the Earles of Vlster with bands of Irish.

(30) The King of England prospering thus, passeth with his Army over the * Scottish Sea, where while he kept the feast of Saint Iohn Baptiſt at Perth (or Saint Iohns Towne) there came messengers from Baliol, and the Lords his Factors, to sue for mercy, which was granted, upon condition, that they should render themselves to him as his subjects. * Hector Boetius saith, that after this agreement (wherein * Anthony Bishop of Durham was used) Iohn Comin brought Baliol, voyde of all Kingly habiliments with a white rod in his hand, to the English campe at Montros, where hee resigned his whole right that hee either had, or might have to the Crowne of Scotland, into King Edwards hands, and made thereof a formall Charter in French, and at the same time also (for feare of life) gave his sonne Edward for hostage, and assurance of his fealty; by which finall disclaime, the Lord Bruces right might seeme now unquestionable. But this resignation being thus made, King Edward returnes to Berwicke, where * all the Nobles of Scotland (at a Parliament there holden) were sworne to be loyall, and true subjects to King Edward for ever after: and * hereof a solemne instrument was sealed by the said Lords (of whom Iohn Comin of Badenaw was first) bearing date at Berwicke in the twenty fifth yeere of the reigne of their Soveraigne Lord King Edward.

(31) Iohn the late King, was sent to the Tower of London, and there was honourably attended, having liberty for twenty miles about. The Scottish Lords were confined within Trent, over which River they might not passe toward Scotland, upon paine of life: The custody of Scotland was committed to Iohn de Warren, Earle of Surrey and Suſſex, and the Treasurership thereof to Hugh de Cressingham, but William de Ormesby was ordained Iusticiar, with this particular commandement, that hee should take the Homages and Fealties of all such as held Lands of the King. And the more to shew his purpose, utterly to dissolve the distinct Regality of Scotland, and to unite it to the English Monarchy, as hee had done Wales, hee tooke out of Edenburgh the Crowne, Scepter, and Cloath of Estate, offering them up at * Saint Edwards shrine in Westminster, if the Author mistake not, for at Saint Thomas at Canterbury, * hee offered up Baliols Crowne saith another; and (besides many other Acts tending to the abolishment of the Scottish Name, which * Hector relates, as the burning their Records, abrogating their lawes, altering their formes of divine service, and transplanting all their learnedst men thence unto his Vniversity of Oxford) hee tooke out of the * Abbey of Scone the Marble Chaire, in which the Kings of Scotland were wont to bee crowned, and sent the same to Westminster, for Priests to sit therein at Celebration. This Chaire is the same upon which was engraven, the famous Propheticall Diſtichon:

Tho. Walsingh. Camden in Scotland. pag. faith it was a stone inclosed within a wooden chaire.

Which by whomsoever it was written, we who now live, finde it happily accomplished. But these great Acts of this yeere brought to the Commons of England small commodity, upon whom the charge of the warres lay heavily: And it is not often found, that the people gaine much by their Princes Conqueſts.

(32) The force of Scotland with a greater force being thus for the present broken, who would suppose that it could once againe have lifted up the head, and that chiefely by the particular vertue of a private man, as it after hapned? which hee had the more opportunity to doe, for that the King of England was diverſly diverted by occasion of warres in Gascoigne for recovery of his owne, and for ayde of his friends in Flanders, whom the French did afflict in hostile manner. The Captaine of the revolted troupes in Scotland, was one William Walleys (the sonne of * Sir Andrew Walleys of Cragy Knight, though some * upon heare-say, write contemptibly of his course of life, as of a publike Robber) who, by the assistance of such as were out-lawed, for refusing to doe their Homage to King Edward, drave William de Ormesby (the Kings Iusticiar) out of Scotland. Which King Edward hearing, discharged Iohn Comin of Badenaw, and the Earle of Bucquhan from their confinement, to the intent that hee might by their endevours, the sooner settle matters, but withall hee gave Iohn de Warren Earle of Surrey commission to levy an Army: and the King (loath to bee hindred from his other destinations) easily yeelded to such requests as were propounded on the Scots behalfe for that time. The voyage which hee had then in hand, was to transport from Winchelſey an Army, to assist the Earle of Flanders his Confederate.

(33) England at this time was not without great discontentments, which Humphrey de Bohun Earle of Hereford and Essex, Constable of England, and Roger Bigod Earle of Norfolke, Marshall of England, did countenance; for present satisfaction whereof, the King yeelded (among other things) to confirme Magna Charta, and Charta de Foreſta, and that there should no Subsidie nor taxation bee levyed upon the people, without the consent of the Prelates, Peeres, Peeres, and people. But before this time, and while the King was absent out of the land, the Scots, under the leading of William Walleys, put to * flight the Earle Warren, and all the English forces which were with him, taking them at advantage, as they were passing over a narrow Bridge, neere unto the Castle of Stirveling: the slaughter of the English was not small. There Hugh de Cressingham Treasurer of Scotland for King Edward, fell in battell, whose dead body for speciall hatred borne unto him, the Scots did flea, dividing his skinne among them. The King hearing of this overthrowe, commands the Lords of England by his letters to bee ready to assist the said Earle Warren (his Custos or Guardian of Scotland) with their Forces, in the Octaves of Saint Hilary at Yorke, and also to proclaime such of the Scottish Lords as came not thither, enemies of the State; but they kept themselves within Scotland, and came not. Whereupon the English Captaines marched to the rescue of the Castle of Rockesborough, whence William Walleys fled upon notice of their approach to raise his siege. But King Edward (advertised of these accidents) having taken a truce for two yeares with the King of France, by mediation of Bonifacius the Pope, who interposed himselfe (non tanquam Iudex, ſed amicabilis Compoſitor, saith Walſingham, not as a Iudge, but as a friendly Composer) made haste into England, where his presence was extreamely wanting: but in his way home, at a Towne called * Ardeburgh, all the Scots almost, which hee had brought with him to serve in the Flemish Wars, forsooke him and went to Paris.

(34) After his arrivall in England, he summoned a Parliament at Yorke, giving the Scots a day to appeare thereat; which they not doing, nor acknowledging that they ought to doe, hee entred with a mightie Armie into their Countrey, his Navy laden with victuals coasting along; which by contrary winds being holden off for a time, put the Scots the rather in hope of victory, by reason of the scarsitie of provisions among the English; but three dayes before the Scots appeared, the ships came, and plentifully refreshed the fainting souldiers. Hereupon the King led forward his people, and upon the next morning, a terrible showt being heard from the Scottish host, the English ranne to Armes; but the Kings Horse (affrighted with the sodaine tumultuous noise) as hee was putting foot in stirrup, threw him to the earth, and striking with the hinder heeles, brake two of his ribs; who nevertheleſſe upon the same horse proceeded in person to the battell. William Walleys, who had wonne to himselfe, by many his hardy enterprises a singular opinion among the Peeres, and people, having set his Scots in array (whose numbers farre exceeded the English) used every where this short speech unto them in stead of Orations, I have brought you to the King, hop gif yee kun. For their more securitie, hee had * fixed betweene them and the English, certaine Pales or stakes, bound together with ropes, which the English Vauntguard brake downe, and came to strokes. The first which fled, were the Scottish Horsemen, leaving their Infantery, or battels of Foot, open to that great destruction which followed, the victory resting clearely to the English.

(35) Our Scottish * Author writes, that by reason of emulation against Walleys, the Scots burning in mutuall hatred, made the enterprise easie to their enemies; which as it may be very true, so certainly there was scarse any battell betweene the two Nations, in which more Scottish blood was spilt then in this, for thereof * Sebaſtian Munſter seemes to meane, saying, that there were slaine threescore and ten thousand, which though we take not to bee the true number, (for some have * threescore thousand, * others not so many) yet shewes it that the slaughter was vast, as it could not otherwise bee, the Scottish footmen valiantly * fighting as it were to the last man. Blood worthy to have beene shed on both sides, against another kinde of enemy, then Christians; the deformitie of which effusions may justly represent to us the blessed estate of our now settled union. This victory was obtained by the English upon Saint Mary Magdalens day, at a place called Fankirke: from which William Wallays, opening his way with his sword escaped. The Welshmen deserved ill of the King at this journey, for that they fore-slowed to charge upon the Pallisado, or fence of the Scots, in hope (the English being vanquished, which by the inequalitie of their numbers, they presumed would happen) that themselves might joyntly with the Scots, execute upon King Edward the hatred, which they bare him for the * evils hee had brought upon their Nation. After this victory the King tooke sundry places, and returned into England by Carlile.

(36) The two yeares truce formerly taken betweene the English and French, was now, by the interceding of Boniface Bishop of Rome, turned to a fettled peace, who (among other things) brought it about, that King Edward should marry the French Kings Sister Margaret; and Edward the Kings Sonne, the same Kings Daughter, though saith Walſingham) he advanced not the good of his Realme by this match in any point. To this affinity were added the greater strengths of a domestick quiet; for the King (whom warres had together made renowned, and aged) graciously and wisely yeelded to confirme such grants of lawes and liberties, as the Earles and Barons (the pretended Conservators of the Peoples interest) did declare, were by his promise to bee confirmed to them at his returne from Scotland: and which hee accordingly did, in a Parliament holden at London, upon prorogation, in Quindena Paſche, where for their fuller satisfaction hee * left out this Clause in the end, Salvo jure corone noſtre, saving the right of our Crowne: and what at this time was wanting, he made up afterward in a Parliament at Stamford.

The Baliol set at libertie.

(37) But that hee might not seeme willing to deny the Pope any just request, or not to know the sweetenesse of anothers freedome, hee delivered to the hands of the Popes Nuntios, Iohn the late King of Scotland, (upon their assuming for King Edwards indemnity,) whom they conveied to his inheritance in France, where (upon every side unfortunate) he remained as under the nore of a false seducer, and of a perjur'd person in King Edwards judgement, and without any part of his regall office over the Scottish Nation; who found that the peace which King Edward made in other places, did but turne to their more grievous affliction; for albeit they had gotten Striveling by surrender of the English, and began with an immortall desire of their ancient Liberty, to assemble againe under William Walleys, yet the time was not come of their deliverance; for King Edward (according as it was formerly appointed,) having accomplished his marriage with the French Kings sister at Canterbury, made it his whole affaire, to finish the annexation of Scotland to the Crowne of England.

(38) He therefore accompanied with his sonne, and a dreadfull Army, pursued the matter so close, that whereas the Scots had gotten together againe in exceeding great numbers, under their severall Captaines, (whose * Envie had caused Walleys to give up all such authority, as the Common-wealth of Scotland had formerly granted unto him, for preservation of their freedomes,) and flying before King Edward, whose fortune in warre had worthily made him terrible; that day (in Walſinghams judgement) had beene irrecoverably fatall to the Scottish name, if the English had beene able to have followed them in their Armour, over their bogges and mountaines; or that the Welsh had with their naturall nimblenes supplied the same. Sure it is, that Edward held himselfe so fast in possession, that hee neither would grant the Scottish Lords their Baliol to raigne over them, (which they they requested faith Walsingham) not suffer them to redeeme such lands of theirs, as he had given to the English among them.

The Pope interposeth his authority for the release of Scotland.

(39) Armes failing, and the Scots having made their way in the Court of Rome, procured inhibitory Letters from the Pope, which were brought by one Lumbardus into Scotland: but the King swearing a * terrible oath, said, that he would not desist. Nevertheless the Scots, after a few dayes, requested the King to let them live in peace, till they had taken counsell of the Peeres, and of the King of France, threatning that otherwise the Pope would take the matter upon him. But the King with a disdainfull smile, answered: "have you done homage to mee (as "to the chiefe Lord of the Kingdome of Scotland) "and now suppose that I can be terrified with swelling "lies, as if (like one that had no power to compell) "I would let the right which I have over you to slip out "of my hands? Let me heare no more of this, for if I "die, I sweare by the Lord, I will consume all Scotland "from Sea to Sea. On the other side the Scots did boldly enough reply, That in this cause they would shed their blood for defence of justice, and their Countries libertie.

* Per Angliam Dei.

The constancy of the Welshmens love to the first English Prince of Wales.

(40) About this time the King made his sonne Edward, (who was borne at Caernarvon) Prince of Wales, and Earle of Chester, which so greatly contented the Welsh, because (in regard of his birth place) they held him as one of theirs, that when all friends did afterward forsake him (as the following Raigne will shew) they alwayes stucke most loyally unto him, expressing wonderfull love and affection, and bewayling his heavie fortunes in woefull songs, *which neither the dread of his enemies, nor length of time could ever make them to * forget.*

* Thom. Walsing.

(41) But, in the matter of Scotland, the King not to seeme altogether to neglect the Court of Rome, addressed thither the Earle of Lincolne, and the Lord Hugh de Spencer with manifold complaints against the Scots, and justification of his owne proceedings; howbeit at the Popes request, he granted them truce from Hallowmas to Whitsontide. This very yeere, Cassan King of Tartars gloriously slew one hundreth thousand Turkes in a battell upon the plaine of Damascus, and was baptized thereupon, as acknowledging the victorie to come from the Sonne of God: the joy whereof filled England, as other the parts of Christendome.

An. Dom. 1302.

(42) The justice of the English Armes against the Scots, being now againe directly impugned by the Papall letters, comprehending sundry arguments on the behalfe of that Nation, King Edward in a Parliament at Lincolne published their contents, and by consent of the whole representative body of the Realme, returned a copious defence of his whole proceedings, with protestation, first, that hee did not exhibite any thing as in forme of judgement, or triall of his cause, but for satisfaction of his holy Fatherhoods conscience, and not otherwise. But whereas the Pope had required the King to stand to his decision for matter of claime, hee writes, that thereunto he would make no answer, as having left that point to the Earles and Peeres of his Land: who with one "minde directly signifie, that their King was not to "answer in judgement for any rites of the Crowne of "England before any Tribunall under Heaven: and "that (by sending Deputies or Attourneyes to such an "end) he should not make the said truth doubtfull, be-"cause it manifestly tended to the disinherison of the said "Crowne, which with the helpe of God, they would reso-"lutely, and with all their force maintaine against all men. That the resolution of these worthy pillars, thus in case of their Countries Crowne, and dignities, may be imitated in their following posteritie, and celebrated in our everlasting remembrances; We hold it here fit to record their names, subscribed in their answers unto Pope Boniface, dated at Lincolne, the yeere of our Redemption 1301. and 29. of King Edward the first.

* Hector Boet. lib. 14.

(43) Wee may not heere over-passe a victory (at Rosslin) which the Writers of that Nation celebrate, wherein the English were by them overcome, howbeit there is in our Writers much variety in that relation. It is the saying of Hector Boetius, that the English were about three for one; our ancient and later Authors say, that the Scots had farre the * more people; hee affirmes, that it was in the plaine field: ours, that it was an * Ambush: hee, that the Scots did put to flight, and tooke the spoiles of three whole battels, in either of which were * 10000. English; ours, that the Scots by reason of their multitudes did onely over-beare the Vauntgard, from which the neareft of the other battels was * foure miles off. All agree in this, that the Lord John Segrave (Ralph Confrey saith Hector) who had the point or vward of the English (whose Generall hee also was) by dividing his Army into three parts for their better reliefe, weakened so his whole force, that thereby, and his unadvised forwardnesse (impatient to stay for his other powers) hee gave occasion to the Scots of such a victory. They had also taken the person of the said Lord Generall, but * Sir Robert de Neville, who with others was at divine Service, hearing thereof, came with his troupes of Horse, rescued Segrave, slew many, put many to flight, and brought away backe the rest of the prisoners, without * the losse of any one man of his owne. The said Scottish Chronicle makes no mention of William Walleys, at this discomfiture of the English, but gives the whole glory thereof to Cumyn, and to Simon Fraser: whereas we attribute all to Walleys, and make no mention of the other, with farre lesse wrong to the immortall deserts of Walleys; for hee undoubtedly, was the onely man, who kept up Scotland, till neere the time of deliverance.

(44) The Scottish Nation (as * Hector reports) "had for their warrant in conscience, and justificati-"on of resistance, the Popes judgement, who upon "ripe deliberation in their matter, decreed (saith "hee) that the Scots had just action of battle in "defence of their liberties against King Edward: who not much esteeming the doome of that Oracle, upon the other side was perswaded hee might proceed to subdue them wholly to his dominion: and therefore, (upon report that the Scots were not onely up in Armes, but encouraged to greater attempts by this late successe,) came in person with a dreadfull host, piercing therewith * through all Scotland, from one end thereof to the other; from Rockfbrough to Catnes, which is the farthest point in the length of that Land, being about three hundreth myles: whither hee marched by small journeyes, not an enemy appearing with power to empeach him. For they, unable to make head, being so continually wasted, did either for their safety betake themselves to the woods and mountaines, with their Walleys, or wholly submitted themselves, * swearing to bee true to King Edward, there being in all Scotland but one Castle (the Castle of Striveling) which stood out, and that also (upon King Edwards return from Catnes) was * absolutely surrendred to him; and therefore no great cause, why Hector should call King Edward false Tyrant, for committing the Captaine and Garrison of that Castle to sundry Prisons: So that, had not God in his eternall providence, favouring the liberty of that people, ordained some in-accessible places, and naturall strengths, where no Army could march nor bee maintained, the Scots had in all likelyhood perpetually undergone the same fortune, which we the English were brought into, for want of the like, by William the first, and his Normans.

"(45) Therefore let prophane discourses (with their "Father Epicurus and Lucretius) blush and tremble, "as often as they shall dare to insinuate any thing against "Gods wisedome in the Fabricke of the world, as if "the Craggie, and desert places thereof, had no use "in nature, when (omitting all other reasons of their "being) the conservation of Kingdomes, and Nations, "was thus by them effected. Wee had an * Herward "in the Conquerours time, aswell as the Scots had a "Walleys in this; and wee might perhaps at this houre "have beene without French mixtures, if God had "provided our Countrey of such Wastes, and deserts, "as either they or the Welshmen did enjoy, who for "many hundreths of yeares, after the ruine of their "Monarchie in Britaine, upheld, in some sort, "their libertie, when the English *had twice by "*Danes, and Normans, in the meane time, utterly "lost it.

(46) Scotland (saith * Hector) being in this manner subdued; and all the strengths of buildings, and the Nobility thereof at King Edwards disposition, hee having ordered the affaires thereof as himselfe thought best, left the custody thereof againe to * Segrave, and in his triumphall returne through England from Dunfermelin in Scotland, where hee kept his Christmas, caused the Courts of the Bench, and Exchequer, which had beene seaven yeares kept at Yorke, (for the more commodity of his Scottish expeditions) to bee reduced to London, their ancient residence. Moreover hee ordained Justiciars for Trailbaston, who were to enquire of man-slaughters, Ruffians, Dissitors, Boot-halers, Incendiaries, and other perturbers of the common quiet, and them to punish, by fine, death, and otherwise, which brought to the Realme much rest, and to the King much riches.

(47) But, the more to secure King Edward in the Scottish Kingdome, it was not long, but that William Walleys (whom an Earle of Scotland in the beginning of his resistances had honoured (saith Walsingham) with the girdle of * Knight-hood) was brought up prisoner to London, being treasonably taken at Glasco by * one Sir John Menteth (though * Polydor Virgil saith, the English tooke him in warre) where hee had publike tryall at Westminster, and * denying that hee was a Traitour to the King of England, was there for other his crimes (as burning of Townes, taking of Castles, killing the English, &c.) adjudged to death, which sentence was executed executed upon him, and his head and quarters set up in feverall places over the Iland, his right * leg at Perth or Saint Johns Towne in Scotland, and his left at Aberdein. This was the end of Walleys, whom his Countrey had once by common consent chosen for their defender, and * Capraine Generall; and, for his deserts towards her, doth place in glory farre above the Starres, as the onely person, by whose example, the Scots had their spirits kept awake, and quicke upon all occasions, by which they might recover the Government out of the hands of the English, whose Raigne over them this Walleys neither by faire means, nor by force could ever bee drawne to endure, or looke upon with a patient eye; whom though (with * Hector Transtatour) we doe not call a Martyr, yet must wee thinke his Countrey honoured in him, wishing many the like in our owne.

(48) Let no man now make doubt to write up King Edward among the greatest of our English-Monarchs, for (besides the whole Ilands of Britaine and Ireland) hee also held Aquitaine, which about two yeares before, the King of France (entangled with troubles otherwise) did restore, and the City of Burdeaux of the owne accord submitted it selfe againe to the English Scepter, as that wherewith it had formerly beene so long, and well acquainted; and to gratifie the same Edward, the King of France also banished the Scots out of his dominions. Thus was King Edward possessed of Scotland; which nevertheleſſe (that the world may see Gods hand in translating of Kingedomes, being a * point of his prerogative) was not long after pluckt from his Sonne; and the calamities which the Scots had ſuffered, whelmed backe upon the Engliſh. Which peculiar art of divine providence you will more eaſily acknowledge, when you ſhall behold by how naked an inſtrument hee raiſed againe the Scottiſh Common-wealth out of that duſt, in which for a little ſeaſon it ſeemed to lye buried.

(49) Walleys therefore being taken out of the way, the Lord Robert Bruce (betweene whom, and the unfortunate Baliol the maine ſtrife lay for the Diadem) beholding the ſtate of his Countrey, for which Walleys, without intereſt to the Crowne thereof, had ſtood ſo nobly, and deſirous to give it a new head by making himſelfe King (whereto by Baliols ſurrender his other right was made more paſſable) had for that purpoſe entered into a conſpiracy with Cumyn, whoſe diſcloſure thereof (as Scots doe write) brought into apparent danger the Lord Bruces life, who was then attendant in the Court of England. King Edward upon the firſt diſcovery of the plot not crediting the ſame, Bruce, moſt conſtantly denying it, and caſting the accuſation, with good probability, upon Cumyns envy, had time, and warning to eſcape. For an Earle (ſaith Boetius) ſent unto him twelve Striveling pence, and a paire of ſharpe ſpurs, preſently upon his departure from the King, which he wittily interpreted to be a Symbole of ſpeedy flight. According whereunto hee forthwith ſped from London, where King Edward kept Chriſtmas, ſhooing his horſes backeward, that he might not be followed by their prints upon the ſnow, and with his owne hand thruſt his Sword into Cumyn * in the Church of the Friers Minors at Dunfreis in Scotland, whom two of Bruces friends with other mortall thruſts diſpatched. Bruce knowing now no way to anſwer the fact, but by open defection, which he did reſolve upon, did thereupon procure himſelfe to be crowned King of Scotland about our Ladies day in March in the Abbey of Scone.

King Robert Bruce of Scotland. An. Dom. 1307.

(50) Such an attempt as this could not bee long hidden from King Edward, who having at the Whitſontide next after honoured Edward Prince of Wales, his eldeſt Sonne, with the order of Knight-hood at London, ſent him againſt King Robert into Scotland, attended with a troupe of noble young Gentlemen, Aymery de Valence Earle of Pembroke; Robert de Clifford, and Henry de Percy being gone before with an Army, and King Edward preparing to come after, appointing the Rendevous of his owne hoſt to bee at Carliel. Where, in a Parliament, beſides proviſions for the Warres, ſundry conſultations and courſes were entred, for repelling another kind of enemy no leſſe dangerous to the State; to wit, the Pope, and his * ſtill continued extortions in this Land, whereof grievous complaints were made in that Aſſembly; and both the Clergy there * appealed from the Popes Bull, and his Cardinall-Legats exactions: and alſo the Kings Councell was driven to enact ſome orders for bridling their exceſſive depilations.

(51) Meane time Aymery de Valence at Perth in Scotland had put to flight King Robert Bruce, and purſued him ſo neere, that he tooke his Wife, his brother Nigellus, and others, but himſelfe eſcaped into the utmoſt Iles of Scotland. This hanſell taken at the entrance to his Regality, drave his people into ſuch deſpaire of his future better fortunes, that there remained onely two friends unto him, the Earle of Lenox, and Gilbert Hay: the reſt, as the Earle of Athol, at London, (who had twice revolted) and his brother Nigellus at Berwicke, were put to death, as all others his chiefe partakers were, or elſe kept priſoners in England. In which number was King Roberts wife (daughter to the Earle of Vlſter in Ireland) and his daughter, the Biſhops of Glaſco, and Saint Andrewes, the Abbot of Scone and others. The Counteſſe of Buchquhan, ſiſter to the Earle of Fife (then abſent in England at his mannor of * Whitwicke in Leiceſterſhire, whoſe office it was to have crowned the Scottiſh King) was alſo taken, and becauſe (in her brothers abſence) ſhee had ſtolne from the Earle her husband, with all his great horſe, to * ſet the Diadem upon Bruces head, it was deviſed that ſhee ſhould bee ſet in a woodden cage (made * Crowne-wiſe) upon the wals of Berwick Caſtle, for all to wonder at. This ridiculous revenge was held ſufficient, without taking her life, though ſhe were a manlike Woman, and did herein but the part of a noble-ſpirited Lady. Thus was King Robert (ſaith the Scottiſh * tranſlator of Boetius) brought to ſuch miſery, that hee was ſometime naked and hungry, without meat or drinke, ſave onely water and rootes of herbes, and his life perpetually in danger. Howbeit, hee never forſooke himſelfe, but as one that had firme truſt in God, cheriſhed an hope in his minde, at one time or other to recover the Crowne. In which condition he exhibited himſelfe ſo noble a ſpectacle, as in which even the * morall Heathen doe teach, that the Gods themſelves tooke pleaſure; how then can Chriſtians looke off? Certainely, all generous ſpirits, whom cruell injuries oppreſſe, have reaſon to dwell in this patterne of Chriſtian magnanimity and patience.

(52) King Edward alſo on the other ſide (like a Chriſtian Prince) as hee had ſome yeares before, by his ſpeciall Letters (directed to the * Archbiſhop of Canterbury,) requeſted that publike prayers ſhould bee made to Almighty God for him, his Realme and people, that the heavenly Majeſty would direct his way and workes to the glory of his holy name, and advancement of the Kingdome; ſo now repaired hee with his Lords to Weſtminſter, after this diſcomfiture of his enemies, there ſolemnely to render unto God his humble thanks for the Conqueſt, whereof he thus held himſelfe aſſured. Which confidence drew him on ſo farre, that now (his turnes being ſerved; as he thought againſt the Scots) hee refuſed to ſtand to the confirmation which hee had made to his Barons, of ſuch Lawes and Liberties as have before beene mentioned, pretending that they had forced his conſent: and doubtleſſe, as great was the Kings fault thus to renounce what he had ſolemnely ſworn, (* though indeed it was on ſome neceſſity and enforcement) ſo the Popes warranting thereof (which certainely encouraged the King thereunto) is moſt execrable; who afterward abſolved him (as other Popes had done to his Predeceſſors) from obſervance of that oath.

(53) The miraculous deliverance of Scotland was now at hand; for the noble Bruce, not ſtaying till King Edward were dead (who was now about threeſcore and eight yeares of age,) came forth out of the Scottiſh Ilands with ſuch powers as hee had gotten together, taking the Caſtles of Carricke, Inverneſſe, and many other, doing many things above the opinion of his meanes. To put an end to all which troubles, King Edward reſolved once againe in perſon (notwithſtanding his age,) to enter Scotland with a mightie hoaſt, which he appointed to attend him at Carliel in Cumberland, three weekes after Midſommer day: where God viſiting him with his laſt ſickneſſe, he commanded his Sonne the Prince to repaire with ſpeed unto him, unto whom being come, he uttered many admonitions and precepts, the ſumme whereof was * this.

* Tho. Walſing. King Edwards laſt ſpeeches to the Prince.

(54) "That hee ſhould bee mercifull, juſt and "courteous, conſtant in word and deed, familiar to "the good, and toward ſuch as were in diſtreſſe alwaies "pitifull. That after his death he ſhould not haſten "to take the Crowne of England, till hee had ho- "nourably revenged the injuries of his Father, and "accompliſhed the preſent ſervice. That hee "ſhould carry his Fathers bones about with him in "ſome coffin, till he had marched through all Scot- "land, and ſubdued all his enemies, for that none "ſhould be able to * overcome him while his Ske- "leton marched with him. Moreover, hee com- "manded the ſaid Prince to love his * Brethren, "Thomas and Edmund; but eſpecially to tender and "reſpect his Mother Queene Margaret. * That "upon paine of his malediction, and curſe, hee ſhould "not preſume without common conſent to repeale Piers "de Gaveſton, who for abuſing the tender yeares of "the Prince with wicked vanities, by common decree "was baniſhed. That whereas himſelfe, by the con- "tinuall, and new attempts of Bruce, could not in "perſon (according to his vow) make warre in "the Holy-land, therefore he ſhould ſend his Heart "thither, accompanied with ſevenſcore Knights, "and their retinues, for whoſe ſupport he had provi- "ded thirty and two thouſand pounds of ſilver. That "his Heart being ſo by them conveyed, he did hope "in God, that all things there would proſper with "them. (55) With theſe admonitions diſmiſſing the light young man from his preſence, to accompliſh (ſo prouident was he to the very end of his ſtate affaires) the marriage with the French Kings Daughter, which had beene formerly agreed upon betweene the Parents; he advanced neerer to the enemy unto Burgh upon Sands, where his lingring Dyſentery encreaſing (for that was the ſickneſſe whereof he dyed, though one malevolently ſaith, he dyed ſuddenly, without ſhew of repentance for his ſinnes) hee tooke his * leave of this world, after no leſſe preparation (no doubt) for his owne ſoules health, then carefull promotion for the carriage of his ſonne, and ordering of his Kingdome. Which puiſſant Princes raigne and life, we cannot here ſhut up with a nobler Euloge, then that wherewith our * Great and Iudicious Antiquary hath already depourtrayed him, as a Prince of chiefe renowne, to whoſe heroicke minde God proportioned (as a moſt worthy Manſion) a body anſwerable, ſo that as well in beautie and goodly preſence, as in wiſedome and valour, hee was ſuitable to the height of his Regall Dignitie, whoſe flouriſhing youth his Deſtinie did exerciſe with many warres and troubles of the State, ſo to frame and fit him for the Britiſh Empire; which, being King, he ſo managed with the glory of his Welſh and Northerne victories, that by due deſert he is to be reputed a chiefe honour of Britannie.

His Wives.

(56) Eleanor, the firſt Wife of King Edward, was Siſter to Alphonſus King of Caſtile, Daughter to King Ferdinando the third, and onely Childe of Joan his ſecond Wife, Daughter and Heire of John Earle of Ponthieu. Shee was married to him at Bures in Spaine, in the thirtie ninth yeare of King Henry his Father, 1254. ſhee was crowned with him the day of his Coronation, and living his Wife (in lovely participation of all his troubles, and long voyages) thirtie ſixe yeares, dyed at Herdeby in Lincolnſhire, November 29. of her Huſbands raigne 19. An. Dom. 1290. ſhee is buried at Weſtminſter, at the feet of King Henry the third, under a faire Marble Tombe, adorned with her portraiture of Copper guilt: * other coſtly monuments of her Husbands love being in every place erected where her Hearſe reſted, as it was conveied from Herdeby to Weſtminſter.

(57) Margaret his ſecond Wife, being Siſter of Philip the fourth, ſurnamed the Faire, King of France, and eldeſt Daughter of King Philip the Hardy, Sonne of Saint Lewis, was married to him at Canterbury, on Thurſday, September 8. of her Husbands raigne 27. An. Dom. 1299. after almoſt eight yeares marriage, ſurviving him, ſhee remained a Widow ten yeares, and deceaſing ten of Edward 2. Ann. Dom. 1317. was buried at the Gray-Friers in London, before the Altar, in the Quire which her ſelfe had built.

His Iſſue.

(58) John, the eldeſt Sonne of King Edward, and Queene Eleanor, was borne at Windſor, in the raigne of King Henry his Grandfather, before his Fathers voyage into Syria, and in his abſence, was committed to the charge of Richard King of Romans, his great-Vncle, and others, who procured principall men of every Hundred in each County within the Realme, to ſweare their fealtie to his Father and him, but hee dyed ſhortly after, being a Child, and was buried at Weſtminſter by the wall, betweene Saint Edmunds and Saint Bennets Chappell, Auguſt 8. in the laſt yeare of King Henry his Grand-fathers raigne; there is remaining over him a Tombe of Marble in-layed, with his picture in an Arch over it.

(59) Henry, the ſecone Sonne of King Edward and Queene Eleanor, deceaſed alſo being a Childe, the newes of whoſe death was brought to his Father, being then in the Iſle of Sicill, in his returne from the Holy-Land, not long before the report of his owne Fathers death came to his knowledge: hee was buried in Saint Peters Church at Weſtminſter, the twentieth day of November, in the firſt yeare of his Fathers Raigne, Ann. Dom. 1272. in the ſame place, and under the ſame Tombe where his Brother John lyes, with his picture alſo in the Arch above it.

(60) Alphonſe, the third ſonne of Edward and Queene Eleanor, was borne at the Towne of Maine in Gaſcoigne, as his Father and Mother were in their returne towards England from Ieruſalem, November 23. in the ſecond yeare of his Fathers raigne, 1273. hee deceaſed at Windſor, Auguſt 4. in the twelfth yeare of his age, 1285. and was buried at Weſtminſter in Saint Peters Church by Saint Bennets Chappell, where his body lyeth under the Tombe of his Brothers, John and Henry, his Image alſo there portrayed with theirs.

(61) Edward, the fourth ſonne of King Edward and Queene Eleanor, was borne Aprill 25. in the the thirtieth yeare of his Fathers Raigne, 1284. at Caernarvon in North-Wales, and after the death of Lewelin ap Griffith, in regard of the place of his Nativitie, was by his Fathers Creation, with the conſent of the Welſh, made Prince of Wales, the firſt of the Sonnes and Heires apparant of the Kings of England, that bare that Title, which afterward became ordinary to moſt of the reſt: hee was alſo Earle of Ponthieu and Cheſter, and being made Knight by his Father at London on Whitſunday, in the thirtie fourth yeare of his Raigne, 1306. ſucceeded him the ſame yeare in the Kingdome of England and Wales.

(62) Eleanor, the eldeſt daughter of King Edward and Queene Eleanor, was borne at Windſor, in the fiftieth yeare of King Henry her Grand-father, ſhe was married with all Ceremonies of Proxie to a Deputy for Alphonſe King of Aragon, ſonne of King Peter, who deceaſed, An. Dom. 1292. before the ſolemnization of marriage, leaving his Kingdome to his Brother Iames, and his new wife to another Husband, who was married at Briſtow, in the two and twentieth yeare of her Fathers Raigne, 1293. to Henry the third Earle of Barry, whoſe Earledome lay in the Eaſt-borders of Champaigne in France. Shee had Iſſue by him Edward Earle of Berrie, from whom deſcended the Earles and Dukes of that Countrey, whoſe inheritance, by Heires generall, devolved to the Kings of Aragon, and from them againe to the Dukes of Anjou that were Kings of Sicill. Henry another ſonne of hers was Biſhop of Troys in Champaigne. Helen her daughter was married to Henry Earle of Bloys; and Ioan to Iohn Warren Earle of Surrey, ſhe was his wife five yeares, and deceaſed 27. of her Fathers Raigne, An. Dom. 1298.

(63) Ioan the ſecond daughter of King Edward, and Queene Eleanor, was borne in the firſt yeare of her Fathers Raigne, 1272. at a City in the Holy-land ſometime named Ptolomais, common called Acon and Acer, where her Mother remained during the warres that her Father had with the Sarazens: She was, at eighteene yeares of age, married to Gilbert Clare, called the Red, Earle of Gloceſter and Hereford, by whom ſhee had iſſue, Earle Gilbert ſlaine in Scotland without iſſue; Eleanor, married firſt to Hugh Spencer (in her right, Earle of Gloceſter,) and after to William Zouch of Ricards Caſtle. Margaret, firſt married to Peter Gaveſton, Earle of Cornwall, after to Hugh Audeley Earle alſo of Glouceſter; and Elizabeth Lady of Clare, married firſt to Iohn, ſonne and heire to Richard Burgh, Earle of Vlſter in Ireland, Mother of William Burgh Earle of Vlſter, and Grandmother of Elizabeth, Dutcheſſe of Clarence, ſecondly, to Theobald Lord Verdon, and laſtly, to Sir Roger Damary. This Ioan ſurvived her husband, and was re-married to Sir Ralph Monthermere a Baron, Father to Margaret the Mother of Thomas Mountacute Earle of Saliſbury, of whom the now Viſcount Mountacute is deſcended; ſhee lived thirtie eight yeares, and deceaſed in the firſt yeare of her Brother King Edwards Raigne, and is buried at the Fryer Auſtines in Clare.

(64) Margaret the third daughter of King Edward and Queene Eleanor, was borne at the Caſtle of Windſor, in the third yeare of her Fathers Raigne, and of our Lord, 1275. When ſhe was fifteene yeares of age, ſhee was married at Weſtminſter, July 9. in the eighteenth yeare of her Fathers Raigne, An. Dom. 1290. to Iohn the ſecond, Duke of Brabant, by whom ſhe had iſſue Duke Iohn the third, Father of Margaret, wife of Lewis of Mechlin Earle of Flanders, and Mother of the Lady Margaret, the Heire of Brabant and Flanders, who was married to Philip Duke of Burgundy.

(65) Berenger, the fourth Daughter of King Edward and Queene Eleanor, was borne the 4. of her Fathers Raigne, An. 1276. as Iohn Everesden the Monke of Saint Edmundsbury in Suffolke, hath recorded in his Booke of Engliſh Annales, but other mention there is none, but onely from him: whereby it is likely that ſhe did not live to be married, but that ſhe dyed in her Child-hood.

(66) Alice, the fifth Daughter of King Edward and Queene Eleanor, is by Thomas Pickering of the Monaſtery of Whitby, (who wrote the large Genealogie of the Kings of England, and their iſſue) reported to have deceaſed without iſſue.

(67) Marie, the ſixt Daughter of King Edward and Queene Eleanor, was borne at Windſor, April 22. in the eight yeare of her Fathers Raigne, 1279. and at ten yeares of age, An. Dom. 1289. September 8. ſhe was made a Nunne in the Monaſtery of Ambreſbery in Wiltſhire, at the inſtance of Queene Eleanor her Grand-mother, who at that time lived there, in the habite of the ſame profeſſion, although her Parents were hardly induced to yeeld their conſents to that courſe.

(68) Elizabeth, the ſeventh Daughter of King Edward and Queene Eleanor, was borne at the Caſtle of Ruthland in Flintſhire, in the thirteenth yeare of her Fethers Raigne, An. 1284. When ſhe was foureteene yeares of age, ſhee was married at London to Iohn the firſt of that name, Earle of Holland, Zeland, and Lord of Freezeland, who dyed within two yeares after without iſſue, and ſhe was re-married to Humfrey Bohun Earle of Hereford and Eſſex, Lord of Brecknocke, and high Conſtable of England, by whom ſhee had iſſue Iohn and Humfrey, both Earles ſucceſſively after their Father; Edward, that dyed in Scotland without iſſue; and William, who being created Earle of Northampton, while his Brothers lived, after their deceaſes, was alſo Earle of Hereford and Eſſex, Lord of Brecknocke, and high Conſtable of England, and father of Earle Humfrey the tenth of that name, and laſt of that houſe, who dyed without iſſue male. Shee had alſo by him two daughters, Eleanor married to Iames Butler Earle of Ormond, and Margaret to Hugh Courtney the firſt, Earle of Devonſhire. Shee was this Earles wife foureteene yeares, lived thirtie three, deceaſed in the ninth yeare of the Raigne of King Edward her Brother, An. Dom. 1316. and was buried in the Church of Saint Iames, at the Abbey of Saffron-Walden in Eſſex.

(69) Beatrice, the eight Daughter of King Edward and Queene Eleanor, bare the name of Beatrice Dutcheſſe of Britannie, her Fathers ſiſter: ſhe is by ſome Genealogiſts mentioned to have lived till ſhee was marriageable, but yet no mention being made of her match, it ſeemeth ſhee died unmarried.

(70) Blanch, the ninth Daughter of King Edward, and the laſt of Queene Eleanor, is ſo mentioned by Thomas Pickering, and ſome others, but not at all by Thomas Elraham a Monke, who made a Pedigree of the Kings of England, but ſhe is by the reſt reported to have dyed in her Child-hood.

(71) Thomas, the fifth ſonne of King Edward, and the firſt of Queene Margaret his ſecond Wife, was borne at a little Village in Yorkeſhire called Brotherton, Iune 1. in the nine and twentieth yeare of his Fathers Raigne, Ann. 1300. he was created Earle of Norfolke, and Earle Marſhall of England, which Earledome the laſt Earle Roger Bigod, leaving no iſſue, left to the diſpoſition of the King. Hee had two Wives, of which the firſt was Alice the daughter of Sir Roger Halyes of Harwich in Suffolke, by whom hee had iſſue Edward, who married Beatrice the daughter of Roger Mortimer the firſt, Earle of March, but hee died before his Father, without Iſſue; and two Daughters, Margaret twice married, firſt to Iohn Lord Segrave, by whom ſhee had Elizabeth Dutcheſſe of Norfolke, Wife of Iohn Lord Mowbray (from whom the Mowbrayes and Howards, Dukes of Norfolke, and Earles Marſhall deſcended;) ſecondly, to Sir Walter Manny a Knight of Cambray, and by him had Anne Wife of Iohn Haſtings the elder, Earle of Pembroke, and Mother of Earle Iohn the younger, that dyed without iſſue; his youngeſt daughter Alice was married to Sir Edward Mountacute, and had by him three daughters, Elizabeth and Ioan married to Walter and William two of the Vffords, and Maud that dyed unmarried. The ſecond wife of this Earle Thomas, was Mary the daughter of William Lord Ros, and widow of Sir Ralph Cobham, who ſurviving him without Iſſue by him, ſhee was married the third time to William Lord Breroſe of Brember.

(72) Edmund

(72) Edmund, his ſixt ſonne by Queene Margaret, was borne at Woodſtocke in Oxfordſhire, Auguſt 5. in the thirtieth yeare of the raigne of his Father, Ann. 1301. Hee was created Earle of Kent, and married Margaret daughter of Iohn, and Sifter and ſole heire of Thomas Lord Wakes of Lydel, in the Countie of Northampton; by her he had Iſſue two ſonnes, and one daughter: Edmund his eldeſt ſonne was Earle of Kent after his Father, and dyed under age without Wife or Iſſue: Iohn the younger was Earle alſo after his Brother, hee married Elizabeth the daughter of the Duke of Gulike, and dyed likewiſe without iſſue; His daughter was Ioan, for her beauty called the faire Maid of Kent, firſt married to William Mountacute Earle of Saliſbury, and from him divorced, and re-married to Sir Thomas Holland, in her right, Earle of Kent, and by her, father of Thomas; and Iohn Holland Duke of Surrey; and Earle of Huntingdon: and laſtly, ſhe was the Wife of Edward of Woodſtocke, the Blacke Prince of Wales, and by him, Mother of King Richard the ſecond. The Earle Edmund was beheaded at Winchester the 19. of March, in the fourth yeare of King Edward his Nephew.

(73) Eleanor, the tenth Daughter and ſixteenth Childe of King Edward, and the laſt Child of Queene Margaret his ſecond wife, was borne at Winchester the ſixt day of May, in the five and thirtieth, and laſt yeare of her Fathers raigne, being the yeare of our Lord 1306. ſhee deceaſed in her Child-hood, and was buried in Saint Peters Church at Weſtminſter, by her Brother, Iohn, Henry, and Alfonſe, under the monument before named, with her picture over it.

Edward II.

EDVVARD THE SECOND, LORD OF IRELAND, AND DVKE OF AQVITAINE, &c. THE FORTIE-EIGHTH MONARCH OF ENGLAND, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND ISSVE.

Monarch 48.

CHAPTER XI.

THAT the Minde is not derived from Parents, certainly the second Edward (called of Caernarvon) might (if nothing else) abundantly shew, being of a most valiant, wise and fortunate father, an unlike sonne; yet not to begin our description of his courses, with prejudice of his person, we will so temper our stile, that by his owne actions sincerely related, rather then by any verball censures the man may be judged. This cannot bee denyed, that whereas from the Conquest till his time, England, though it endured (by Gods just judgements) many bitter, sad and heavie stormes through some headinesse, ambition, or other sicknesses of minde in the Princes thereof, yet had she Men to sway and governe her, and those distempers were as the perturbations incident to vigorous dispositions; whereas under this Edward, who could neither get nor keepe, it seemed to endure the levities of a Child, though his yeares, being about twentie and three, might have exempted him from so great infancy of judgement, as his raigne discovered.

(2) Never came Prince to the crowne with more generall applause then hee: so great hopes of doing well, his victorious Father, Edward of Winchester had left upon him, besides the right of succession, whose last warning and terrible adjurations you have heard: with the * utter contempt and breach whereof, to the destruction of himselfe, and his friends, hee in a manner auspicated his goverenement.

(3) After that Edward had in his best manner provided for the affaires of Scotland, where (at Dumfreez) many of the Scottish * Lords did their homage to him, as they had to his Father; the first taske which he gave of his future behaviours at home, was was a rigorous revenge taken by him upon Walter de Langton Bishop of Chester, Treasurer of England, and principall Executor of the last Will of the deceased King, whose body was not as yet interred, but by the care of the Executors, conveyed with funerall pompe to Waltham, and (after sixteene weekes) to Westminster, where under a plaine monument the same at this present rests. The Bishops crime was a kind of good freedome, which hee used in the late Kings dayes; in [a] gravely reproving the Prince for his misdemeanors, and shortning his waste of coyne, by a frugall moderation; and particularly, [b] for that he had complained of Peirs Gaveston, whereupon ensued Prince Edwards imprisonment, and the others banishment, and therefore comming now to the Crowne, hee arrested the Bishop, by Sir John Felton Constable of the Tower, and imprisoned him in [c] Wallingford Castle, seized upon all his temporall goods and [d] credites, there being not a man in the Realme who durst speake a word on his behalfe, (so great displeasure hee had conceived, seeking utterly to ruine him) till afterward by meanes of the Papall authority, he was restored, and in a faint sort reconciled.

(4) The thing which suited best with his youthfull affections; to wit, the marriage of young Isabel, daughter of Philip the Faire, King of France, hee performed with wonderfull magnificence at Bolein, at which solemnity were present besides all others, The King of France, Father to the Bride; The King of Navarre his sonne; The King of Almaine; The King of Sicill, Mary Queene of France; Margaret Queene Dowager of England, her Daughter; The Queene of Navarre. There was also present (as no Sunne-shine but hath shaddow) [e] Peirs of Gaveston the beloved Minion of this Edward, whose re-entertainement the dying King had so seriously forbidden, whom notwithstanding, together with his owne new Wife, he brought into England.

(5) This fatall favourite of this young King was a Stranger borne, but a [f] Gentlemen, and (in regard of good service done by the Father of Peirs in Gascoigne, [g] brought up (at old King Edwards owne appointment) with this Prince: from whom not to derogate in any point, as if hee had without some appearances of worth and value embraced Peirs, it is certaine (by that which a [h] Knight and servitor of this very King hath left written) that he had a sharpe wit in a comely shape, and briefely, was such an one, as we use to call very fine; Neither yet was hee unhardie in Armes, but of commendable performance, whereof (saith de la More) hee gave proofe against the Scots, (to whom [i] he was alike hatefull as to the English) till he was recalled to satisfie such as (saith their Courtier) did envy his graces, and good successe; but of his Christian or morall vertues (which onely make men truly commendable) there is great silence in Authors, though not of his Vices, whereof wee shall have occasion enough to speake hereafter.

(6) At the Coronation of the King and Queene, (which the Lords would have impeached, had he not promised reasonably to [k] satisfie them about Gaveston) none was [l] neere to Peirs in bravery of apparrell, or delicacie of fashion, which (and for that the King gave him [m] S. Edwards Crowne to carry in that pompe,) greatly encreased the offence of the Lords against him: But he that (having a King to backe him) knew no other meanes to extinguish hatred, but by daring it to the uttermost, spared not afterwards to scoffe and reproach the principall Peeres, [n] calling Thomas Earle of Lancaster, Stage-Player; Aimerie de Valence Earle of Pembroke, Ioseph the Iew, because he was pale and tall; and Guy Earle of Warwicke, the blacke dogge of Ardern: all whom, and others, he at a * Turneament by him proclaimed and holden, handled vilely.

(7) But King Edward was daily more and more possessed with the familiarity of Peirs, who to establish his interest in the unprudent Prince, by sensualities and riotous practises, filled the Court [o] with buffons, parasites, and the like pernicious instruments, drawing Edward from the thought of all great enterprises, in accomplishment of his fathers will, or discharge of his particular dutie, to all sorts of unworthy vanities, and sinfull delights; while himselfe in the meane space revelled in all outward felicity, wasting the riches of the kingdome, or converting them to his private uses. For (fearing belike that the time might come againe to undergoe banishment) he transported much treasure into forraine parts, and much he had to transport; for not onely by the [p] sale of his favour with the King, to which there was no speeding approach but by Gaveston, (who used to peize the gifts, more then the causes) but also by the Kings prodigality, hee had whatsoever could bee powred upon him: for (though it might seeme incredible) he both gave him his jewels and ancestors treasure, and [q] even the Crowne it selfe of his victorious father; not sticking to professe, that (if it lay in him) hee should succeed him in the kingdome.

(8) The Lords (who for reverence of the King sate downe by their private injuries, in hope there would be a season, in which their Soveraign might by timely and sweete admonitions recover the use of himselfe,) not thinking it tolerable to be now any longer silent, (and the rather, left that Peirs, farther abusing his greatnesse, should bring [r] in Forreiners, not onely to the prejudice of the English Lawes and customes, but of their authority also and places,) prevayled so much with the King, in a Parliament holden at London, (where sundry provisions concerning the liberties of the people, and execution of Iustice, were enacted, and by corporall oath confirmed by the King himselfe,) that among them, the decree of Gaveztons perpetuall banishment, was by the King (overcome with a meere necessity for satisfaction of the Kingdome, to whom the said Earle of Cornwall was odious) unwillingly suffered to passe; and the King was thereupon re-gratified with a Subsidie of the twentieth part of the subjects goods. The King also tooke his Oath not to revoke the said Estate of Cornwall from banishment (if it may be called a banishment) wherein [s] he had the Kingdome of Ireland entrusted to his charge, and for the securing thereof against Rebels, was furnished with men and money by the King.

(9) Yet forgetting, that those affections, which ostentimes deserve prayse in a private person, are subject to much construction in a publike, and neglecting both his deceased Fathers so solemne adjurations, and also his owne Oath, as careleste of the sequell, hee calls Earle Peirs home, with whose love hee was most fondly, and most passionately transported, and (as if hee had received some divine benefit) gave him most joyous welcome at the Castle of Flint in North-wales, and [t] bestowed upon him for wife Ioan of Acres, Countesse of Glocester his Sisters daughter, resolving with himselfe to retaine his Gaveston, maugre all his Earles and Barons, or (for the love of him) to put his Crowne and life in qerill when time should serve. In which, whether the King or his favourite shewed lesse discretion, it is not at the first sight easily determinable; it being as unsafe for the one, with so offensive behaviour to affect immoderate shew and use of grace, as for the other, to the injury of his name and Realme to bestow the same.

(10) The contemptibilitie and vanitie of this effeminate argument detaines us longer, then for the qualitie thereof were fitting, did not so much mischiefe issue out of it. For Peirs, (of his owne nature insolent) being thus (above reason, or his owne datings) advanced to alliance with the bloud-royal, was so farre from all amendment, as he rather seemed to strive to out-goe himselfe in his former courses, consuming so much of the Kings treasure and meanes, that hee had [u] not wherewith to defray ordinary charges, charges, or to pay for the necessaries of his court. The young Queene also tooke her selfe not to be a little wronged by this ungracious mans predominancy, and thereof sent her complaints to the King of France her father, which concerned injuries in the highest kinde, as in her bed (the King being drawne by Gaveston to [a] Adultery) and in her honour and [b] maintenance. Whereupon the Peeres of the Land, animated by the King of France, so confidently dealt with Edward, that his Earle now the third time did abjure the Realme: but (the King of France and his enemies making forraine parts unsure for him to abide in) he returned in Christmas, to the generall perturbation of the Kingdome, and to his owne certaine ruine, for that the Barons (his adverfaries) had gotten him banished with this Proviso, [c] that if at any time afterward he were taken in England, he should be forthwith apprehended, and suffer death. But an Angel from Heaven could not seeme more welcome, then this most faithfull friend (as that [d] Courtier cals him) was unto King Edward, who [e] forthwith advanced him to be his principall Secretary.

(11) Vpon report of Gavestons returne, the chiefe Lords, as well Ecclesiasticall as Temporall, (Walter Bishop of Coventree excepted, [f] who allowed the Kings affections towards Gaveston, and procured him to breake the former agreements, which were made and sworne in the Parliament at London,) consulted upon a desperate course of reformation in this point, and made choise of Thomas Earle of Lancaster to be their Leader. This Thomas was son of Edmund Earle of Lancaster, Leicester, and Ferrers, second sonne of Henry the third, King of England, and in right of his wife (after her fathers decease, which hapned about this time) Earle of Lincolne, Salisbury, and besides many other great Lands in Yorkeshire, Cumberland, and Wales) he had the Earledome of [g] Artoys in Picardy, so that without comparison he was the greatest subject of the Kingdome.

(12) The Issue of which combination before we pursue, we may not here in our way overslip a strange alteration both here in England, and in all Christendome, by the universall extinguishment of the Order of the Templars, wrought about this time by the procurement of the French King, who being so gracious with Pope Clement, that formerly [i] hee sent Ambassadors to crave of his Holinesse, with great importunitie, that the bones of his Predecessor Pope Boniface, might be burnt, as being an Heretike; so now also he so farre prevailed with him, that in the Councell at Vienna, this so highly esteemed order, was upon cleare proofe of their generall odious sinnes, and scarse credible impieties, utterly abolished through Christendome. The French King [k] caused 54. of that Order, together with their Great Master, to be burnt at Paris; and though that King hoped to convert all the Land of that Societie to his Sonnes use, whom he intended to make King of Ierusalem; yet the Pope and Councell annexed their possessions to the Order of the Knights Hospitalers, called commonly Knights of the Rhodes. Notwithstanding, in England (where such Papall commands went not alwaies for Lawes) the heires of the Donours, and such as had endowed the Templars here with Lands, entred upon those parts of their ancient Patrimonies after the dissolution of the Order, and, (saith our [l] Courtier) detained them untill not long after, they were by Parliament wholly transferred unto the Knights of the Rhodes, [m] or of Saint John of Ierusalem.

(13) King Edward was now at Yorke, and Earle Thomas, according to that which had beene concluded among the combined Lords, who resolved to try all extremities, rather then any longer to endure Peirs Gaveston, (as being perswaded while that king-bane breathed, peace could neither be maintained in the Realme, nor the King abound in treasure, nor the Queene enjoy his love) sent humble [n] petitions by honourable messengers to their Soveraigne, requesting him to deliver the man into their hands, or to drive him from his company out of England. But the selfe-wild King, preferring the deareneſſe of one stranger before the love of the whole Realme, would not condiscend.

(14) Afterward, Peirs (whom [p] the Earles pursued with an Army) being * entrusted for his safeguard to Aimerie de Valence Earle of Pembroke, was left by him but one night at a Village or Mannour called Dathington betweene Oxford and Warwicke, (being a place neither [q] farre enough off, nor strong enough) pretending to have convayed him on the next day to the Castle of Wallingford, the said Aimery in the meane space departing to lodge with his Countesse, who lay hard by: but, the said Aimery conniving thereat (as our [r] Courtier chargeth him, who also writes, that he tooke a solemne Oath before the King to doe his best to safe conduct Gaveston, the King purposing in the meane time to labour his peace with the Lords [s] upon any conditions) Guy Earle of Warwicke with his people, surprized him the same night, and tooke him to his Castle of Warwicke, where in a place called Blackblow (afterward [t] Gavelhead) his head was stricken off, at the Commandement [u] and in the presence of the Earles of Lancaster, Warwicke, and Hereford, [x] as of one that had beene a subverter of the Lawes, and an open Traytour to the Kingdome. In which bold attempt, themselves (who yet pretended so much standing for the liberties of the Land,) did most unadvisedly infringe a Capitall branch of the same Franchises, in putting to death an Earle, and so deare a friend of the Kings, [y] without any judiciall proceeding by tryall of his Peeres, which caused a lasting hatred betwixt the King and his Nobles.

(15) There wanted nothing now to King Edward but present meanes to revenge the bloud of his friend, or rather of his halfe-selfe, the lacke whereof did encrease the sorrow he tooke for his death, which being well knowne to the Lords, they resolved not to lay downe Armes, till they had provided for their security, and the performance of all such points, as concerned the temperament of the Regall power, that (under colour thereof) the Nobles themselves might finger some part of the Soveraigne government. The King was then at London, and the Lords at Dunstaple; but by the continuall inter-dealings of the Prelates, and of Gilbert Earle of Glocester, who stood neutrall, the kindling displeasures were for the present allayed, upon condition that the Lords should restore to the King all such things, once belonging to Peirs Gaveston, as they had taken at Newcastle, which they accordingly did.

(16) King Edward nevertheleſſe, as if his Soule were over-cast with some blacke Cloud, continued mourning, till it pleased GOD to enlighten the World with the birth of a young Prince, whose noble Acts did afterward redeeme all the blemishes wherewith his Fathers infelicities had darkned the brightneſſe of the English name, and at this present cleared the minde of the sorrowfull King his Father: for [z] upon Saint Brices day, Isabel his Queene brought forth her first Sonne at Windsor, which caused great rejoycing through the Kingdome. Her French kindred and friends (which were there in good numbers of either sex) and among them as chiefe, the Queenes owne brother, Lewis the French Kings sonne, would have had the Infant at his Baptisme named Lewis, but the English Lords would * not permit, who therefore was after his Fathers and Grand-fathers name, called Edward. This was hee who afterward rayſed the honour of English Chevalry to so high a point, by his famous victories in France and elsewhere.

(17) The evill-will which the King bare in his minde against the Barons for their over-ruling his affections, and the death of Gaveston, by sundry bad offices and sycophancies of the * French at Windsor, was rubd so hard upon, that it grew raw against before it was halfe-healed. Therefore in a Parliament at London, the King sharpely charged those presumptuous presumptuous Lords with their contempt against him in the spoyles they had committed at Newcastle, and (which most afflicted his languishing spirit) in taking, and wickedly killing Peirs Gaveston. To all which, they stoutly answered, * that they had not offended in any point, but deserved his royall favour, for that they had not gathered force against him, but against the publike enemy of the Realme, &c. Howbeit, to prevent the feared mischiefe of civill Armes, by the working of the young Queene, of the Prelates, and Earle of Glocester, the Lords in open Court at Westminster humbled themselves to the King, praying grace; and the King granted to such of them, as would desire the same, his gracious pardon. The whole house of Parliament seeing the Kings wants, of their owne accord granted a Fifteenth; and all parts hereupon returned with joy and peace, but not long after the Lord Guy de Beuchampe Earle of Warwicke, who in this Parliament was appointed to bee of Privy-Councell with the King, deceased, being (as by the Barons wel-willers * it was said) impoysoned by such of the Kings secret friends, as did maligne him.

(18) The mischievous effects of the Kings former mis-governement, began now most perilously to discover themselves. For the Scots, his neighbours, who could not bee ignorant of all such griefes and maladies as festred in the heart and entrals of England, had long since made their timely use thereof, adhering so to the undaunted Bruce, that by degrees hee had gotten a great strength, and was againe publikely received, and obeyed for King of Scotland, from most places whereof hee * drave the English, and (in contempt of Edward) committed great spoyle, by slaughter of People, burning of Townes in Northumberland, and other Acts of Hostility. The principall charge of Scotland for King Edward, had beene entrusted to the Lord John Comin a Scot, Earle of Bucquhan, whom * King Robert had vanquished in battle, and was now (while Edward sate bewitched with most unworthy languishments) growne potent, sending his brother Edward Bruce to besiege the Castle of Striveling, which was in the hands of the English.

An. Dom. 1314.

(19) The King of England awakened out of his slumbers with these Alarums, marched thereupon with a very great Army toward the said Castle. It pleaseth Hector Boetius (putting off, as it were, the Historian) to report marvellous things of the numbers of Souldiers which came with King Edward in this journey; for (if he say true) there were not fewer then one hundreth and fifty thousand horse-men, and as many thousand foot-men, and that wee may not suspect the multitude to bee farre greater then either the cause required, or the Realme of England could well afford, he informeth us, that besides the English there were in his ayde at this time, Hollanders, Zelanders, Brabanders, Flemings, Picards, Boloners, Gascoignes, Normans, with much people of many other Regions; and that besides these three hundreth thousand men of warre, there were infinite families with their women, children, servants, and houshold stuffe: but because other Writers doe ingeniously grant, and containe probable matter enough for the honor of the Scottish Nation in this journey, we will as neere as we can, (being things to us neither up nor downe, in regard of the long time since these hostilities hapned,) truly and freely, thoug briefely, informe our selves hereof.

(20) The Earles of Lancaster, Warren, Warwicke, and Arundel (the greatest Peeres of the land) * refused to attend their King in this service, for that hee had delayed to ratifie the points of their desired liberties, and provisions for the pretended better governement of England, by himselfe so often consented unto. In which as their loyall affection cannot bee much admired; so it is certaine, that King Edward hereby undertooke that voyage with farre the lesse force either of men or counsell. Nevertheless his hoast was great enough (if numbers did sway in such affaires, more then religion, discipline, and valour,) to have effected more then it selfe did suffer. But King Edward and his people rather seemed to goe toward a wedding, or a triumph, then to a Battle, * adorning themselves with all forts of riches, gold, silver, and the like toyes, in a kind of wanton manner, correspondent to the humour of the Prince whom they followed.

(21) In this journey it was made manifest, what true and sober valiancy could effect, against light bravery and insolency. King Robert lodged with his forces (being inferiour in numbers to the English) not farre off, where was nothing but a religious, * devout, and modest care, quickned (after manifold calamities) with a most noble desire to recover the liberty of their Country, and to settle the same, into the hope whereof they were the rather erected by a fresh victory, which they had obtained that day upon certaine of the English * horsemen. King Edward on the contrary part nothing esteeming so sleight a prefage, resolved upon the very next being Midsommer, or Saint Iohn Baptists day) to take a terrible revenge upon the Scots: but how to effect the same the care was not excessive; for in his Campe, * Waſtále, and Drinke-haile were thundred extraordinarily, as accounting themselves sure of the victory: which kinde of impious selfe-trust, if God Almighty did not sometime scourge with just and terrible confusions, what out-rages would not bee executed?

(22) Farre otherwise the Bruces Army; which by his commandement spent * the evening in making humble confession of their sinnes, that they might (saith our Author) be ready on the morrow to receive the blessed Sacrament, as accordingly they did: Moreover, to leave nothing undone which might advance their cause; the Scots had digged before their Battalions, certaine * Trenches or Dikes * three foote deepe, and three foote broad, which (having fixed * sharpe stakes in them with their points upward) they covered so with * hurdles, that foote-men treading warily) might passe, but not troupes of Horse. Next to Gods anger against the English, (whom courtly Pride and Sloth had now effeminated) this stratageme was the cause of their ruine: for whereas they repofed much upon their Cavallery, in these Pit-falls, the fury of their charge was intercepted and broken, the riders being miserably slaine by the Scots, whom King Robert marching formost on foote, had presented most couragiously to the enemy.

(23) The King of England not altogether careleſſe, neither yet by his care able to doe much (as one whom God was not well pleased with) had ordered his battels with some-advice, but upon the dismall and unexpected discomfiture of his Horse in those mischievous holes or ditches, was enforced, (after some troubled resistance) to leave to the Scots the greatest victory that ever they had before or after. * Hardly could King Edward be drawne to flye: the courage which it became such a Monarch to have then first discloſing it selfe, till by his friends he was enforced to seeke his preservation by that more necessary then noble meanes, and with him (besides others) the Lord Hugh Spencer (whom our * Courtier cals, A faint-hearted Kite) betooke himselfe to like remedy.

(24) All things prooved unfortunate to the English in this journey, for when they perceived their Cavallery thus miserably overthrown in the ditches, they shot their Arrowes compasse, with purpose to kill or gall such Scots as came to the execution, but did them little or no harme, as they who were armed in the fore-parts, and in stead of that, * flew their friends, whose backes being toward them were unarmed.

(25) The losse fell much upon the Nobleſt, for there were slaine in this battle, * Gilbert Earle of Glocester (a man of singular valour and wisdome) the Lord Robert

Robert de Clifford, and besides other Lords, about * seven hundreth Knights, Esquires, and men of Armories. Of the rest the slaughter could not bee but great, though much the lesse, in regard the Scots fought on foote. Hector saith, that there were not slaine fewer then fiftie thousand English, no Writer else, that hitherto we can meete with, exceedes the fifth part of that number; the Riches gotten by spoyles and ransomes of the English, were doubtlesse very great. Among the number of Prisoners, the principall was Humfrey de Bohun Earle of Hereford, but recovered afterward by exchange for King Roberts Wife, who all this while was detained in England. This battell was fought at Banocksbourne neere Striveling in Scotland.

(26) From this over-throw King Edward escaping to Berwicke, King Robert (who to his great glory, as having himselfe been trayned up among the English, used such as were taken Prisoners with singular * humanity) sent thither to him the bodies of the Earle of Glofter, & Lord Clifford, that they might receive honourable interrement among their owne friends. But Edward (under whose unfortunate leading the English name sustayned so great dishonour and dammage) with-drew to Yorke, resolving (therein only Prince-like) to assemble new force, and either to be revenged, or to die. But * all enterprises and attempts of that nature mis-carried, for above twelve yeeres after; insomuch that greate feare raigned among the Northerne English, who lay open to the first brunts and violences of the Scots, over whom many faire dayes shone. And to augment the calamities of the North, many of the dissoyall English * conspired with the enemy, and joyntly spoyled the West parts of Northumberland, nothing being secure, but that which wals defended.

(27) God, to humble the English, who through long prosperities had forgotten both themselves and him, drew not backe his heavy hand so; for seldome hath so terrible a famine beene heard of here, as succeeded to this over-throw: so that for moderation of prices, a Parliament was assembled at London: but (saith Walsingham) as if God had beene displeased at the said rates (which not long after were repealed) things grew scarser day by day: and the dearth was generally such, that upon Saint Laurences Eve, there was scarcely bread to bee gotten for sustentation of the Kings owne Family. This famine which lasted about two yeares, was accompanied with much mortality of people.

(28) But neither the dishonors taken in Scotland, nor innumerable afflictions and discontentments at home, made Edward suspend the celebration of his Gavestons Funerals; whose Body with great pompe hee caused to bee transferred from the place of his former buriall, (which was among the Fryers Preachers at Oxford) to Kings-Langley in Hertfordshire, where hee in person, with the Arch-bishop of Canterbourie, foure Bishops, many Abbots, and principall Church men, did honour the exequies, but few were present of the Nobility, whose great stomackes would not give them leave to attend. Somewhat also to sweeten these generall acerbities, Lewelin Bren and his two sonnes, were brought up prisoners to London, having burnt many Townes upon the Marches, and committed some murthers with their Welsh adherents.

(27) Meane-while the state of the Kingdome was miserable, there being no love betwixt the King and the Peeres, nor any great * care in him, or them, of the common affaires; nevertheless they assembled at a Parliament in London, where no great matter was concluded: for the famine and pestilence encreased. The famine was growne so terrible, that horse, dogges, yea men and children, were stolne for food, and (which is horrible to thinke) the Theeves newly brought into the Goales, were torne in peeces and eaten presently halfe alive, by such as had beene longer there. In London it was proclaimed, that

* Tho. Walsingh.

Corne should be converted to Brewers uses, which Act the King (mooved with compassion toward his Nation) imitating, caused to bee executed through all the Kingdome; otherwise (saith Walsingham) the greater part of the people had dyed with penury of bread. The bloudy flux or dysentery, caused through raw and corrupt humours, engendred by evill meate and dyet, raged every where, and together with other maladies brought such multitudes of the poorer sort to their end, that the living could scarce suffice to bury the dead.

(30) The King was now in so great dislike and distrust with the Lords and Barons, that they would not appeare at Clarendon, where hee held a great Councell. To augment this fatall aversion, a certaine Knight belonging to John Earle Warren, stole away from Castesord in Dorsetshire, the Wife of Thomas Earle of Lancaster (chiefe of the Lords faction) not without the Kings consent (as it was said) and brought her to the said Earle Warrens Castle at Rigate, with great pompe, and in despight of the Earle; whom one Richard de Saint Maurice, a wretched, lame, and bunch-backt Dwarfe challenged for Wife, pretending that he was formerly contracted, and had lyen with her, which she (the greatest and noblest Inheritrix of her time) did openly confesse, to her immortall infamy, incurring alas (saith Walsingham) the publike note of a most filthy Strumpet. This deformed Elfe (having mighty Seconds) durst hereupon claime the Earledomes of Lincolne and Salisbury as in her right, and in the meane time, the name and honor of Thomas the great Earle was baffold, as it were, by a light and wicked woman.

An. Dom. 1317.

(31) The parts of England beyond Humber, were now more and more afflicted; for such as till then had opposed themselves against the Scots in defence of the Countrey, perceiving all things left at large, in stead of Protectors became Tyrants, * saith our Authour; of defenders, destroyers; and of valiant Champions, treacherous Chapmen; so that as betweene the hammer and the anvile, the Scots upon the one side, and these false English on the other, all was lamentable, and brought in a manner to nothing: and this face of things continued there about foure yeeres.

* Tho. Walsing.

(32) Neither did the King seeme to have any will or power to releeve the common calamities, but rather to convert his whole both wits and forces upon revenges against the Lords, who under pretence of their extorted provisions, manifestly withdrew their loves, service and duties from him: wherefore feeling himselfe thus weake and disfurnished, hee besought the spirituall assistance of Pope John the two and twentieth; who thereupon sent certaine Cardinals to set all things in quiet without bloudshed. Betweene the King and the Earle of Lancaster, they established a peace, who, in a * certaine plaine neere Leicester met, embraced and kissed each other; but when they could not worke the like with the Scots, they put that Country under Interdict.

The Spensers banished.

(33) For that (as it the manner of prosperity) after the victory at Banockbourne, which clearely got them Scotland, did begin to bethinke themselves of gaining new Empire in Ireland. Thither Edward Bruce, brother of King Robert, had passed with an Army, procuring * himselfe to be crowned King thereof, by favour of some of the Irish Nobility, whom nevertheless of three yeeres from his first entrance, the English under the conduct of the Archbishop of Armagh, and of John Lord Brinningham Iusticiar of Ireland, valiantly encountred, where together with his late usurped Kingdome, hee lost his life. There were slaine in that battell many honourable Scots, besides the new King Edward, and above * five thousand others: his head was cut off * at Dundalke (saith Walsingham) but Hector Boetius writes that hee was slaine in the battle it selfe. (34) But King Robert (as a most expert and vigilant Prince) did not suffer this joy to continue long to the English; for by practice with one * Peter Spalding, to whom King Edward had entrusted the keeping of Berwicke, hee recovered it from the English, saith * Harding, By treaty, with Peace, Spalding, and treason; after it had remained twentie yeeres in their possession; which when King Edward thought to have wonne againe, the Scots diverted him from the siege, with incursions and slaughters of his people in other parts of England, not fayling much of surprising the Queene in a Village not farre from Yorke, where shee sojourned during the siege at Berwicke; the plot being laid, and drawne betweene the Scots and some perfidious English, whom King Robert had moneyed for that purpose. But Spalding after the treason done, had the reward of a * Traytour, for King Robert put him to death.

* John Stow. Harding. c. 172.

(35) To give some breathings after these so manifold troubles, a truce was agreed upon and confirmed betweene the two Kings of England and of Scotland, for the space of two yeeres, which brought forth confusion and not refreshment. For thus it hapned; The King upon the commendation of the * Lords themselves, had made Hugh de Spenser Lord Chamberlaine, who being at the least of equall insolence, vices, and ambition to Gaveston, so wrought that hee succeeded in short time to all the graces of familiaritie and power which ever Gaveston enjoyed, as in like sort to all his hatred and envy. Hugh his father, an ancient Knight, the better to strengthen his Sonnes courses, was likewise employed, and grew in speciall favour with the King, who afterward also created him Earle of Winchester: but the Father in manners unlike to the Sonne, was ruined rather by a naturall tenderneſſe, then any malicious will. The sonne, as hee was of shape most lovely, so the very spirit it selfe of pride, and rapine, carried him to all sorts of intolerable behaviours and oppressions, that Gaveston might with good reason seeme to be wished for againe. Against these two, who wholly swayed the unfortunate King, Thomas Earle of Lancaster, and in a manner all the Barons of the Kingdome, (who meant the King should love none but with their leave, did swell with such impatience, that (not contented with the waft of their lands) they never rested till (by the terrour of civill Armes) those two Favourites (father and sonne) were banished; they thus revenging under publique pretexts both publique injuries and * their owne.

(36) In all contentions which hapned betweene the King and his Lords, Queene Isabel had ever hitherto beene a maker of Peace, doing therein worthy offices, but the evill starres of the Earles of Lancaster and Hereford would not suffer her to continue any longer so: for the Queene being denyed lodging one night at the Castle of Leedes in Kent, which belonged to the Lord of Badlesmere (one of the Earles faction) thee with-drew her good conceit; and was an author to the King of presently revenging that dishonour, who upon her complaint, came in person with many thousand Souldiers before the Castle, tooke the * Captaine, and put both him and all the men therein to shamefull death. Moreover, longing to bee righted against the Lords for their late insolencies, marched on to Circester, taking many Castles, and besieging others: The Lords (who little suspected any such sudden assaults) providing in the meane time for their defence.

* Hollingsh. pag. 331. col. 2.

(37) Thither repaired to him (at his commandement) Hugh Spenser the sonne, who had hovered upon the Sea, expecting from thence the successe of things upon the Land. The Lords, who had false from their, Soveraignes good conceit, and wanting now their wonted Mediatrix the Queene, lay open to all the mischiefe which enemies could worke them by the King, who (as taking his Regall power and authoritie to be in danger) resolved wisely and manfully, to die in the quarrell, or to bring the Lords to be at his commandement. Meane time the judgement given against the Spensers was reversed as erroneous, and their revocation decreed at London by the * Archbishop of Canterbury and his Suffragans.

(38) The Lords, not all of a like temper, began to misdoubt, and many of them forsooke their Chiefe, (the Earle of Lancaster) and rendred themselves to the King, or were apprehended; among which were the two Roger Mortimers, who were committed to the Tower of London, and others to Wallingford Castle. The faction weakened by this defection, made head in the North, under the Earle of Lancaster, who now was to fight for his life. Thither the King marcheth, and with the onely shew of his Armie, made the Earle to flie from Burton upon Trent, whose forces in their retreat or flight behaved themselves outragiously.

(39) But Gods heavie displeasure, and the Arme of the Kings power left them not so: for at Burrowbrigge, Humfrey de Bohun was slaine by a Welshman, who thrust him into the body with a Speare from under the Bridge; and the Earle of Lancaster himselfe with other principall men, Barons and Knights, to the number of above * foureſcore and ten were taken prisoners, by a man of small fortunes, Andrew de Herckley Captaine of the Citie of Carleil, and Sir Simon Ward, * Captaine of Yorke, who with great forces out of those parts, stopt their farther passage at Burrowbrigge, as the Kings forces tooke all safegard from them behind.

(42) As for the said Thomas Earle of Lancaster, there are so many reasons why hee cannot reasonably be judged either a good subject or a good man, that we may worthily wonder why some at that time should repute him a Saint. forts, which as Walsingham forgets not to relate, ſo thinks he that the like was worthily uſed toward that Earle himſelfe, who, when hee was brought priſoner to Pontfract (his own Caſtle, but then ſurrendred) the whole multitude derided, and called him in ſcorne King Arthur: by which name hee was deſigned (as * ſome write) in the Scottiſh Cypher intercepted, proving a conſpiracy with Scots: but the very ſhop, where his and the other Barons originall Treaſons were forged, was the Parliament-houſe, wherein from time to time, they forced on the King preſumptuous and treaſonous Ordinations, whereby the Peeres challenged, * not onely to reforme the Kings houſe and Councell, and to place and diſplace all great Officers, at their pleaſure, but even a joynt intereſt in the Regiment of the Kingdome, together with the King, which William Inge (a Iudge of the Common Law) with other like ſticklers, trayterouſly perſwaded them to be according to Law.

(43) Of his ill-deſervings toward the Common-Weale (who for the good thereof could not diſgeſt any indignity) let this bee a kinde of demonſtration: for when king Edward having by ſtrait ſiege brought Berwicke neere to termes of yeelding, chanced once to breake forth (after his vaine manner) into theſe words, The Lord Hugh Spencer ſhall bee Captaine of the Caſtle, when it is taken: the Earle forthwith with others of his faction abandoned the ſervice: by reaſon of which departure, it was thought that Berwicke was not as then obtained, * and that the enemy thereby had great advantage in all their attempts. The names of ſuch Barons (beſides Bannerets, and ſome few others of ſpeciall note) as periſhed by hatchet and halter for this buſineſſe, as out of ſo great variety of Writers we could now gather them were;

Never did Engliſh earth at one time drinke ſo much bloud of her Nobles in ſo vile manner ſhed as at this, which, whatſoever could bee pretended (as doubteleſſe their offence was capitall) yet all was taken to be done as in the quarrell of the Spenſers onely, nor was it unrevenged, as will appeare: in the meane ſpace their enemies not contented with their bloud, procured alſo the * confiſcation of their eſtates and inheritances.

(44) King Edward thinking that this exploit had made him terrible as well to the Scots, as it had done to the Engliſh, marcheth with a mighty hoaſt into Scotland, from whence not long after (for want of victuals) he was compelled to returne, without the honour of any atchievement, and being * upon his returne, was ſodainely by Scots aſſailed in the night, very narrowly eſcaping in his owne perſon, and with a few ſaved himſelfe by flight, leaving his * treaſure and furniture for pillage, and ſo came forrowfull to Yorke. Iohn de Britaine Earle of Richmond, was taken priſoner by the enemy, and the reſt of the Country defaced, with deſtructions as farre as to the wals of that City.

(45) Thus * paſſed this yeere, to the Engliſh full of ſoſſe, reproach, and lamentation, by reaſon of their inteſtine diſcord and the ſhambles of their Nobles; to the King infamous, and hatefull alſo for his unfortunate journey into the Northerne parts, &c. But theſe bloudy and tempeſtuous winds blew profit to ſome; for * during the ſpace of about fiue yeares after, the fortune of the Spenſers hugely encreaſed, and the Queenes decreaſed, who (for her relenting toward the Lords, and expreſſing ſome diſlikes of theſe rankely-growing weeds) was growne to beare a ſhare in the perſecution. And that theſe with ſuch like violent men working upon the Kings inclination, were the onely Authors of that ſharpe revenge taken upon the Lords, for their particular and inglorious enrichment (for what elſe can we call the ſame, ſince that they betraide thereby their Soveraignes Crowne and Life, to ſpeedy deſtruction?) let it by this in part appeare, and move the World the rather to pitty the ſeduced.

(46) Among them who were condemned for riſing with the Earle of Lancaſter, there was one of a meane Family, for whoſe life neverthelеſſe, becauſe hee had once ſerved in Court, and was pleaſing to ſome of the Grands, or Potent favourites therein, many interceded, and preſſed the King ſo farre on his behalfe, that he brake out into theſe * moſt vehement words, A plague upon you, for curſed whiſperers, malicious backe-biters, wicked counſellors, entreat you ſo for the life of a moſt notorious knave, who would not ſpeake one word for the life of my neere Kinſman, that moſt noble Knight Earle Thomas : Had hee loved, mee and our whole Realme ſhould have had ſpeciall need and uſe of him. This fellow the longer he lives, the more villanies he will commit, as having already filled my Kingdome with his deſperate outrages. By the Soule of God he ſhall therefore dye the death he hath deſerved.

(47) By this then it is evident, that theſe tragedies againſt the Lords were exploired by others; in which it is plaine that the King (otherwiſe ſo devoute to God, ſo noble and ſo full of naturall good propenſions) was fatally over-wrought by wicked counſell; though hee therein bee inexcuſable, for good nature (as we call it) cannot ſatisfie for publique errours. But the condemned man was forthwith put to death accordingly; the King being moſt highly offended, that none had entreated him on the Earles behalfe, whom (ſaith Walſingham) he did inwardly love. Neverthelеſſe, he had not long before created the elder Spenſer Earle of Wincheſter, and deckt the plume of his fortunes with a top-feather taken out of the ſaid late Earle of Lancaſters eſtate, that is to ſay, with the Caſtle and honour of * Donington, parcell of the Earledome of Lincolne. Having thus farre ſhewed the originall of the miſchiefe, we will haſten now to the laſt Act or Cataſtrophe of our Edwards Tragedy, onely we will firſt remember ſome intercurring matters.

(48) You have heard before, how that the Cardinals ſeat from the Pope, had (in favour of the Engliſh) put Scotland under Interdict, whereſore King Robert now at laſt diſpatched the Biſhop of Glaſcow, and Thomas Randolfe Earle of Murrey to Rome, for obtaining releaſe and abſolution, but they returned without effecting it. Whereupon King Robert moved to have a truce for thirteene yeeres, which King Edward accordingly granted, and the Pope * then abſolved the Scots. The matters of Scotland ſeemed thus to be ſufficiently provided for during that time, and the rather for that ſomewhat before the motion for truce, the King had cauſed the newly created Earle of Carleil, Andrew de Herkley, to bee degraded, hanged, drawne and quartered for Treaſon, which hee was convinced to have entred into with the Scots, Scots, upon * whom he had before done ſpeciall ſervices, as having for that cauſe the Caſtle and City of Carleil committed to his governement. The truce with Scotland being thus confirmed, the King makes his progreſſe through the * Counties of Yorke and Lancaſter, and the Marches of Wales, from whence the late ſeditious had their nouriſhments, taking wiſe and carefull courſes for miniſtration of Iuſtice there, and prevention of like inconveniences, by puniſhing their Authors ſeverely. And Iuſtices * voyd of all corruption, were apointed elſe-where.

(49) In the meane ſpace, the new King of France Charles the fifth, a moſt earneſt enemy to the Engliſh mens poſſeſſions there, ſought occaſions of quarrell with King Edward, who while he conſulted at home how to order that affaire, the yong L. Roger Mortimer, one whom the Divell (ſaith our * Courtier) reſerved to kindle new diſtention with, and to ſtirre up a moſt miſerable civill warre, having corrupted his Keepers, or (as ſome others write) having potioned them with * a ſleepy drinke, eſcaped out of the Tower of London, getting over clearely without any empeachment into France.

(50) The Spencers, both father and ſonne, the one thus created Earle of Wincheſter, and the other Earle of Glouceſter, aſpiring to the fulneſſe of command, and deſirous to leave nothing in their eye, which might ſtumble their ſway with the King, failed not to beget immortall enmities both againſt themſelves and the King. The Queene tooke their carriage ſo heinouſly, becauſe (beſides other things) they had abridged her meanes of maintenance, (while themſelves abounded in all riches and magnificence) as ſhee complayned; * That the daughter and ſole heire of the King of France was married to a gripple miſer, and that being promiſed to bee a Queene, ſhee was become no better then a waiting woman, living upon a penſion from the Spencers.

(51) Thus was the matter, and as it were, the Embrion, of their common deſtruction laid, and begun in the impotencie of a womans will, to helpe out the which with ſhrewd drifts and directions, they encreaſe her ſide with Adam Biſhop of Hereford, by ſtripping him out of all his Temporalties as a Traytour, for that he had ſupported the Mortimers in the Barons quarrell. This Adam (ſaith our Knight) was a man of moſt ſubtil wit, and in all wordly pollicie profound, daring to doe great things, and factious withall, who for this cauſe conceiving deepeſt hate, and therefore eaſily growing deare to the Queene, made a great ſecret party. To which Henrie Burwaſh Biſhop of Lincolne, who (for like cauſes) had beene kept from his temporalties (about two yeeres) joyned himſelfe. Neither would the Spenſers avarice ſuffer them to weaken the multitudes of their enmies, for they ſold the Kings gracious favour to ſuch as had beene in the Barons quarrell, at ſo great rates, that by graunting away lands and Manours to the ſaid Lords Spencers for their pardons, &c. very many of the Nobles were impoveriſhed. To bee ſhort, the royall power being in the hands of the Spencers, and Roger Baldock Chancellour, or of their Creatures and Pavourites; this other faction had the generall diſcontentments of the Realme to worke upon for their advantage.

(52) The King thus guiding himſelfe, and having ſent his Brother Edmund Earle of Kent (upon notice of the firſt troubles) with Forces into Gaſcoigne, who gave ſome little ſtay for a time to the French proceedings, till they might otherwiſe bee provided for, it came to this poynt at laſt: that whereas the King had a purpoſe to have gone in perſon into France, the Spenſers, who were afraid to be ſevered from his perſon, the onely reverence whereof they knew to be their ſafegard, and yet not daring to attend him thither, or ſtay behinde, * perſwaded the King, contrary to the mindes of all the reſt, that the Queene (who ſought it) ſhould goe and negociate her husbands affaire in France. Shee did ſo; and whereas before her departure, things were in great extremity betweene the two Nations, inſomuch that all the French were baniſhed out of England, not they who were attendant on the Queene her ſelfe in neereſt place being ſpared, all matters by her negotiation and ſuite were quieted, upon condition that King Edward ſhould give to his Son Edward of Windſor (afterward King) the Dutchy of Aquitaine, and Earledome of Pontine, for which the King of France was pleaſed to accept his faid young Nephewes homage.

(53) This was done, and the Prince ſent over for that purpoſe to his mother, to the utter undoing of the King his Father, and of all his favourites. For the heire of England being in forraine parts, among the contrary faction, all the conſultation was (under colour of ruining the Spenſers,) to accompliſh farther matters. The Prince, having (at Boys de vincens) done his homage for that Dutchie and Countie to his uncle Charles de Valois King of France, was (as alſo the Queene his mother) ſent for backe by the King about Michaelmas; but the Queenes conſpiracy being not yet ripe, ſhe deferred to obay, detaining her ſonne ſtill.

(54) There went over with the young Prince, among many others, Walter Stapleton, Biſhop of Exceſter, who perceiving into what familiarity the Lord Roger Mortimer was growne with the Queene, which * ſeemed greater then either ſtood with her honour or duetie, and feeing both him and other of the Kings enemies, and fugitives, enjoy that privacie in counſell, which was aſſigned to himſelfe, who was now (as being none of theirs) * excluded, returned ſecretly (though unſent-for) into England, faithfully (as it became a good man) declaring his knowledge.

(55) The King now clearely beholding his error, in his dangers, * ſolicited the King of France to ſend home his wife and ſonne, but that not ſucceeding, he cauſed them * openly in London to bee proclaymed enemies of the Kingdome, baniſhing them with all their adherents out of the ſame. For his more aſſurance alſo hee cauſed the Ports to bee moſt narrowly watcht. Finally, to draw all his dangers to a ſhort diſpatch, there was (as was ſuppoſed) a plot laide for * making away the Queene and Prince, but Gods will was to fruſtrate it.

(56) The Queen, on the other ſide, fearing that the * Spenſers Gold had laide traines to blow her whole proceedings up in France, kept her ſelfe out of the way, till with the Prince, the Lord Roger Mortimer, and other their adherents, they were ſafely gotten into Henault. There might bee ſome other reaſon alſo, and neceſſary, to moue Queene Iſabel to depart out of France, beſide the doubt of that kinde of corruption in the Peeres thereof: as to turne off a warre from thence being her native Countrey, which for her cauſe was afflicted in the Sea-ſtrengths thereof, for Sir Iohn Oxurwin, Sir Nicholas Kirkeel, and Sir Iohn de Felton, with the Navy of the Ports, and of other places, had by commiſſion from the King ſo ſcowred the narrow Seas, that they within a ſhort time brought into England, as lawfull prize * an hundreth and twenty Norman Ships or Veſſels. Moreover, whereas thoſe two Biſhops which the Pope had ſent, were returned forrowfull out of England, not onely without doing any good on her behalfe, but alſo without hope of doing any, ſhe might eaſily be perſwaded that the ſword moſt doe it, or nothing.

(57) But in Henault ſhe found moſt honourable and loving welcome of the Earle, where, therefore (without the conſent or adviſe of the Peeres of England) ſhee enſured (ſaith our * Author) that delight and terrour of the whole World, her ſonne, being then about fourteene yeeres old, to Philippa the faid Earles daughter, and with the money of her portion waged ſouldiers out of Henault, and Germanie, to tranſport

* Harding. cap. 176.

The Kings proceedings after the Queenes arrivall.

(58) Her arrivall being reported to the King (who was, poore Prince, not onely deſtitute of friends and meanes, but as it ſeemes, of courage, and counſell alſo) it did not at firſt ſeeme credible. The truth appearing, he demaunded aſſiſtance of the City of London, whoſe anſwere was, That they would honor with all duty, the King, the Queene, and Prince, but would ſhut their gates againſt forreiners, and traytors to the Realme, and with all their powers withſtand them. In this anſwere the King and his few friends repoſing no aſſurance, hee committed an errour worſe then that former of ſending his ſonne out of England, by retiring himſelfe into the Weſt, with his inſeparable favourites the Spenſers, Baldocke and others there, to raiſe a force againſt the Queene: but before hee went, hee left his other ſonne, the Lord Iohn (called of Eltham) in the Tower of London, with the Counteſſe of Glouceſter, the Kings Neece, Wife to the younger Spenſer Earle of Glouceſter, committing the Tower it ſelfe to Sir Iohn de Weſton, who was well provided of men and victuals. Hee commanded all men alſo to deſtroy and kill the Queenes partakers, none excepted but her ſelfe, her ſonne, and Edmund Earle of Kent, the Kings brother by the Father, and that none, upon paine of death, and loſſe of all that they might loſe, ſhould aid or aſſiſt them: and that he ſhould have a thouſand pound, who did bring the Lord Mortimers head. Thus tooke he his laſt leave of London, and in a manner alſo of his Rule or Domination.

(59) On the contrary part, there repaired to the Queene the Earle Marſhall, and Henry Earle of Leiceſter, the Biſhops of Lincolne, Hereford, Ely, and of Barons, Knights, and armed Souldiers no ſmall multitude, whom as well to retaine, as to draw more, letters and rumours flew about, declaring (though falſly) that the King of France had in the ayde of his Siſter ſent ſo many Dukes, Earles, and others, that England could ſcarſe ſuffice to feede them. This, for ſuch whom the opinion of warlike ſtrength would winne: but thoſe whom ſhew of Religion might move, it was as cunningly, and as falſly ſpread, that the Pope had excommunicated all ſuch as did take armes againſt the Queene, and (the more to countenance the fiction) that two Cardinals imployed about the premiſſes, were ſeene in the Queens Campe. Then was it proclaymed, that the cauſes of her comming were to deliver the Realme from the miſ-leaders of the King, which were named to bee the Spenſers, Roger Baldocke Biſhop of Norwich, Lord Chancellor, and their Fautors; all others to bee ſafe, and that nothing ſhould bee taken from any other ſubject without true payment; but finally, that he who brought the younger Spenſers head ſhould have two thouſand pounds. Theſe things firſt thus ordered, the Queene with her ſonne and whole power purſues the King, (as it had beene agreed by the Councell of Warre) taking firſt her way to Oxford: where the * whole Vniverſitie being called together, in the preſence of the Queene, the Prince, Roger Mortimer, and the reſt of that troupe, the Biſhop of Hereford (the Queenes boſome Councellor) preaching to them on this Text, * My head, my head aketh, delivered to them the reaſons of the Queenes comming with her army, concluding (more like a Butcher then a Divine) that an aking and ſick-head of a Kingdome, was of neceſſitie to be taken off, and not to be tampered with, by any other phyſicke.

The Londoners for the Queen.

(90) The Londoners, in favour of the Queene, and hatred of the Spenſers, committed ſundry outrages, beſides bloudy facrileдge in cutting off the biſhop of Exceſters head, and ſome others (whom the King had made Guardian of London) in their popular fury, among the which one of them was a Citizen of their owne, John le Marchal, who had beene of the younger Spenſers acquaintance. The Tower of London they get into their poſſeſſion, placing and diſplacing the Garriſon and Officers therein at their pleaſure, under the name of the Lord Iohn of Eltham, the Kings ſecond ſonne, whom they proclaimed Cuſtos of the Citie, and of the Land. They alſo ſet at liberty all priſoners, which by the popular Queenes commandement was done through the whole Realme: and all baniſhed men and Fugitives were revoked; who all * flocking unto London, brought no ſmall encreaſe to her forces.

(61) Whither in the meane ſpace doth woſull Edward flye? what force, what courſe, what way takes he poore Prince? O fearefull condition of ſo great a Monarches State, when a Wife, a Sonne, a Kingdome are not truſted, and thoſe onely are truſted who had nothing ſtrong, but a will to live and die with him. The Queene paſſing from Oxford to Glouceſter (onward to the ſiege of Briſtow-Caſtle) grew all the while in her ſtrengths like a rowled ſnow-ball, or as a River, which ſpreades ſtill broader from the fountaine to the Ocean, * vires acquirit eundo. For thither repayred to her (for the love of the young Prince) the Lord Percy, the Lord Wake, and others as well out of the North, as Marches of Wales. But Edward (having left the Earle of Wincheſter, the elder Lord Spenſer, in the Caſtle of Briſtol for the keeping thereof) meditates flight with a few into the Iſle of Lundie in Severne Sea, or into Ireland, & while he wandreth about not finding where to reſt ſafe, his royall credite, name, and power, (like a Cliffe which falling from the top of ſome huge rocke, breakes into the more pieces, the farther it relles) are daily more and more diminiſht as they ſcatter, till now at laſt they are come unto a very nothing. After a weeke therefore ſpent upon the Sea, Sir Thomas Blunt forſaking him, and comming to the Queene, he came on ſhore in Glamorganſhire, where with his few friends hee entruſted himſelfe to God, and the faith of the Welſh (who indeed ſtill loved him) lying hidden among them in the Abbey of * Neath.

(62) Now had the Queene and her ſonne (for his name was abuſed to all ſorts of turne-ſervings) taken the elder Lord Spenſer at the Caſtle of Briſtol, who (without any forme of triall) was cruelly cut up alive and quarreted (ſaith de la More our Knight) being * firſt at the clamours of the people, drawne and hanged in his proper Armories upon the common Gallowes without the City: but his Grandchild Hugolin ſtood ſo valiantly in defence of himſelf within the Caſtle of Kerfilly, that he had his life and the lives of all his aſſiſtants ſaved.

(63) The King not appearing, Proclamations were every day made in the Queenes Army, declaring, * That it was the common conſent of the realme that hee ſhould returne, and * receive the government thereof, ſo as hee would conforme himſelfe to his people. This (whether Stratagem or Truth) not prevailing, Henry, Earle of Lancaſter the late Earles Brother, Sir William la Zouch, and Rheſe ap Howell a Welſhman, who all of them had Lands in thoſe parts where the King concealed himſelfe, were ſent with coyne and forces to diſcover and take him. The Queene and her people lay in the City of Hereford, the Epiſcopall See of that great * Arch-plotter of her courſes Adam de Ortlon, where by adviſe and conſent of the Lords, her ſonne the Duke of Aquitaine was made High-Keeper of England, and they as to the Cuſtos of the ſame, did ſweare him fealty. (69) The mournefull King being at Kenelworth Caſtle, there repaired thither the Biſhops of * Winchester, Hereford, and Lincolne, * two Earles, two Abbots, foure Barons, * two Iuſtices, three Knights for every County; and for London, and other principall places (chiefely for the five Ports) a certaine choſen number, ſelected by the Parliament, which then the Queene and her Sonne held at London. The Biſhops of Winchester and Lincolne (as it was agreed upon) came thither before any of the reſt, aſwell to give the King to underſtand what kinde of Embaſſage was approaching, as to prepare him by the beſt Arguments they could to ſatisfie the deſire, and expectation, of their new-moulded common-weale, which could onely be by reſignation of the Crowne, that his Sonne (whom the body of the then confuſed State had elected) might raigne in his ſtead.

(70) When they were admitted to his preſence, (the Earle of Leiceſter being by!) they together ſo wrought him, partly with ſhewing a neceſſity, partly with other reaſons drawne out of common places, throughly ſtudied for that purpoſe, that (though not without many ſobs and teares) hee finally did not diſſent, if his anſwer were truely reported (which * ſome doubt of) unto the Parliament. * For they told "him that the Common-weale had conceived ſo ir- "reconcileable diſlikes of his governement, the par- "ticulars whereof had beene opened in the generall "aſſembly at London, that it was reſolved never to "endure him as King any longer. That notwithſtan- "ding thoſe diſlikes had not extended themſelves "ſo farre, as for his ſake to exclude his iſſue, but that "with univerſall applauſe, and joy, the Common- "weale had in Parliament elected his eldeſt Sonne "the Lord Edward for King. That it would be a ve- "ry acceptable thing to God, willingly to give o- "ver an earthly Kingdome, for the common-good "and quiet of his Countrey; which they ſaid could "not otherwiſe bee ſecured. That yet his honour "ſhould be no leſſe after the reſignation, then it was "before, onely him the common-weale would ne- "ver ſuffer to raigne any longer. As ruſull and heavy as this ſight was, we read not yet of any acts or effects of compaſſion expreſſed towards him at this preſent; ſo ſetled (as it ſeemed) was the hatred and averſion. The King being now (wee cannot ſay) come to himſelfe, but to the ſenſe of his miſery, the Biſhop of Hereford declares the cauſe of their preſent Embaſſie, and running over the former points, concludes as before, ſaying, (as in the perſon of the common-wealth) That the King muſt reſigne his Diademe to his eldeſt Sonne, or, after the refuſall, ſuffer them to elect ſuch a perſon as themſelves ſhould judge to bee moſt fit and able to defend the Kingdome.

(72) The dolorous King having heard this ſpeech, brake forth into ſighes and teares, and being (ſaith his * moſt favourable reporter) more ready to ſacrifice his body for Chriſts cauſe, then once to behold the diſinheriſon of his Sonnes, or (through his occaſion) the perpetuall diſturbance of the Kingdome, (as knowing, ſaith hee, that a good ſhepheard ſhould give his life for his flocke,) made at the laſt his anſwer to this effect. * "That hee knew that for his "many ſinnes hee was falne into this calamity, and "therefore had the leſſe cauſe to take it grievouſly: "That much he ſorrowed for * this, that the people "of the Kingdome were ſo exaſperated againſt him, "as that they ſhould utterly abhorre his any longer "rule and ſoveraignty: and therefore hee beſought "all that were there preſent, to * forgive and ſpare "him, being ſo afflicted. CHAPTER. XII.

The happy things under King Edward the third.

THe ſickneſſe and wounds which the common welth ſuſtained by the raigne of the late depoſed king, upon the change of her Leach and Phyſician, recovered not onely health and ſtrength, but beautie alſo and ornament; and the elements themſelves, which in the former times ſeemed to ſuffer and ſympathize with the publike grievances of the Engliſh, grew * gratious and propitious to the uſe of man, the Aire becomming more healthfull, the earth more fruitfull, as if Nature herſelfe were privy to the worth of the ſucceeding Prince. But this his worth did not diſplay it ſelfe, untill hee had plucked the ſway of things out of the hands of the Queene his Mother, and of that aſpiring danger and tempeſt of England, Roger Mortimer, who wholly poſſeſſed her.

* Ranulph. Ceſtr. Tho. Walſingh.

(2) This Edward of Windſor, being not fifteene yeeres of age, when (without any guilty thought in him) his throne was thus eſtabliſhed upon his Fathers ruine, tooke the beginning of his raigne by publike ſanction at the * twentieth day of Ianuary, and by direction of ſuch as ſought to colour their treaſons againſt their depoſed Soveraigne, proclaimed "his peace in theſe words: Edward by the grace of "God, King of England, Lord of Ireland, and Duke "of Aquitaine, to N. N. our Sheriffe of S. Greeting, "Becauſe the Lord Edward our Father, late King of "England, by the common Counſell and Aſſent of "the Prelates, Earles, Barons, and other the chiefe "men, and the whole Communalty of the King-"dome, did voluntarily remoove himſelfe from the "government thereof, willing and granting that wee "as his eldeſt ſonne and heire, ſhould take upon us "the rule and regiment of the ſame, and we with the "counſell and adviſe of the Prelates, Earles & Barons "before ſaid, yeelding therein to our Fathers good pleaſure,

"these presents, you cause our Peace to bee openly "proclaimed through your whole Bailywicke, for"bidding all and every one on our behalf, under paine
"and perill of disinheritson, and losse of life and limbs,
"not to presume to violate or infringe our said peace,
"but that every one pursue or follow his actions,

"according to the lawes and customes of our King-
"dome: for we are ready, and alwayes will bee, to

* 1. February.

King Edward provided for warres with Scotland.

(3) Vpon the Candlemas day it selfe, the young King receiving the Order of Knight-hood, by the hands of the Earle of Lancaster, and upon the same day the Crowne of England at Westminster, Walter Archbishop of Canterbury performing the offices accustomed therein, judged nothing to bee sooner thought upon then to recover the honour of his Nation upon the Northerne enemies, whom his unexperienced youth, and their former happinesse had emboldened; in which preparation while hee was busied, the Queene his Mother, and her Mortimer, forgat not other things tending to their owne benefit and assurance.

Mortimers high practises.

* Ypodig. Neust.

(4) First therefore there was procured for the Queene-mother soe great a Dowry, that the young King had scarce a * third part of the Kingdome left for his maintenance; which excessive estate, in title for the Queenes, in the use was Mortimers, and from this treasonable defalcation and weakening of the royall meanes, hee sinewed his owne devises with authority and riches; so that his hatred against Spenser was not on behalfe of the Common-weale, but for that any one should abuse it for his private but himselfe. Lastly, when they had certaine intelligence, that sundry great persons and others, as the whole order of Fryers-Preachers, tooke pitty of the late Kings captivity, and seemed to consult for his deliverance, they knowing that by recovery of his former estate, their just confusion must follow, they resolved to strengthen (as men supposed) their other impieties with murther.

(5) For albeit the Queene in her outward gestures pretended nothing but sorrow for her Lord and husbands distresse, yet in stead of bringing to him her person (which the deposed Prince did wonderfully * love) shee onely sent unto him fine * apparell and kinde letters, but contrary to the lawes of God and man, with-drew her selfe from nuptiall duties, bestowing them (as the fame went, which will blab of Princes as freely as of meaner Dames) upon the bloudy Adulterer Mortimer, fathering her absence upon the State, which (the fained) would not suffer her to come unto him. The desolate Prince was hereupon taken from Kenelworth Castle, by expresse order from the * young King, at their procurement, for that the Earle of Lancaster (Lord of that peece) was suspected to pitty too much his calamity: He was delivered by * Indenture, to Sir Thomas de Gournay the elder, and Sir John Mattravers, two mercilesse and most unworthy Knights.

(7) Never was the fallacy of pointings, or ambiguity of Phrase more mischievously used, to the destruction of a King, or defence of the Contrivers, then in this haynous Parricide, for it is said that a bloudy Sophisme, conceived in these words, was sent;

A bloody fallacy or Sophisme.

Where the Comma or pause being put after Nolite, bids them not to make him away, but after timere, insinuates a plaine encouragement to the fact.

(8) The Sphynx, who is said to be the Author of this ambiguous Riddle, sent by the Lord Mortimer, was Adam de Tarleton, who * utterly denyed any such intention, when the Murtherers for their owne justification, produced the writing it selfe, under Queene Isabels Seale, and the seales of the other Conspirators, and therefore the said Bishop Adam was the cause, why Gorney and Mattravers were with terrible menaces shaken up, pursued and out-lawed, who more pursued with the memory and conscience of so hainous a Tragedy, fled out of England. Gorney after three yeares banishment, being discovered at Masseli in France, and approhended, was convayed backe, but had his head taken off at Sea in his passage, * lest he should reveale too much at his arrivall, but Mattravers lay hidden in Germany a long time, doing pennance.

(9) This Parricide was committed about S. Matthews day, and (that you may note what confidence they had in their Art of secret murther, as also an ordinary mockage of the people in like cases) the noble body was laid forth, and * many Abbots, Pryors, Knights, and Burgesses of Bristoll and Glocester were sent for to see the same; upon which, although there appeared no manifest outward signe of violent death, but the skinne all over whole and unbroken, yet the cry of murther could not so bee smothered, but the meanes and manner came to light. This happinesse certainely the poore Prince had, that after his emprisonment hee reformed his life in so pious and Christian sort, that it gave occasion when hee was dead of disputation, whether * hee were not to be repured a Saint, even as (say our Authors) there was the like Question concerning Thomas Earle of Lancaster, though beheaded for apparent Treasons. His body without * any funerall pompe was buried among the Benedictins in their Abbey at Glocester, and so (saith * our passionate author) the stately height of the Angels Kingdome received this Scholler, and Disciple of Christ, thus reft and spoyled of his English Kingdome.

(10) The yong King was now upon the borders of Scotland with a puissant Army, where also the Queene mother, and Mortimer, with many other Nobles were present, and having environed the Scots (who had pierced into England with invasive armes) in the woods of Wiridale and Stanhope Parke, made sure account of a certaine victory; but by the treason of the said Lord Mortimer (as afterward was laid to his charge) they were suffered to escape out of that mischiefe, and the young King with griefe returned inglorious, after an huge waste of treasure, and perill of his owne person.

(12) About this time dyed strucken with lepry, Robert Bruce King, and recoverer of Scotland, and the most approved Warriour of the World in that age, by whose losse it was soone found, how much the vertue and fortune of one man are worth in any Nation. But before hee dyed, that peace was made with the Scots, by the meanes of the Queene and the Lord Mortimer, which is so much dispraised by our Writers, and in the end prooved capitall to the principall Actor Mortimer.

(13) For at this treaty it was, that the King (then in his Minority) sealed Charters to the Scots at Northampton, whose contents were contrived by the Queene, the said Lord Mortimer, and Sir James Dowglasse, without the privity of the English. There was also delivered to them that famous Evidence called the * Ragman-Roll, and the King acquited them of all * claime and pretence of right to the Superiority of Scotland, rendring backe sundry Iewels taken by the English from the Scots, among the which was one speciall, called the Blacke Crosse of Scotland. There was it also granted, that all * Englishmen should leese their lands in Scotland, unlesse they would inhabite upon them, and become Liege men to the King thereof, besides many other things, to the high discontentation (as was the humor of those times) of the English Subiects. Moreover, under the specious colour of restitution of dammages, King Robert was to pay to King Edward thirty thousand Markes sterling, with which (as the meed of treason) the Lord Mortimer was afterward publikely charged, and for the same, and other his crimes, was executed as a Traitour. Finally, upon the seventh of Iuly, David Bruce Prince of Scotland, a Child of seven or eight yeares old, and sonne and heire to King Robert, married Ioan, sister to King Edward, at Berwicke: by which peace the English were made obnoxious to some reproaches, the Scottish Nation in scorne, calling the said Lady, Ione Make-peace.

(14) And therefore saith one of this part of King Edwards raigne: That drawne aside with evill advise, by reason of his age, hee committed many foule errors in State, at the beginning of his Government: which is also the generall opinion of all our Writers, whereunto this verse is by * some applyed;

Væ puerilis terræ, sæpissimè sunt ibi guerræ.

Where Children Rulers are,
There oft is woe and warre.

(15) There dyed likewise about this time Charles the Faire, King of France, (to whom K. Edward had not long before done homage for his Dutchy of Gascoigne) the third and last sonne of Philip the Faire, King of France, by whose decease the Crowne of that noble Kingdome, devolved to this our Edward King of England, in right of his mother Queene Isabel: And because upon this * Title King Edward did afterward claime the said Crowne, we will here once for all instruct you in the justice thereof.

* Polyd. Virg.

(16) Three sonnes there were of King Philip the Faire, (to wit, Lewis Hutin, Philip le Long, and Charles the Faire) who all successively raigned in France one after the other; and none of them leaving any Issue, at such time as King Edward made his claime, the whole right seemed to bee in Isabel the onely Child of the said Philip which had any Issue, for an other sister which she had dyed an Infant.

(17) The case thus seeming plaine, was not for such accepted by the French, who received to the Crowne Philip of Valoys, whose Father Charles of Valoys was yonger Brother to Philip the Faire, advancing the Brothers sonne before the daughters sonne, not following the propinquity or descent of bloud, but the meliority of sexe, upon which ground they had also freshly put by Ioan daughter of Lewis Hutin, preferring Philip le Long her uncle. The French inbarre her interest, pretended a fundamentall law or entaile, by which * no woman as inheritable to the Crowne of France, and in defence of that opinion withstood King Edward afterward with so much losse and calamity, though that very law made Edwards title the stronger (* as himselfe truely pleaded) hee being the Male, albeit his right descended by the Female.

* Lex Salica, which law, as their greatest Lawyers since acknowledge, no whit concerneth the French Crown. Hottomanni Franco-gallia. cap. 8. * Chron. Origin. Ed. 3. de Iure suo in Reg. Gal. * Ypodig. Neust. & in Edw 3.

(18) This Title so so glorious a Monarchy though it accrewed to the English, by this march with Queene Isabel, yet doth Walsingham * freely pronounce; That neither that affinitie, nor any other contracts with the French, was ever availeable or brought any benefit to England: which opinion, as it may seeme strange, so will it answer a wise Readers paine in the fruit, to observe through, the course of our Stories, whether the said grave Writer had just occasion so to speake or no. Another conceit there was of this Edwards marriage with Philippa the Earle of Henaults daughter, which about this time was consummated, though Philip de Valoys (King of France, by intrusion as our Annals repute him) was her uncle, her Mother being his owne sister.

King Edward marries Philippe the Earle of Henaults daughter.

(19) There stood now at home against the streame of the Queene, and her Lord Mortimers absolute sway, some great personages, who did not wholly allow their doings, among which was the Kings uncle, Edmund Earle of Kent, whose death they shortly procured. Meane while, the more to despite and dare their over-lookers, Roger Mortimer was created Earle of the Marches of Wales, at a Parliament holden at Salisbury: at which time also John of Eltham the Kings Brother, was made Earle of Cornwall, and the Lord Butler of Ireland Earle of Ormond. From whence the Lord Henry Earle of Lancaster, and sundry other of the Peeres, seeing the King * troden (as it seemed to them) under foot, did absent themselves, meditating civill armes for redresse, who notwithstanding (by the labour of Simon de Mepham Archbishop of Canterbury) was reconciled: This Archbishop very worthily also excommunicated all such as had any hand in the sacrilegious parricide of that * noble and loyall Prelate Walter Bishop of Exceter, or any wayes violated him, their ayders, complices, or abetters whosoever. But after the Coronation of Philippa the yong Queene, in another Parliament at Winchester, the said Earle Edmund was condemned for conspiring to deliver his brother, late King of England, whom (likely enough by Mortimers practise) hee was drawne into an absurd beliefe to be still alive. Thus, for devising to set a dead man at liberty, this noble Earle Edmund the Kings halfe-uncle had his head strucken off, though from * Noone till five at night, hee stood at the place of death without the Castle-gates, none being found to behead him, till a base wretch of the Marshal-sea was sent, and did it: so litrie conscience did the malice and ambition of his potent adverfaries make of shedding the royal bloud, which by Gods juster judgement was not long unrevenged.

(20) To supply which losse to the regall stemme, with a very large amends, the yong Queene Philippa at Woodstocke in Oxfordshire, upon the fifteenth of Iune, being Fryday, brought forth her first begotten sonne, the amiable and famous Edward, by-named (not of his colour, but of his dreaded Acts in battell) the Blacke Prince. King Edward not long after, with a small company went into France, and did homage to Philip de Valoys for his Dutchy of Gascoigne.

pace did now approach and summon Mortimer to a bloudy account; for the yong King addicting himselfe to serious thoughts, and putting on the Man before his yeares required, easily saw his owne perill in the others potency. The Queene his Mother (to the common dishonour and griefe of the Kingdome) being generally bruted to bee with child by Mortimer, hee upon ripe advice sodainely and adventurously surprised the proud man at a Parliament holden in Nottingham; with whom were taken the Lord Geoffrey Mortimer his sonne, and Sir Simon de Bedford*, who all three were sent prisoners to the Tower of London, under a strong guard. Which done, the King by common consent of the Parliament tooke into his hands his Mothers excessive Dower, and put her to a narrow pension of one * thousand pounds by yeare, circumscribing her within as narrow * limits for her abode, but doing her yearely the honour and comfort of once or twice visiting her, though otherwise scarce thinking her worthy of life, in regard of her privacy with Mortimer, and his many heinous practises.

(22) Oh, what enchantments are Honour and Power to the minds of men! how sodainely, and how strangely doe they blow up the same with the contempt of others, and forgetfulnesse of themselves? Certainely the fraile estate of mans constitution is clearely seene in this high Lord, who drunken with felicity, and fearing neither God nor man, fell into utter confusion when least hee feared. The probable manner whereof is worthy the relating. There was in the Castle of Nottingham (and at this day is) a certaine secret way or Mine cut through a rocke, upon which the said Castle is built, one issue whereof openeth toward the River of Trent, which runnes under it, and the other venteth it selfe farre within upon the surface, and is (at this present) called Mortimers hole; through this, the young King well armed, and strongly seconded, was conducted with drawne swords, by some his trusty and sworne servants, (among which was that brave Montacute, whom his vertues under this King raised to the Earledome of Salisbury, &c.) up to the Queenes Chamber, whose dore (so feareless is blinded affection) was unshut, and with her was Mortimer (the Kings Master, as the rumor spred him) ready to goe to bed, whom with the slaughter of a Knight, and one or two that resisted) they laid hold upon. This was not reputed a slender enterprise, in regard that in Mortimers seruice were not fewer (they say) then one hundreth and fourescore Knights, besides Esquiers and Gentlemen.

The manner of Mortimers surprise at Nottingham.

Vide Iohn Stow. Annals.

(23) The causes for which hee was condemned in open Parliament at Westminster, these ragged * verses following comprehend, which without any disparagement to their makers judgement, might very well have beene in Prose, but for brevity and change wee have here inserted them.

* Mirr. of Mag.

Five haynous crimes against him soone were had,
1 First that he caus'de the King to yeeld the Scot
(To make a peace) townes that were from him got,
And therewithall the Charter called Ragman;
2 That of the Scots hee had bribed privy gaine.
3 That through his meanes Sir Edward of Carnarvon;
In Barkley Castle most traiterously was slaine.
4 That with his Princes mother he had laine,
5 And finally with polling at his pleasure,
Had robd the King and Commons of their treasure.

But the most barbarous murther of the Kings father, and specially the dishonourable peace and contract with the then-professed enemies of England, were principally insisted upon, as hainous treason. He was after sentence ignominiously drawne to Tyburne, the common place of execution, then called the Elmes, and there upon the common Gallowes was as ignominiously executed, hanging (by the Kings commandement) two dayes and two nights, a publike and gladsome spectacle. There dyed with him Sir Simon de Bedford Knight, and Iohn Deverel Esquire, aswell for expiation of the late King Edwards death, as in complement, as it were of so great a mans fall, whose lives doe seldome, or never perish single.

(24) Now came Scotland to turne about to suffer a againe most grievous losses and afflictions, an ordinary effect of Childrens government, whether Children in age, or in discretion: for the Lord Edward Baliol hearing of King Roberts death, and the tender age of King David as son and heire of that Baliol, to whom K. Edward the first had adjudged the Scottish crowne, with such voluntaries as hee could raise (though his Father the Lord Iohn had * released his claime to king Robert, and though King Edward in favour of his sister Iohn Queene of Scotland, would not openly at first support him) embarkt himselfe in Yorkeshire, and invaded that Realme, where, upon his landing, he slew Alexander Setoun at Kingorn, and about nine hundred others, putting the rest to flight. Not long after (that no mischiefe might come alone) neere to the water of Ern, at a place called Dupline, where the Earles of Mar and March, with two puissant armies of Scots, for the defence of their yong King David lay encamped, the said Lord Edward (whose small numbers, not exceeding three thousand English, the Earles as fecurely and as fatally contemned, as the English under Edward the second had contemned the Bruce and his Scots) obtained of them a wonderfull victory, Bootius (who never, or rarely, leaves any overthrow purely to the manhood of the English) will needs have this discomfiture effected by a Camisado, the Baliol and his English with others passing the water of Erne by a Foord in the night, when the enemy little suspected it.

(25) The slaughter even by his report was miserable: for there were slaine (saith hee) the Earles of Murre and Carricke, and three thousand of the Nobles, beside Commons. Out * Writers agree that this Foord was passed in the night, but that the fight endured from Sunne-rising till three of the Clocke afternoone, and that, besides the Earles of Murre, and Carricke, three other Earles, Menteth, Athol, and Murrey, twelve Barons, eight hundreth Knights and men of Armes, beside above thirteene thousand other, lost there their lives. Of the English there were only slaine thirty and three * Esquiers: so that not without cause this victory was attributed rather to power divine, then humane.

(26) Yet this was but the beginning of farther calamities to the Scottish Nation, which was in it selfe divided into factions, the one for Bruce, the other for Baliol. The Lord Edward making use of his good fortune, got himselfe to be crowned King of Scotland at Scone. But King David Bruce with his Queene fled into France to Philip de Valois, who raigned there, and entertained them with much compassion and honor, giving them Castle-Gallard for the place of their abode, till fairer fortune shone. Meane-time the Scots sustained new dammages; for a prime man among them, the Lord William Douglasse, was taken prisoner by the English, not without losse of many his men. Before which time, by * no honourable meanes, the new King of Scotland was driven to seeke his safety by flight into England.

But before hee did this, there is who writes, that hee summoned his brother brother in law to K. David, to doe homage and fealty vnto him, which when David would not yeeld to doe, nor confesse he ought, no more then his Father King Robert, he made that a ground for the justice of his warre, as reputing the Acts and releases at Northampton voide.

(28) To the rescues of Berwicke, Archimbald Douglas Earle of Angus, Governour of Scotland for King David, came with a puissant Army, and gave King Edward battell at Halydon-hill, where with a lamentable slaughter of his people he was vanquished and slaine. This battell devoured in a manner all the remainders of the Scottish Nobles which preserved themselves at Dupline by retrait, or by absence from that field. There * perished besides Archimbald, the Earles of Ros, Sutherland, and Carricke, three sonnes of the Lord Walter Steward (whose issue afterward raigned in Scotland, when warre and death had made way to that line, by extirpation of the Male-Competitors in the races of Bruce and Baliol) and at least foureteene thousand others, with the losse (say some) of one Knight, and ten other Englishmen. Our * Writers affirme that the Scots were at this battell, threescore thousand strong, and that there * were slaine eight Earles, 1500. horsemen, and of the common Souldiers five and thirtie thousadd; which is not improbable, for so much as Hector confesseth they were stopped in their flight, and put to the sword upon all sides without mercy.

(29) Hereupon Berwicke was rendred, which the King of England detained as a supposed parcell of his Patrimony; and dismissed the Baliol to the government of the Scottish Kingdome, with sundry Lords and others of the English. And now the bloudy tallies and cruell scores seemed even betweene the two puissant (though then unkind) neighbour-Nations, and Edward throughly redeemed the dishonour sustained at Bunockesbourne by his late Father, delivering his younger yeares from that contempt, in which his enemies might otherwise have holden him, as they had done at the entrance of his raigne, playing upon the English with Truffes and Rounds; of which this one is every where noted;

(30) As for the subornation of poysoning Earle Thomas Randall, and the hanging of Sir Alexander Setons two sons, contrary to faith and law of Armes, at Berwicke, with the like staines, which * one would faine leave upon this victorious Prince, we have found no colour of warrant but his own liberty of avouching; which therefore our freedome of not beleeving him shall as easily take away and cancell. Neither would we so farre have touched this jarring string of discord betweene these two Nations, but that each out of their owne harmes of old, may have the more true sense of their felicitie, by their new harmonicall concordance.

(31) After that the * Nobles of Scotland had unanimously confirmed Baliol in the Kingdome thereof, and sworne unto him faith and allegiance at Perth, hee repaired to the King of England at Newcastle upon Tine, where hee * submitted to Edward King of England; as his Father had done to Edward the first, and with the like successe; for by occasion of such his submission; our Writers say, the Scots (as before they had done) fell off againe. Which aversion, or defection was augmented upon * private quarrels, and titles of inheritance to lands of great value, betweene powerfull Competitors, and by other particular revenges, to which a people so continually exercised in fight and battels were not slowly prone.

(32) Notwithstanding all which (the Baliols party having once had all the Holds of Scotland at their commandement, * five onely excepted, Dumbritaine, Loughleiim, Kildrummie, Urquhart, and the pile of Lowdon) Edward King of England having with him the Baliol, and a sufficient Army, prevailed so much, that there was no appearance of rebellion; whereupon hee tooke backe with him the Lord Edward Baliol late crowned King of Scotland (of whose stedfastnesse he was (saith Hector) alwayes jealous, and * returned, leaving * David Cumin Earle of Athol, governour for the parts beyond the Scottish Sea, with sufficient force and authoritie (as was judged) to take in such strengths as yet stood out, but needed not his royall power or presence for their expugnation.

* Adam Merim.

(33) The King of England hoping now that all was wel there, had newes brought unto him not long after, at the Parliament at London, that the Scots were out in Armes againe; whereupon hee obtaines ayde of money from his Subjects for repressing their attempts, promising to goe against them in person. * The Lord Robert Stewart, sonne of the Lady Marjorie Bruce, daughter of King Robert (upon whose line the remainder of the Crowne of Scotland had beene estated) was the man that first lifted up the head of his Country in this dangerous, sad, and desolate condition (though put into action upon a private injury done unto him by the Earle of Athol) to whom divers did adhere, though the quarrell seemed properly to be the said Lord Roberts, for that if the Bruces were cut off, his hopes perished in them. The Earle of Murray, and he, were then chosen governours for King Davids party, but by reason of the diligence and power of David Earle of Athol, they were not able as yet to convene, or effect any thing against the English; nevertheless it was not long before they flew the said Earle David. At this Parliament the King of England purposed to * goe upon his owne charge into the Holy-Land, and to send the Archbishop of Canterbury to deale with Philip de Valois King of France, for appointing a certaine time, wherein they two with their united forces, might take their voyage thither, from which the desire of obtaining the Crowne of France, upon the fore-mentioned title, did quickely divert him.

(34) Meane-while, in accomplishment of the Parliaments expectation, King Edward after * Michaelmas marched againe into Scotland with an Armie, and sent his Navie to the Forth: The Sea-force whereof spoyled the Coasts on both sides of the Forth, or Scottish Sea, and putting on land in Saint Colmes, they spoyled the Abbey; which Sacrilege, * Hector notes was severely punished, the whole Fleet being battered with tempest, and some of the ships perishing. At another time also the like sacrilege being perpetrated there, (he saith) that the ship wherein the unlawfull prize was, sunke sodainly to the Sea-ground without any tempest. The King himselfe comming to * Perth, to order the Scottish affaires, whiles he abode there, the Earle of Murray one of the Governors was taken prisoner, who was after * delivered upon Exchange for the Earle of Namur, (whom the Scots by like art had taken) or as Hector will have it for the Earle of Salisbury.

(35) By the mediation of the French, the Scots had a short truce granted them. But about the end of May, the King sent his cosen the Lord Henry, sonne to Henry Earle of Lancaster, with a great Army to the aide and service of the Lord Edward Baliol King of Scotland, which wasted all the Countries about Perth, where, while they lay, the King with a very small Company came sodainely unto them, and from thence pierced farther one way then ever his Grand-father Edward had done, suffering fire and death (the common furies of warre) to worke upon all that might suffer destruction, to establish a Conquest. He marcht up as farre as * Elgin and Buquhan, and in his returne to Marre, * burnt the Towne of Aberden; in revenge for Sir * Thomas Rosselin, a Knight, whom the Townes-men thereof had slaine. (37) There was in ſpeciall credite with King Edward, one Sir Robert de Artoys, who being baniſhed by the French King out of thoſe parts, and made (by King Edward) Earle of Richmond, laboured earneſtly (upon hatred to the French King for his private diſcontentments) to draw him to claime the Crowne of France as his moſt lawfull right, and as that which would indeed enrich his people with ſpoyles, and treble his owne greatneſſe by the Conqueſt: The motion, though by reaſon of the highneſſe and difficulty of the enterpriſe, it did not at the firſt prevaile; yet at laſt by the evill fate of France wrought out to it ſelfe a wonderfull allowance. Many conſultations paſſing of the matter, it could not be ſo concealed, but that the ſmoake thereof diſcovered the breeding fire. This in the preſent was very happy for the ſtate of Scotland, which * (ſaith Hector) was in appearance ſo enfeebled, that if the King of England had continued his warres, it ſhould have come without any hope of reliefe to utter ruine. It was alſo a cauſe, why the French (who hitherto had ſupported the Scots, but not as if it ſo nearely concerned themſelves, put in the more fully and roundly, ſeeking by all meanes to weaken and annoy the Engliſh, aſwell in Scotland, as in Gaſcoigne, and where elſe ſoever.

(38) That we may with the leſſe confuſion, and fewer interruptions, deliver our ſelves of the French warre, which now approached, wee will here in one view tender unto you the Scottiſh affaires, from this time for ſeaven or eight yeares, till about the ſiege of Calis by K. Edward, who was ſcarſe alighted in England from the former expedition, but the Brucean party (under their chiefe leader Andrew Murray) iſſued from the Loughes, Mountaints, and other their places of retreat and faſtneſſe, to re-advance their cauſe. King Edward once or twice ſent Armies, under valiant Generals to ſupport the Baliols poſſeſſion againſt their violence, whoſe ſucceſſe was variable till the death of Murray. After whom the Lord Stewart tooke charge for the Brucean ſide, and (upon the advantage of King Edwards ſlackneſſe, to finiſh his Scottiſh affaires, the matter of France ſo far preponderating it) endeavoured to prepare a quiet entrance for King David. The aide of the Lord William Dowglas to that purpoſe was vere available, howbeit not alwayes fortunate, being overthrowne in a ſet battell by Sir Thomas Berckley at Blackbourne, having there with him King Edwards power. To the up-ſhot, and as it were deciding ſtroke of theſe late miſeries, there arrived great ſtore of munition out of France, at ſuch time as the Lord Robert Stewart having lien ten weeks at the ſiege of Perth, was almoſt ready to have abandoned the ſame in deſpaire. Perth being rendred, the Baliol (whoſe the quarrell was) betooke himſelfe into England, having ſmall ſtrength of his owne in the hearts and affection of the Scots, who revolted daily from him. Vpon ſure intelligence of all theſe matters, King David, his Queene, and many honourable French, and Scots, returne, and till the quarrell of Philip de Valoys put him into unfortunate Armes againſt the Engliſh, the afflicted Realme of Scotland enjoyed a kinde of reſt and quiet.

(39) It was not now the juſtice of his Title to the Crowne of France, which onely made King Edward unſheath his conquering Sword againſt the French; for Philip de Valoys King of France injuriouſly with-held ſundry Townes and places in Gaſcoigne. 2. That his Agents and Ambaſſadors deſiring to put the cauſe to civill triall, were not onely not admitted to bee heard, but were driven away with feare of their lives.

3. That the Court of the Twelve Peeres, in giving the Crowne from him, (who was then under age,) did therein leave the office of Iudges, and were no better then robbers. And therefore their proceſſe made to his prejudice during his minoritie, was by all lawes voide and fruſtrate.

(41) King Edward neverthelеſſe (knowing that words were little worth in ſuch a caſe) to ſtrengthen his quarrell with friends, by the adviſe of his counſel, and of * his Father in law, the Lord William Earle of Henault, fought to confederate and unite unto him the High and Low Dutch, Princes and people, which lay moſt commodiouſly for his uſes. But the better to hold them together, he was adviſed to ſeeke the amity of the Emperour Lewis of Bavare, with whom he made (as by the event was manifeſt) but an * unprofitable confederation, though for the preſent it ſeemed to ſerve his uſes with the countenance: more to his advantage were the ſingular endeavours of ſome other his private inſtruments, as chiefly of Iames de Artevile, a wealthy Burger of Gaunt, one of a rare dexterity of wit, and ſo popularly acceptable among the Flemings, that he ſeemed to ſway Flanders more by far then the Earle thereof, whom they had expelled. By the ſpeciall diligence of this Iaques van Artevile, and of one * Sigar de Courtray, a Nobleman of Flaunders, there was prepared among the Artizans of thoſe parts (whoſe chiefe enrichments depended upon the handling of Engliſh-wooll, as Cloth-workers, Weavers, and the like) a mighty partie for the Engliſh againſt the French. This amitie with England (as moſt profitable for the common benefit, and weale of his Country) the ſaid Iames moſt conſtantly ſupported to the death.

in a manner become all one with them, by King Edwards marriage with the Lady Philippa, nor a little advanced the practiſe of Iames on his behalfe; which was ſped at laſt, by occaſion of * an overthrow given to the French-Flemings, who under the conduct of Guy, the Baſtard of Flanders, brother to the Earle (both of them being wholly French) were placed in the Iſle of Cadſant, to empeach the arrivall of the Engliſh, who tooke the ſaid Guy, and ſlew the moſt part of his people. This victory was atchieved, in the quarrell of the King of England, by the Earle of Derby, the Lord Beauchampe, the Lord Reynold Cobham, the Lord Walter de Manny (an Hennoway) and other of the Engliſh Captaines: Of the fame and lucky fortune whereof the ſaid D' Artevile, and other of the Kings friends, made ſo wiſe and ſeaſonable uſe, by letting them ſee the Engliſh were able to protect them, that the Flemings (without any great ſtay) became his firme confederates, in preſence of the Earle of Gelder, at Gaunt, notwithſtanding that at the ſame time the great K. of France, and their owne naturall Lord, the Earle, laboured all they could to the contrary.

(43) But as King Edward was (in the mean ſpace) wholly intent, upon furniſhing himſelfe with all convenient things fit for his warre, (having Captaines and Souldiers, ſuch as his owne noble heart could wiſh,) ſo when he found that the induſtrious Dutch by their manuall labours, grew to ſo great ſtrength and opulencie, that their friendſhip bred rivality in puiſſant Monarches, he, like a father, regarding the publike weale of his Country, ordained that all Cloth-workers, who would repaire hither out of forraine parts, and exerciſe their Trades, ſhould have free acceſſe and ſundry priviledges. By which invitation as very many were drawne, ſo was it the principall cauſe of advancing that honeſt, beſt and moſt beneficiall Trade in the Kingdome, to the great enrichment, ſtrength, and honour thereof. The Engliſh Nation was very deſirous to ſet forward this Warre, and therefore contributed plentifully, and the King made bold with Lombards, and the moveable goods of ſuch Priories in England, as were Cels to Monaſteries in France, thereby to make his coffers fuller.

(44) The warre, which all this while ſeemed but to bee talked of, did now begin to blaze (and indeed a blazing ſtarre of thirty dayes continuance, was ſuppoſed by ſome to fore-ſhew it) whoſe firſt torch was lighted by the * French at Southampton, which they almoſt wholly conſumed to aſhes, but they with loſſe of their Captaine, (a yonger ſonne to the Sicilian King) and about three hundreth others, * were driven away the next morrow. The French had ſundry ſhips of Warre or Gallies, which under colour of paſſing to the Holy-Land, the King of France had (with purpoſe to aſſaile our Coaſts) aſſembled, as the * King of England chargeth him: which loſſe, yet was not long un-required, either Nation greeving other with mutuall miſchiefes.

An. Dom. 1338.

(45) To appeaſe and extinguiſh this deadly quarrell, there came from Pope Benedict the twelfth, two Cardinals hither; but one of them in a ſpeech to the Clergy, ſeeming to favour the French faction; Iohn Archbiſhop of Canterbury immediately ſtood up, and proteſted, that the Cardinals Arguments were vaine and frivolous: whereupon they ſoone after departed, and it was every where publiſhed through England, that the King had right to the Crowne of France, which alſo hee meant by honourable force to proſecute. Notwithſtanding, King Edward for avoyding Chriſtian bloud-ſhed, gave inſtructions to the Cardinals, that upon certaine equall conditions, he was willing to make an everlaſting peace with the French, and would have beene very glad (the hazards of warre conſidered) to have taken any honeſt or proportionable offers; one impediment whereof was this, that the French would include the Scots within the Treaty, whom King Edward would not admit thereunto, as purpoſing (when he had ſingled them from ſupplies) to make a full and abſolute annexation of their obediences to the Engliſh Scepter: ſo the labour and hopes of the Cardinals proved vaine.

The French Kings real as for reſiſtance.

(46) Philip de Valoys, in poſſeſſion King of France, had ſundry great and high motives to embolden his ſtanding off. Firſt, the regard of honour, and profit, and the abundant meanes which he had, having the whole puiſſance of France (the fureſt Kingdome under Heaven) at his Commandement. Then a confidence which hee reaſonably conceived ſo to divert, or diſtract the Engliſh forces, by the aſſured ayde of the Scots, as that it ſhould finally ruine the whole enterpriſe, if not alſo the principall Actor Edward himſelfe. Againe, conſidering the vaſtneſſe of the enterpriſe, hee judged King Edwards wealth not to be proportionable, but did well hope, that a ſhort dalliance would conſume his treaſures. Moreover, hee judged perhaps, that the very thought it ſelfe of conquering France, was no better in Edward then a young mans dreame, conſidering the Realme of England was farre inferiour in bigneſſe, and multitudes of Subjects, and that there was a Sea betweene, the croſſing whereof muſt double the charge. Laſtly, for the friends which King Edward had procured in Dutchland with wonderfull largeſſe, he knew, would not bee held together but with infinite coſt and expence, and that by ſome good meanes or other, hee ſhould make them in whole, or in part unprofitable.

(47) For juſtification of his cauſe, he had no ſlender colours, or reaſons. As the before alleadged law or cuſtome of France, which they call the Salick, by the which the French exclude * Gynecocracy, or Womens Government in chiefe. Then an Act of the whole French State, by which his right was acknowledged and eſtabliſhed. Thirdly, King Edwards birthplace, by which he ſeemed to them a ſtranger, and for that cauſe was farre the leſſe capable, or rather was directly incapable of popular good-will among the French. Laſtly, for that King Edward in the * beginning of his raigne (though when hee was as yet under age,) did in his owne perſon, both doe his Homage to this very Philip de Valoys, as to the King of France, for his Dutchy of Aquitaine, and alſo * by his Letters Patents under ſeale did teſtifie as much. This homage, (the more to be remembred, becauſe * ſome attribute much of King Edwards diſcontentment to the haury manner of Philip in taking the ſame) was performed at Amiens in Picardie. It troubled King Edward greatly, to ſee himſelfe making ſubmiſſion to the uſurper of that Soveraignety, which hee thought belonged to himſelfe; but to let the French ſee what kinde of Prince he was, he came in ſo royall manner appointed, as if he meant to have ſtrucken them with feare or admiration: Earles, Barons, and 1000. Horſe hee had in his retinue. At the day, his robe was of Crimſon Velver, powdred with Golden Leopards, his Crowne on his head, a Sword by his ſide, and Golden ſpurres on his heeles. To receive this Duke for the Dutchy of Guyen, and Earledome of Ponthieu, Philip de Valoys ſate crowned in violet Velver, ſemined with golden lillies, with all the other Enſignes of royall Majeſty, but the homage was done onely by word (if * one ſay true) and not in that full manner which Serres mentioneth. Probable it is, that the haughty carriage of Philip did greatly incenſe the Spirit of King Edward, being one of the moſt gallant in the World.

By reason of which Vicegerency King Edward * Fabian. made out his commandements, and did many things to his advantage and profit. Howsoever it neither lasted long (for Lewis within a while dishonorably revoked it,) and did undoubtedly scarce quit the cost: for the bravery of that meeting was so exceeding great, as Edward easily wan the generall opinion of a very noble and puissant King. * Polydor * Hist. lib. 19. writes, that Edward refused not the office, yet would not exercise the same, because he would not displease Pope Benedict, whose enemy the Bavarian was.

The King of *England*s prerogative. Tho. Walsing.

(49) This Emperour (whom belike the Pope hated, for being as proud as himselfe) tooke it ill, (as report went) that the King of England humbled not himselfe (at their meeting) to the kisse of his foote. But it was answered; that the King of England was a King annointed, and had life and member in his power, and therefore ought not to submit himselfe, so much as another King that was not annointed. After his returne to Antwerpe with his new power, he seriously prosecuted his affaire of confederation with the Lords and people of Dutchland, among whom (with great love and favour) hee and his royall family abode above an whole yeare. The principall Nobles which entred into this league against the French, were these: The Archbishop of Colein Prince Elector; The Duke of Brabant; The Duke of Gelderland, (who had married the Lady Isabel King Edwards owne sister, and about this season was of an Earle created a Duke; The Marquesse of Gulicke, &c. And finally, the Hanse townes.

(50) The Flemings, being the most necessary part of this association, in regard of their neerenesse to the French, would not engage themselves in an offensive warre against the Crowne of France, unlesse King Edward would first assume the Title and Armories of that Realme, as the onely lawfull King thereof. This Proposition was throughly debated, and the law of Armes allowing it, hee with the common assent of the Flemings and others, tooke the Stile, and quartered the Flower de Lize with the Leopards, or Lyons of England, as here we see annexed; albeit we see his former Seale also adorned with two Lize or Lillies; whether in token of his mothers French descent, or as a covert note of his owne right to the French Crowne it is uncertaine.

Polydor. virg. lib. 17. An. Dom. 1328. The first quartering of the French Armes with the English. Adam Meriin. Tho. walsing. in Edw 3. Tyndg. Holl.

(51) Polydor * Virgil must have a wary and fanourable Reader, or he will be thought to be of opinion, that William the Conquerour bare his Leopards quartered, then which nothing is more untrue, nor more unlikely. Others againe may suppose, that wee have not heere described them according to their right bearing, as certainely according to their present bearing wee have not; but the truth is, the golden Lillies of France, which now are borne in triangle, were in those dayes borne, and advanced Semi.

* Jo Gallicl. 1. lib 9.

The Armes of England set before those of France at the first. Sir Robert Cotton hath such a Seale of Queen Isabel.

(52) And whereas the Armories of France are placed here in the dexter and more honourable quarter, yet there are probabilities, that it was not so at this their first conjunction. For in the * Seale of Queen Isabel (this King Edwards mother) the Armories of England, as being the Armories of the husbands line (and therefore to have precedence) were marshalled where now the Flower de Lizes shine. But whether to gratifie the French, or because that was the more ancient and greater Monarchy, they were in this Kings raigne disposed as here we see.

(53) When King Edward had thus assumed the Title and Armes of that Realme, he published the same under his seale, setting the name of England first, and sent his Letters Patents to the Frontiers of the enemies Dominions, fixing them upon the doores of Churches, as well to declare the right and reason of his doings, as to exempt such from the danger of the comming storme, who upon this notice would acknowledge him their Lord and rightfull Soveraigne. These Proclamations or admonishments thus divulged, he burnt and spoyled the North parts of France up as farre as * Turwin, though the time of the yeere were very unseasonable, and contenting himselfe therewith for a beginning, gave place to the sharpenesse of Winter, returning to the Queene his Wife at Antwerpe, where he kept a royall Christmas. In which City this yeere was Lionel (afterward Duke of Clarence) borne.

* Adam Meriin. Tho. walsingh.

(54) His affaires growing ripe in those parts, hee leaves his Queene and Children in Brabant, as an assured pledge of his returne, and about Candlemas Ships himselfe for England; where, in a Parliament at Westminster, hee obtained liberall aydes for supportation of his intended Conquest. In lieu of which loving assistances, hee granted a generall large pardon both for trespasses, and of all Aydes for making his sonne Knight, and for marriage of his daughter during all his time; forgiving also all arrearages of Farmers and Accountants till the tenth yeere of his Raigne, and all olde debts due to any of his Predecessors. Finally, hee confirmed that famous Magna Charta, and of the Forrest, with some other.

(55) There was no talke now but of conquering France; Musters taken throughout the Kingdome, Armourers and Trades of Warre (to bee cherished even in the securest peace) were full of employment, and the desire of Battle waxt fervent every where. Meane-

Meane while, to hold the world in suspense of the successe, God distributed the fortune of attempts diversly. Burdeaux (the capitall Citie of Aquitaine, and then English) gave an excellent testimony of her loyalty, nor lesse of martiall wit and valour. For the French Army comming before her, she to abuse their hope, set open her gates, and displayed upon her Towers the golden Lillies, as if she were theirs; but the French which securely entred, found little good hospitalitie. Sir Oliver de Ingham was Captaine and Lord Warden there for King Edward, who with his Garrison-Souldiers, and ayde of the inhabitants, slew of them great multitudes, and preserved Burdeaux. But in the opposite parts, William Montacute Earle of Salisbury, and Robert Vfford Earle of Suffolke, * after many honourable deeds performed for advancement of King Edwards affaires, were by the French taken Prisoners, while presuming too much upon their courages and fortune, they * ran too farre into their danger, at the Towne of Lile in Flaunders.

(56) But King Edward being ready now to repasse the Seas, had certaine intelligence that the French lay in waite about Sluice in Flanders, to intercept him, with a mightie Navie of 400. Ships; who therefore prepared accordingly, intending to open his way by force. Hee set saile from Herwich upon Saint John Baptists Eve, toward the Coast where his enemies attended, strengthning himselfe with the Northerne Navie of England, which the Lord Robert Morley brought unto him, so as he had in all about two or three hundreth sayle. His battels having the advantages of winds and sunne, hee set on the French with incredible fury and force, in the very mouth of the Haven of Sluice upon Midsommer day, where began a most bloudy and terrible fight, the end whereof set the Garland upon King Edwards head. Himselfe was * wounded in that fight, and lost * foure valiant Knights (Montbermer, Latimer, Boteler, Peyninges) with sundry other of his English slaine therein. But the slaughters of the French party were lamentable, for thirtie thousand are confessed to have perished, not halfe of their ships escaped untaken or unsunke. A greater glory then this, the English are scarse found to have atchieved at any battle at Sea.

* Serres. Hollinsh. * Rich. Southw.

(57) The Crowne of France seemed already to be placed upon King Edwards Temples, so much was attributed to this great victory; but such a Conquest was not the worke of one day. Which King Edward well understanding, refreshed his victorious Armie, and augmenting it with his Confederates forces (which repaired to him on all sides) marched forth, having one of the most puissant hosts that ever any King of England led, as wherein were neere an hundreth thousand Souldiers English, and Dutch. He had also in his Company the Dukes of Brabant and Gelder, and many other potent members of the Empire, and (as * some write) the imperiall Eagles displayed in the head of his Army, as he that was Vice-gerent of the sacred Romane Empire. In this wise he approached the Notherly parts of France, where exposing all to spoyle and fire, he sate downe with his whole Forces about Tourney, meaning to take in the same, as well to be a seate of Warre, as place of sure retreat and refuge.

* Serres.

(58) Philip, though justly grieved with his wofull losse sustained at Sea, yet to encounter, and crush so great an evill in the first approaches thereof, had provided such an Army, as beseemed the Majesty and greatnesse of that renowned Kingdome. Writers speake of an hundreth thousand fighting men assembled under his command, and that besides Princes, Dukes, Earles, and other illustrious Persons, there was the valiant old King of Bohemia, and * Lewis King of Navarre. King Edward hearing the same, drew forth his people into the open field, with purpose to give battle.

* Polydor. Virg. lib. 19.

(59) It may seeme a thing greatly tending to King Edwards glory, to remember the * offer which hee sent to King Philip before hee laid his siege to Tourney. In which, without saluting him by any other title then of Philip of Valoys, hee challengeth him, for avoyding the effusion of Christian bloud, to fight with him hand to hand in single battle; or (if that misliked) then each to bring an hundreth to the Field, and try the event with so small an hazard; or otherwise, within ten dayes to joyne full battle with all their forces neere to Tourney. Whereupon Philip made no direct answer, neither with his honour could, alledging that the letters were not sent to him, the King of France, but barely to Philip of Valoys. Nevertheless, he gave him to understand, that his meaning was to beat him out of France, having hope in Christ (from whom hee derived his power) so to doe.

* Tho. Walsing.

(60) The honour of the warre in those ages cannot be enough commended, in which the noble old formes of hostility were put in practise, by defiances, Heralds, and publique affignations of day and place of fight, and not by skulking surprises and under-hand stealthes, more neerely resembling highway robbers, then lawfull battle.

(61) These two huge hosts (which had they beene united for the good of Christendome, might have worthily made the Turke looke pale) being now in fight, and the Cloud of Warre ready in a manner to dissolve it selfe into showers of Bloud, doe nevertheless without one stroke fall off, and returne to their severall Countries, not without the wonder and rejoycement of peaceable men, but not of the English and German Souldier, who propounded to themselves death with glory, or riches by Conquest and victory, who now had scarse their wages.

(62) It is not meete that the name of that person who did performe so blessed an office, should be concealed. It was a woman of honour (but at that time a professed * Nunne in the Abbey of Fontenel) the Lady Ione of Valoys, sister to this Philip, widdow of William late Earle of Henault, and mother to King Edwards wife; her charitable endeavors were strongly holpen by * two Cardinals, who solicited peace together with her. Great interest of mediation shee had in either respect, heere a brother, there a sonne in Law, and she fayled not to ply them both. The Truce was concluded; the rather for that King Philip was advised from all parts, not to set his whole fortunes upon the Die and chance of a Battle. And Edward (on the other side) meaning nothing lesse, then not to have prosecuted the warre upon the encouragement of his late Sea-victory, was so destitute of money through the fault of his Officers in England, as he was the sooner drawne, if not enforced to embrace so honest a colour of returning from the siege of Tourney; which nevertheless did but deferre the miseries of France, not determine them: and whereas that glory, which the upper hand in this journey would have brought, could not have beene pure and meere unto him, because the Dutch (whose ayde he used) would have claimed no small share therein, the English Chevalry onely had the name and burthen of such great Acts as after followed.

* Serres.

* Tyndg. Holl.

(63) The chiefe Articles of the Truce were; That it should endure till Midsommer day then next ensuing, and that the Prisoners should be set at libertie without any ransome on both sides, upon condition to render themselves againe, or pay their severall ransomes, if peace were not in the meane time concluded. By vertue of this treaty and Truce, the Earles of Salisbury and Suffolke were delivered. Heere it troubled our * Walsingham; that King Edward should be left so destitute, and needy, by the avarice or fraud of his Officers at home, as for that respect to give over so faire an opportunitie, by which hee might as it were by a continuall line, and by insisting and pressing upon the steps of his late fœcesse,

succeſſe have happily proceeded, when as yet his friends were uncorrupted, and in preſence; and therefore bemones the unworthineſſe thereof towards ſo worthy a Prince, adding; * That if in every deed they had ſcanned and exactly weighed with themſelves the Acts of all the Engliſh Kings paſt, from the very firſt Monarch, they would not have found that ever this Iland brought forth a Prince of ſuch excellency as ſo * unripened yeares.

(64) King Edward greatly diſcontented with ſuch of his officers, through whoſe default he was thus in a manner conſtrained to let ſlip the preſent proſecution of his deſigne, returned with his Queene into England, to take revenge of their miſdemeanors, where hee committed * ſome to priſon, put others from their places, and ſo beſtirred himſelfe, that by occaſion thereof much diſpleaſure grew betweene the King and Iohn Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who complained of manifeſt violences done againſt the Liberties of the Church and Engliſh Nation, comprehended in Magna Charta. And whereas the King did openly charge the Archbiſhop to have been a principall perſwader of his entring into league with the Almaines, againſt the French, willing him to take no care for treaſure, becauſe himſelfe would ſee him abundantly furniſhed from England, out of the levy of granted Subſidies, and profits of the Crowne: and that through defect of the Archbiſhops performance, he was not onely conſtrained to give over his hold for the preſent, but alſo to embogge himſelfe in the Bankers and Vſurers bookes, the Archbiſhop thereunto made anſwer: That he deſired in open Parliament it might appeare, through whoſe default the Citie of Tourney was not taken, and directly laid the whole blame from himſelfe, and from his, upon ſuch as were daily Courtiers, (whom Walſingham calles Anglici regii, Engliſhmen for the King) who ſerving their owne turnes with the generall abuſe, would expoſe him, and his, unjuſtly to the envy of their fact. Yea, ſome there are, who more then ſo, will have the Archbiſhop ſeeme to practiſe againſt the Kings farther good fortunes in France; which, if it be true, it is no hard matter to find out the principall motive thereunto.

(65) For certainely the Pope (Benedict. 12.) was nothing pleaſed with the ſucceſſes of Edward, at leaſtwiſe with the war it ſelfe, as pretending it was pernicious to Chriſtendome; the blame whereof the French charged upon the Engliſh, as unlawfully claiming, as the Engliſh did upon the French for unlawfully detaining. This Pope therefore interpoſeth himſelf, and puts * Flanders under Interdict, as having diſloyally left their owne Earle, and their chiefe Lord Philip King of France, contrary to their Oath and Allegiance; but they for their defence and juſtification anſwered, that Edward was the onely lawfull King of France, and Philip (to whom they had ſworne) a meere Vſurper, and therefore notwithſtanding that Interdict, or the Papall decifion of the controverſie, they perſiſted ſtill in their adherence.

(66) But the more to draine and weaken the mighrie ſtreame of the Engliſh ſupportations, Lewis of Bavar the Emperour, ſodainly (by ſuch practiſes as were uſed on behalfe of the French) re-called his Vicar-ſhip or delegation, which he had made to Edward, to exerciſe imperiall power in lower Germany, offering his beſt helpe notwithſtanding, (as having power from Philip to that purpoſe,) to procure him honourable conditions, as a Mediatour betweene them. The pretence of his falling from King Edward, and concluding amitie with his enemy, was for that King Edward without his privity, had conſented to a Truce at the City of Tourney with Philip.

(67) To theſe revocatorie lines King Edward "made this wiſe and noble anſwer; That the Em- "perours zeale to make attonement, he could not but "greatly commend, wiſhing, that at the inſtance of "ſo potent a Mediatour, an honourable Peace (if that "were poſſible) might be made; but his Title being "cleare enough, he meant not to make doubtfull by "putting it to any arbitration. That it could not but "be admired, why he ſhould now enter amitie with "Philip de Valoys the wrong-doer, fith, having ſeene "his apparant right, hee had entred with him into "league, againſt the ſaid Philip: That it was alſo a- "greed, that hee might conclude any temporary "Truce (though not a finall accord) without his con- "ſent, if need ſhould be, as in this caſe at Tourney it "was. That this revocation ſeemed to bee made "ſomewhat abortively, for ſo much as the Imperia- "liſts had promiſed the Vicar-ſhip ſhould ſtand good "till he had conquered France, or the greater parti- "on thereof. Dated thus, Londini, Anno regni noſtri Franciæ, 2. Regni verò noſtri Angliæ, 15. But Lewis of Bavar to Edward thus * inconſtant, and faith-breaking, continued toward Philip ſtedfaſt, without either amending Philips fortunes thereby, or himſelfe increaſing in Iuſtice or honeſtie, that it might eaſily be ſeene he was endued with qualities, which ill became the Imperiall height.

(68) You have heard a part of great King Edwards victorious fortunes in battle, both by Land and Sea; be not ignorant of his Pietie (the ſoveraigne ornament and faſetie of Soveraigne Princes,) whereof in one act of his, we will tender unto you in the ſtile of that age an Eſſay and taſte. He having a purpoſe to purſue his enterpriſe for France, after ſundry Chriſtian and holy conſiderations of Gods judgements, and of his owne eſtate and rightfull cauſe, he turnes his ſpeech to his Biſhops in theſe words: Cum "igitur conſtituti ſitis, &c. Seeing therefore you are "ordained of God, on the behalfe of men, that you "ſhould offer gifts and ſacrifices for ſinne, liſten we "beſeech you to the premiſſes, and not to our one- "ly, but to the publique dangers, powring forth "prayers to the moſt High for our happy ſucceſſe, "ſupplying the place of Moſes, ſo that we and ours "may prevaile againſt adverſaries, in the lifting of "your hands to heaven; and that God would bee "the rather pleaſed to enlarge his favour towards "us, (the number of Interceſſors being multiplyed,) "cauſe preachings, and proceſſion, and other offices "of appeaſing his diſpleaſure, to be mercifully exer- "ciſed through our Cities and Dioceſſes, that the "God of mercies would extend over us, and our Ar- "mies, the hand of his Benediction, and ſo direct our "Acts in his good pleaſure, that they may redound "to his glory and our profit, and to the commodi- "tie and quiet of all our faithfull ſubjects. This, O Edward, was indeed to begin at the right end; for even the Heathen taught, * to begin with God, and thy following ſucceſſes declared that thy prayers were acceptable.

(69) And now once againe the French and Engliſh powers were at point to try their fortunes by battle, upon ſiding with other Claimes, as erſt they had done for their owne. The quarrell was founded upon a title to the Dutchie of little Britaine. Arthur Duke thereof had two Wives; by Beatrix his firſt wife, he had two ſonnes, Iohn (afterward Duke) and Guy; and by Iolant his ſecond Wife, he had Iohn of Montfort. Duke Iohn living without Iſſue, aſſured to Ione (daughter of his brother Guy, who dyed before him) the Ducall Crowne of little Britaine: upon which entaile, Charles of Bloys, (Nephew to Philip King of France) marrieth the Lady Ione, who in the life time of Duke Iohn, was (by agreement) put into full poſſeſſion: but Duke Iohn being once dead, Iohn of Montfort raiſeth warre, as the ſurviving heire male. Philip King of France tooke part with Charles of Blois, and Edward King of England, with the Lord Iohn of Montfort.

(70) Great and bloudy miſchiefes ſprang out of theſe ſtrongly ſupported factions, which had now drawne King Edward thither in perſon; and little Britaine (which may well in a fort be called Wales in France, the Britons, chiefly the Britons Britonant, or ruder Britons, declaring at this preſent by the language, and ſundry locall Names, as Lanion, Triguier, &c.

That their Kinſmen are in Wales and Cornwall) was become the field of Mars and martiall Furies. But the powers of thoſe two mighty Kings being upon point, before the City of Nants in high Britaine, to cut out their divers ſhares in fortunes Partrimony, with the edge of the Sword, loe againe God inclined their hearts (as if hee would faine have done nothing but ſhew his vengeance in the Scabbard) by the carefull diligence of two Cardinals, to accept of a truce, which was concluded Ianuary the 19. at the Priory of Malestret, upon ſundry points, whereof theſe (as to the purpoſe of our Story) are the principall.

(71) That the two Kings of England and France ſhould ſend certaine of their Bloud royall to the Court of Rome (by a certaine day) there to argue their ſeverall titles, and rights to the French Monarchy, not as before a Iudge, but as a friend * indifferent to both, and that the King of Scots, and the Earle of Henault, ſhould likewiſe ſend to give their aſſent for ſo much as concerned them.

(72) That either friends, adherents, and ſequels, ſhould be comprehended in the Truce, and that the truce ſhould extend it ſelfe to the tidlers in Britaine and their ſides; and that the Cardinals ſhould doe their beſt to obtaine abſolution from the ſentence of Interdict executed upon the Countrey of Flanders.

(73) That the Truce ſhould continue for three yeeres; that priſoners or moveables taken on either ſide ſhould bee mutually diſcharged, that traffique and paſſages ſhould bee open; and that all other things ſhould ſtand as they did at the time of the Truce made: which being fairely engroſſed in an * Inſtrument, two great Peeres of each part, tooke oathes upon perill of the Soules of their Kings, to obſerve the contents ſincerely.

(75) King Edward retutning home after the Truce, neglected not his domeſticke affaires, but enacted the Statute of Proviſors, upon this occaſion. Pope Benedict being dead, Clement the ſixt ſucceeded; a man of * ſingular learning, but * extreamely profuſe in giving, who, by way of Proviſion, had beſtowed ſundry choiſe Benefices in England upon Forreiners. For prevention whereof (as of a thing which the King and Peeres would not endure,) it was made high Treaſon by law, for any to bring ſuch Papall proviſions into the Kingdome. And for juſtification of his ſo doing, hee directed that * letter unto the Pope which was ſo * exceallently pen'd, as did not onely move admiration, but aſtoniſhment; and indeed this pruned age affords few ſo grave and ſolide. In which Parliament alſo the Lord Edward, the Kings eldeſt ſonne, was created Prince of Wales. Hee was ſo renowned a Gentleman, (why doe we ſay he was, as if hee could at any time ceaſe to bee, whom fame hath made immortall?) that the high praiſe before given by Walſingham to his father, *as * excelling all the Princes which went before him*, may bee paralelled in the Sonne, as ſurpaſſing in martiall deeds, all the Princes that have lived after him.

(76) His noble Father King Edward (who had ſtill his eye fixed upon France, as the marke of his Conqueſt) having notice among other things, by a meſſenger from the Pope, that Lewis of Bavar had wholly ſubmitted himſelfe, and was fully abſolved from all cenſures, with confirmation unto him of the Imperiall Diademe: the King, (that you may by his courage know him worthy of ſuch a Sonne) brake irefully forth into theſe words. Though Lewis take the French Kings part, I will fight with them both. And whether hee were invited with the fame of King Arthurs Table, and the Knights adventerous thereof, or for that hee knew honourable Company and exerciſe in Armes, to bee the naturall parents of excellent Souldiers, it is agreed, that hee erected a building at his Caſtle of Windſore; which ſhould bee called the Round Table, whoſe circumference was ſixe hundred foote, where Knights and men of warre ſhould have their entertainment of dyet, at his charge by one hundred pounds by the Weeke, though afterward, through occaſion of his Warres, hee abared that ſumme to twenty pounds weekely. In emulation whereof, Philip de Valoys (knowing that all this tended but to preparations againſt him,) erected the like in his Court, to invite the Knights and men at Armes of Almaine, and of Italy, from repairing to King Edward. One thing Philip did ſhrewdly and politikely, in giving leave to his ſubjects to fell downe his woods freely for building of Ships, whereby his Navy was greatly augmented, and the rather wrought much miſchiefe afterward. About this time one of the chiefe ſtarres in the Firmament of the Engliſh Chevalry fell into the Grave, William Montacute King of Man, and Marſhall of England, of * whoſe noble acts to write worthily were a commendable matter.

(78) It was not Pope Clements mediation, or diligence in diſcuſſing the Titles and Pretences of theſe two puiſſant Monarchs, which could prevent the fatall puniſhment of France, yet according to the Articles of the Treatiſe at Malestroict, either Prince ſent his particular Orators, where the difficulties roſe ſo thicke and intricate, as Clement * diſpairing to cleare them, put over their farther view till another time. But King Edward affirming the truce to be manifeſtly broken, * by the beheading and perſecuting of his friends in Normandy and elſewhere, ſignifies ſo much to the Pope, that Battle and not Parlance ſhould determine his right, and title. His proviſions of men, of Ships, of weapons, of victuals, of treaſure, of all things, needfull to ſo brave and daring an enterprize, were worthy of the greatneſſe, courage, ſtrength, riches, and majeſty of a King of England. Into Gaſcoigne he ſends that valiant great Lord Henry of Lancaſter, Earle of Derby, with a gallant company of leaders and troupes of ſouldiers, where he atchieved many great things, for the defence and enlargement of that Dutchy, taking Cities, Caſtles, and Townes, of which Iohn the French Kings eldeſt ſonne recovered divers not long after; and diſcomfited the enemy in battle. friend to life, gave life notwithſtanding about this time to an invention, which as for the preſent it ſerved (he having ſo great uſe thereof for his French enterpriſes) as a vehement Incentive to martiall valour, and a golden band of unity, ſo the ſame is continued with likelihood of perennity, and multiplication of ſplendor in theſe our dayes. It was the foundation of the Engliſh Order, worthily called the moſt noble Order of the Garter. The cauſes why our Edward erected it, are not evident, though there could none be greater or better, then thoſe before recited; Honour expreſſed by externall and illuſtrious enſignes, deviſed by a victorious Author, and appropriated to a fellowſhip of moſt exemplar and eminent perſons, being in nature like a flame, to kindle in the apt and worthy, all heroicke affections. The vulgar opinion is, that whatſoever the remoter cauſes were which mooved to this foundation, the neere cauſe, or the occaſion was, a Garter of his owne Queene (or as * ſome ſay) of the Lady Ioan, Counteſſe of Salisbury (wonder of that age for ſhape and beauty) which ſlipping off in a dance, King Edward ſtooped, and tooke up. Such of the Nobles as were preſent, ſmiling, and * playing in ſport with that action of the Kings, as amorous, hee ſeriouſly ſaid, it ſhould not bee long before there ſhould Soveraigne honour bee done to that ſilken tye. Whereupon hee afterward added the French Motte, or Symbolicall word, HONI SOIT QVI MAL Y PENSE, as well in complement of the whole invention, as in retort or checke of his Courtiers ſiniſter ſuſpition. Polydor Virgill troubleth himſelfe to make an Apology for the courteſineſſe of this Originall, if (without injury) an office of honourable love in ſo renowned a Monarch, may undergoe the note of courteſineſſe; but the ſame Polydor among his other defences thereof truely ſaith;

Nobilitas ſub amore jacet.

There want not ſome who conjecture, that hee entituled it the Order of the Garter, for that in a battle wherein he was victorious, hee had given the word Garter, for the word or ſigne. But if credite may be attributed to the originall * Booke of the Inſtitution, the invention is deduced from times more ancient, "and that when Richard the firſt King of England, ſet "forward againſt the Turkes and Sarazens to Cyprus "and Acon, and waxed weary of longer delay, while "the ſiege of Acon was with wonderfull care protra- "cted, courage at the length (by the comming of S. "George among them as it was thought) quickning "in him, it came into his minde to tye about the legs "of certaine his choice Knights, a Garter or ſmall "thong of Leather, the onely ſtuffe fit for ſuch a "purpoſe, which hee had then at hand, to the in- "tent that they (as it were by joynt conſent) being "mindfull of future glory, if they were victorious, "might be ſtirred up, to demeane themſelves nobly, "after the example of the Romans, with whom "that variety of Crownes or Garlands given for "ſundry cauſes as honourable Enſignes to the Soul- "dier was in uſe; to the intent, that by ſuch incite- "ments, they might ſhake off ſloath, and the ſpirit "of courage might riſe, and breake forth the more "fervently.

(80) And into this opinion of ſtirring up vertue thereby, the * Author of the Britannia ſeemeth to paſſe, where hee ſaith, that King Edward the third founded this Order, to * adorne Martiall vertue with honours, rewards, and ſplendor.

* Vt militarem virtutem honoribus, præmiis, atque ſplendore decoraret.

(81) There was in the Caſtle of Windſor (the ordained ſeat of the Order now firſt to bee conſummated) before King Edward did accompliſh his intention, in honour of God, * our Lady, and S. George, a * Chappell erected by King Henry the firſt, and other Progenitors of Edward, with an allowance for eight Canons, to whoſe Colledge this Prince added a Deane, fifteene Canons more, and twenty and foure poore impotent Knights, with other officers and ſervants, as appeareth by his Charter. Theſe were to pray for the good eſtate of the Soveraigne and Brethren of the moſt noble Order. The Soveraigne and Knights themſelves had their particular lawes and conſtitutions, which they were by ſolemne oath bound to obſerve, of which one * was, That they ſhould defend and aſſiſt one the other: which afterward made Alphonſe Duke of Calabria receive the habite of that Order with ſo exceeding reverence at Naples, as erroniouſly thinking himſelfe ſecured thereby from the French, who claimed that Kingdome. But that cuſtome of mutuall aſſiſtance (ſaith * Polydor) was then worne out of uſe, and diſcontinued every-where; for thoſe Italian Potentates who (within the memory of Polydor) being driven forth of their Country, and imploring ayde of thoſe orders, whereof themſelves were companions, found no ſupporture, either from the French or Burgundians, who had formerly elected them. Befides Lawes and Officers, King Edward alſo deviſed particular Ceremonies and diſtinctive habites and enſignements, whereof the principall was the azure Garter, wherein the French Motte of the Order was wrought in letters of Gold, and the Garter it ſelfe faſtned a little under the left knee with a buckle of Gold, in * token of Concord. There are ſpeciall Manuſcript-Bookes of the Conſtitutions, and other things peculiar to this Order, to which (this place being not aptly capable of their re-capitulation) wee muſt referre the curious. Saint George the * eſteemed patterne of Chriſtian fortitude, is intituled to the Patronage of this Order, and the beauteous Chappell in Windſor-Caſtle (where his * day is yeerely celebrated) conſecrated by King Edward to his memory. The fortune of this invention hath beene ſuch, that the moſt mighty Princes of the Chriſtian World have thought themſelves moſt highly honoured, in being choſen thereunto, ſo that there have beene about two and twenty forraine Emperours and Kings (beſides many others of moſt noble quality) ſince the firſt inſtitution thereof, elected and admitted Companions of the Garter. The Kings of England are in their ſeverall times Soveraignes of the Order, and the whole number of Knights is circumſcribed in twenty and ſixe, where of the Soveraigne is one. The names of the firſt twenty and ſixe (who are alſo ſtyled Founders of the Order) you ſhall finde intabled in our Map of Barkeſhire.

(82) Our Edward * having thus honoured S. Georges memory, aſſigned to his Image, mounted in Armour upon horſe backe, a ſilver Shield with a croſſe Gules (* the deare remembrance of his dying Lord) and * appointed his Souldiers to weare white Coats or Jackets, with a red Croſſe before and behinde over their Armor, that it was not onely a comely, but a ſtately ſight to behold the Engliſh Battles, like the riſing Sunne to glitter farre off in that pure hew; when the Souldiers of other Nations in their baſer weedes could not bee diſcerned. The glory therefore of this Order ſeemed ſuch to one, no * unlearned Poet, that in an Apoſtrophe to Windſor, ſpeaking of the Garter, he breakes forth into theſe ſcarſe Hyberbolicall Verſes.

(83) Let us not dwell too long in the leſſer things: It was the moneth of July, and King Edward was now upon the Sea with about a thouſand Saile,

* Saile. No man is ſaid to know whither he bent his courſe, ſo well he could truſt himſelfe, and ſo wiſely free his Counſels from the poſſibilitie of diſcovery. He went not to warre by rote, but by booke; miſdome was Herbenger and marſhall of his valour; who ſhall ſay hee knew not how to conquer? It was not long but hee came to anchor in the Heaven of Hogy Saint Paſſ, in Conſtantine, a great cape of Land or penile in Normandy. His * land-forces did muſter twenty and five hundred horſe, and thirty thouſand foote, moſt of which were Archers. The lights, and glories of his Army, were the Prince of Wales (then about fixteene yeeres old, who was then by his father knighted) many brave Earles, Lords, Knights, and expert Chiefes, the Engliſh going cheerefully, as having gotten ſucha King as anſwered their warlike diſpoſitions. The Earle of Huntington had charge of his Navy: himſelfe takes ſevere revenge for the bloud of his friends upon the Norman Townes and people, proteſting he facrificed them * to Cliſſon, Baro, Percy, and the reſt. Their heads were ſet upon the chiefe Gate of Carentine, for which cauſe hee ſlew all that could be found therein, and turning the whole towne into Cinders, gave it to their funerall. He tooke the populous and rich City of Caen, and with his dreadful hoſte burning and ſpoyling round about, marched up almoſt as farre as the very Wals of Paris, braving King Philip ſo neere.

(84) Who had not ſlept all this while but was * purveyed of one of the fulleſt Armies which ever were ſeene in France. King Edwards people rich with ſpoil ſeemed not unwilling to return. They were now in the enemies Country between the two good rivers of Seine and Some, for they had paſſed the Seine at Poiſſe, whoſe Bridge (as all other betweene Roan and Paris) had beene broken downe by the French, and now (notwithſtanding any oppoſition) in a ſhort ſpace repayred. It was thought fit to ſecke paſſage out of theſe ſtraights, which could not be by Bridges, for they were broken by the French. This ſearch for paſſage, was by the enemy interpreted a kinde of flight, and Edward could not but be willing to nouriſh their temeritie, to draw them on ſecurely to deſtruction by ſuch a ſeeming feare.

(85) The river of Some, betweene Alboeville and the Sea, at a low water hath a paſſable and gravelly foord, knowne by the name of Blanch Taque; this was diſcovered to him by one Gobin a priſoner. But the French King (beſt acquainted in his owne Country) to empeach this paſſage, had before ſent thither a Norman Baron of ſpeciall note, one Godmar du foy, and a thouſand horſe, with at leaſt 6000. foote; but Edward (whom as obſtacles made impetuous, ſo nothing could diſmay,) enters himſelfe into the Foord, * crying, He that loves me, let him follow mee, as one that reſolved either to paſſe, or die. Who can tell the efficacy of ſuch a Generals ſpirit, but they, who have had the happineſſe to follow under the conduct? This paſſage wanne, and Du Foy defeated in a manner, before he was almoſt fought with, (the incomparable courage of his enemies appalling him,) hee brought to king Philip fewer by a paire of thouſands, then he carried forth, beſides terrour, and an evill ſigne of that which followed. The Engliſh, who knew not what it meant to runne away, but were before reſolved to liveand dy with ſuch a Soveraigne, had reaſon now much more to reſolve the ſame.

The great battell of Creſcie.

(86) King Edward was neere to Creſcie in the County Ponthieu, lying betweene the rivers of Some and Authy (which unqueſtionably belonged unto him in right of his Mother,) there moſt vigilantly provides hee for his defence. King Philip, ſet on fire with this diſaſter, precipitates to battell for accompliſhment of Gods anger againſt France; being the rather drawne, by the unruly vanitie of his huge multitudes, (for by what other words doe * an hundred or ſixe-ſcore thouſand men deſerve to be called?) who never left over-taking one the other, till the view of the Engliſh banners and battels put them to ſtand. We proteſſe that the nature of our undertakings will not brooke deſcriptions at large; you ſhall have it as we may, that is, as remembring, that innumerable great atchievements reſt behind, ſomewhat impatiently attending their relation.

* Servet ſaith but 60000.

(87) Therfore, the holy name of God firſt rightly invocated, King Edward, without ſhewing the leaſt ſigne of perturbation, but full of an Heroicke aſſuredneſſe, had ordered his people in three battles, with their wings and ſuccours. The Vaward diſpoſed into the forme of an Hearſe, where the Archers ſtood in Front, and the men of Armes in the bottome was under the young Lyon of Wales, Prince Edward, and with him many of the prime and higeſt Captaines: Beauchamp Earle of Warwicke, Godfrey of Harecourt, The Lords, Stafford, Laware, Bourchier, Clifford, Cobham, Holland, &c. In the ſecond Battle were, the Earles of Northampton, and Arundell; the Lords, Roſſe, Willoughby, Baſſet, Saint Albine, Multon, &c. The third and laſt battle was commanded in chiefe by King Edward himſelfe, with the reſidue of his Nobles and people. In every one of theſe battels, beſide the wings, were a juſt proportion of men at Armes and Archers, but nothing ſo thin and few as ſome of our * Writers alledge, who mention not above 9000. all together, who were at leaſt thrice as many in their whole numbers, and not without neede.

* Grafton.

(88) King Edward cloſed his battles at their back, (as if hee meant to barricado them from flying,) by felling and plaſhing of Trees, placing his carriages there, and other impedimens whatſoever, having commanded * all men to put from them their Horſes, which were left among the carriages. Thus all waies of faſetie by flight being prevented, the neceſſitie did undoubtedly double their courages. Thus placed to the beſt advantage, King Edward viſiteth the rankes in perſon, riding upon a pleaſant * Hobby, (having onely a white rod in his hand, as if he would chaſtiſe fortune,) betweene the two Marſhals of his Field; whoſe very preſence, with a few ſeaſonable and un-forced words on behalfe of God and his right, in ſtead of long Orations, did inſpire the fainteſt hearts among them with freſheſt vigour and alacrity.

(89) Our writers deſcribe not unto us the quality or face of the ground of Creſcy where this battle was determined (though very much doth depend upon choice of place,) neither the exact figures, or ſeverall numbers of every ſeverall battle, their diſtances, wings, or other warlike formes, nor finally what Palliſado, Trench, or other deviſe was in this or that quarter uſed, to keepe off and breake the furious charge of men of Armes, before they came at the Archers, principall worke-men at this bloudy journey. But thus lamely are things commended to Poſterity, where the Actors themſelves take no care to ſee the particulars orderly and according to the truth delineated; but either are unlearned, or give themſelves to the bodily fruition of their paſſed travels, rather then to exerciſe their minds in profiting themſelves and others by ſuch relations as are made with life and art. This wee finde, that the place of the Engliſhmens battles was the Towne of Creſcy, and Foreſt, and therefore apt with ſmall labour to be made inacceſſible, or at leaſtwiſe difficult for horſe to enter upon; that alſo the Engliſh Battles were marſhalled to the moſt advantage for giving ſuccour one unto the other; and that there were * Shields, or Paviſes, to ſhelter our Archers from the Genowaies ſhot.

the Emperour from the friendship of King Edward, to little purpose. The * night before the battle, there alighted in the French hoast, with intention to lop off one branch of Laurell from the Tree of victorie (though it fell out to be Cypresse and Taxus) Amie Earle of Savoy, with a thousand men of Armes; so that all things seemed to concurre and nourish fury for a sodaine ruine. Wee neede not describe the order of the French, where disorder was a principall Actor: The * King of Bohem, and Charles Earle of Alanson, King Philips brother-German, had charge of the point, or vantgard, King Philip himselfe was in the maine battle, and the Earle of Savoy had chiefe command in the Rere.

(92) That is almost ridiculous, which * one writes of the etymologie of the Oriflame (as he cals it) advaunced at this battle, as a signe of taking none to mercy, no more (as he saith) then Olle doth use to extinguish fire; when indeed it was an hallowed * Banner of red-silke, whereof the French had a wonderfull high conceit, as of that which was sent from heaven, and called Oreflame or Auriflames. King Edward on the contrary side, is reported for signe of like rigour, to have erected there his unconquered Standard of the Dragon-Gules. Lewis of Luxemburg, the most valiant old King of Bohemia, being either blind or very badly sighted, hearing in what goodly order the English (like sober Spartan Souldiers) attended the charge, said plainely (contrary to their over-weening judgements who had given out of their flight,) Here will the English end their daies, or conquer. And even as the first wounds were ready in a manner to be given and taken, behold, God, to let them know he was awake, and that there was one above to whom so many thousands should within a few minutes appeare, to give an account of their whole lives till that present; he caused the blacke cloudes to powre downe upon them store of funerall teares, enarching the ayre with a spatious * Raine-bow; and discharging sundry tire and peales of Thunder: the Sunne also at the same time drawing neere to set, would gladly have hid his face, by thrusting it under a partill * Eclypse; but God (who meant good to the English) would not suffer him to withdraw his more necessary office, so that freed from that temporary shadow, he shone directly into the Frenchmens eyes. At the same time also * sholes and cloudes of balefull Ravens, and other birdes of prey and ravin, as foreshewing the harvest of carcases at hand, came flying over the French hoast.

(93) The signe of battle being given by King Philip, and entertained with shoutes and clamors, all things shewing the horror of war, Drums and Trumpets sounding to a charge, Banners flying in the winde, and every where shining weapons, menacing brave extremitie, reason her-selfe acknowledged it onely safe to leave them to their brute faculties, passion, and furie, and the event it selfe to God. The French calamities began at their Genowayes, who under * Carolo Grimaldi, and Antonio Doria their Coronels, being all of them Crosse-bowmen, were to open a way for the French horse with their shot. This was the succeſſe of their ſervice: Their Crosse-bow ſtrings wet with the late raine, their bodies weary with a long march, their rankes (after the English had intercepted upon * Targets their first volue,) filled with innumerable gaps, occaſioned by the fall of their fellowes ſlaine, or overthrowne with horse-drawne arrowes, were laſtly moſt outragiouſly ſcattered by Charles Earle of Alanſon, at whoſe commandement (derived from King * Philip himſelfe) his Horſe gave in among them, to drive them by plaine murther from the honour of having the point, upon onely pretence that they hindered their race. This hot young Count (contrary to good diſcipline,) had alſo otherwiſe unjuſtly diſcontented and diſgraced them, even when they were ready to joyne in battle, whoſe bodies (being as moſt write about twelve thouſand) by bearing the firſt brunt might have beene of great uſe, if in nothing elſe, but in ſerving as Butts and Quivers, to take into them the chiefe firſt ſtormes of the Engliſh Arrowes. Whereas now they themſelves were not onely thus moſt miſerably troden under foot, and put to the ſword, but many of the French Gallants by that occaſion mingled among them, were overthrowne by the Engliſh Arrowes, who equally purſued the deſtruction both of French and Genowayes, ſhooting thickeſt where the tumult and confuſion were greateſt. Some * raſcals alſo following the Engliſh Armie, as they ſaw opportunity, ſtept in among them, and holpe to cut throates, ſparing neither Lord nor lozell.

(94) The French men of Armes halfe out of breath with head-long haſte, and terribly diſordered with the perpetuall ſtormes of ſinging arrowes, were now at hand-ſtrokes with the Princes battle; neither was it long, but that the ſhining Battle-axes, ſwords, lances, and other weapons of our Nation had loſt their ſplendor, being covered with humane gore; which having thirſtily dranke out of enemies wounds, they let fall in bloudy teares. The fight was ſharpe and fierce: but to what purpoſe ſerves writing, if the high reſolution of the King of Bohemia ſhould be unremembred? he (as onely ſeeking an honourable grave for his old age) put himſelfe into the firſt ranke of his owne horſemen, and with full randome charging the Engliſh, was ſlaine with Sword in hand, the troupe of his faithfull followers with their ſlaughtered bodies covering him even in death. There lay this Trophea of the Engliſh Chevalrie, by whoſe fall (evidently ſeene in the ruine of the Bohemian Standard,) his noble ſonne, the Lord Charles of Boheme (lately elected Emperour, whilſt King Lewis was as * yet alive) was wiſely warned to provide for himſelfe, the matter appearing deſperate. For now was Philip himſelfe in perſon, with the full power of his Armie, come to the reſcues of his brother and friends, who were hard at worke (while they had breath) about their dreamed victory, but finding the metall infinitely more tough which they had to deale upon, then they could poſſibly have ſuppoſed, were beaten to the earth in great numbers. The young Prince nevertheleſſe was not without danger, though now the ſecond battell of the Engliſh, for preſervation of their Prince, daſhing in among the enemies, fought moſt couragiouſly.

(95) Therefore King Edward himſelfe was ſent unto, whoſe battle hovered like a tempeſt in a cloud, over which, upon the hillocke of a Wind-mill, with his Helmet on, (which never came off till all was done) he judiciouſly watched, beholding the whole field, and ready to enter into the conflict when juſt neceſſitie ſhould invite. You ſhall heare a moſt noble anſwere: The meſſenger diſpatched from the Earle of Northampton and others * upon a tender reſpect to their young Princes ſafety, having declared to the King, that the Lords required his preſence, for that his ſonne was in danger, * he bad him returne and ſay; Let them ſend no more to me for any adventure that may befall, while my ſonne is alive; but let him either vanquiſh or die, becauſe the honour of this brave day ſhall be his, if GOD ſuffer him to ſurvive.

(96) The Meſſenger returned, and though hee brought not Men to their ſuccours, hee brought ſuch acceſſion of courage and ſpirite, as hee that ſhould ſay that King Edward fayled them at their neede, ſhould neyther underſtand what belongs to magnanimitie, nor the effect of ſuch a checke from ſo excellent a Generall: who neverthleſſe, was maturely watchfull over the good of his Childe and people: On the other ſide King Philip (whoſe quarrell it was) did not forſake the ductie of a noble Chiefe: but ſo long contended in his owne perſon, till his horſe was * ſlaine under him with arrowes, himſelfe * twice diſmounted, and wounded both in the necke and thigh: but then the Lord Iohn of Henault, Earle of of Beaumont, (who had long ſince quit King Edwards ſervice) ſets him againe on horſebacke, and the French (out of a loyall deſire to his preſervation) cried to retire him out of the fight, who rather ſeemed willing to end his dayes in ſo noble company: which voyce was as it were the up-ſhot and laſt gaſpe of that moſt cruell conflict, where none as yet were taken to mercy upon any termes.

After their King had preſerved himſelf, the whole power of the French gave away, and ſought to ſave it ſelfe by flight, whom the Engliſh, warely fighting upon the defenſive, and loath to hazard ſuch a victory, by breaking their rankes to purſue the enemy too farre in the night time, (which now was come upon them,) ſuffered them to bee holden in chaſe by their owne juſt feare, contented to make good their ground, by ſtanding ſtill upon their guard according to true diſcipline. For they ſaw not as yet the bottome of their danger, and knew that there were ſo many eſcaped, as might well ſerve to overwhelme their Army with their multitudes.

(97) King Edward ſeeing the coaſt for the preſent cleare of all his enemies, advanceth with his untoucht battell towards his victorious ſonne, and moſt affectionately embracing and kiſſing him, ſaid; Faire Sonne, God ſend you good perſeverance to ſo proſperous beginnings; you have nobly acquit your ſelfe, and are well worthy to have the Governance of a Kingdome entruſted unto you for your valour. To which the moſt chevalrous of young Princes replyed in ſilence, moſt humbly falling on his knees, before his triumphant father.

(98) Here there may bee ſome controverſie, whether the exemplary manhood of the Engliſh, or their ſingular piety, were more to bee commended: but who will nor infinitely preferre the latter, chiefely in Souldiers, among whom it is uſually moſt wanting? Great was the victory, great was their proweſſe, and great the glory; but they like true Chriſtian Knights and Souldiers, forbare all boaſt, referring the whole thankes and honour of their preſervation to God the true Author thereof. The night was ſo very darke, as if it had mourned for the day-times bloudſhed, therefore they made * ſtore of fires, lighted torches, and candles, carefully tending their wounded companions, and modeſtly rejoycing in their owne faire adventure.

(99) But the next morning preſented new worke; for ſuch a miſt having overſpread the earth, that they could ſcarſe ſee hard at hand, yet were * new ſwarmes of French abroad, who came from ſundry Cities and good Townes, as Roan, Beauvois, &c. to have joyned with King Philip in the deſigned ſpoile of the Engliſh; theſe being met-with by King Edwards people, were in ſundry places overthrowne and ſlaine, and multitudes of ſuch as had loſt their way in the laſt ſtight, were ſeverely put to the ſword, as the Engliſh chanced upon them, * where they lay lurking in hedges, buſhes, and by-wayes: The Earles of Northampton, * Suffolke, and Norfolke, * had the execution of the French which fled from this laſt overthrow, for the ſpace of about nine miles Engliſh from the ground where they encountred.

(100) There was leaſure now to take an account of the ſlaine; which upon the enemies ſide amounted, not onely in the number to very many, but in their quality to very great. For ſearch hereof King Edward cauſed certaine principall commanders, and three Heralds, (who by the Coat-Armours might judge of the perſons, it being then a thing perpetuall and ſolemne not to fight without thoſe ſignes of Nobleſſe,) to take an exact view of the field, who about ſupper-time returning, made report to the King, that they found the dead bodies of * eleven great Princes, and of Barons, Knights, and men of Armes, above * one thouſand, and five hundreth. Among the owners of ſuch bodies as were beaten to the Earth upon the firſt day, theſe are worthily reckoned chiefe: The * King of Bohemia, the King of * Majorca, * Charles Earle of Alanſon, brother-German to King Philip, the Duke of Loraine, * the Duke of Burbon, the * Earle of Flanders, the * Earle of Savoy (both great Princes,) * the Dolphin of Viennois, ſonne to Humbert, the Earle of Sancerre, and Harecourt, (whoſe brother Godfrey in pitty of his houſe, his two Nephewes being ſlaine with their father, forſooke the King of England after this battell, and returned into Grace with the French,) the * Earles of Aumarl, Nevers, &c. ſixe Earles of Almaine; beſide others of great account of all ſorts. Vpon the ſecond day, the Grand Prior of France, who with his Archbiſhop of Roan, had on the behalfe of their Prince and Countrey put on Armes. Of the Commons, in * both of theſe blacke dayes, there fell about thirty thouſand, and ſome fay, foure times more in this laſt, then in the other.

(101) Wee find not one man of honour, or note ſlaine upon the Engliſh ſide, ſo that this victory may ſafely bee accounted among the wonderfull. The * ſpoiles of the Enemies bodies and carriages, King Edward gave wholly to his well-deſerving ſouldiers. The rule of their ſafety (they being in a moſt populous enemy Country) would not permit them to uſe much curteſie to others, as that which might have prooved cruelty to themſelves, but upon the ſecond day they tooke many * priſoners, though none of great name, for they were ſpent in the day before. It pleaſed the Conquerour to proclaime a truce now for three dayes in the Countrey about, that the people might come in to bury their dead; but the bodies of the moſt Noble, hee himſelfe cauſed to bee conveyed to Monſtrael, and there (in his March towards Calis) enterred.

(102) Thus by Gods favour, and the unreſiſtable force of the Engliſh Archers, (who in a manner did * onely fight) was King Edward put into a full and peaceable poſſeſſion of a perfect victory; which after hee had one night onely enjoyed in the Forreſt of Creſcy, hee diſlodged with his conquering hoaſt, and marched ſtraight toward Calis, which hee * preſently inveſted, having decreed never to riſe with his Armie from before it, till without aſſault hee had carried the ſame. For which cauſe he entrenched and fortified his Campe on all ſides, built up * Sheds covered with Reed and Broome, and other places and offices as to dwell in, and ſtopping all reliefe by Sea, (whereof he was Maſter) with his Navie. There commanded in Calis for the French, Sir Iohn de Vienne, * Marſhall of France, and the Lord Dandrehem, with a very ſtrong Garriſon, who concluded, like good men of war, to trie all extremities, rather then to ſurrender the Piece, which was ſo ſtrong, that to aſſault the ſame, otherwiſe then with famine, had beene frivolous. Theſe great Captaines ſeeing King Edwards reſolution, thruſt forth of the Towne (for ſparing of food) their poorer people, above fifteene hundreth; whom hee, like a true Chriſtian Prince, turned not backe upon the Towne, but releeved for Gods cauſe with freſh victuals, and two pence ſterling each; permitting them freely and ſecurely to paſſe through his Campe, to his great glory, and (undoubtedly) profit alſo, having their hearty prayers for his happy ſucceſſe, and God for pay-maſter, and rewarder of ſuch his Beneficence.

(103) Many wayes were thought upon by King Philip to raiſe this obſtinate ſiege: two principall; an Army of French to fight with King Edward, and a diverſion by invaſion, wherein the Scots (their perpetuall allies) were forward. Both in their ſeverall times, were put into execution: That of the Scotiſh invaſion was firſt, but with ſuch ſucceſſe, as well declared it was Gods will (all people having their encreaſings, zeniths, and declinations) that the Engliſh name ſhould now be brought to the verticall poynt thereof without any thing being able to reſiſt it.

with a very great army of threescore and two thousand into England, as farre as Durham, supposing none but Priests and Shepheards were left at home, (considering what great numbers were abroad upon service in Picardie, Britaine, and Gascoigne,) was (upon * Saint Lukes Eve) undertaken and fought withall, his whole army by faire force vanquished, and himselfe taken prisoner at a place by Durham called Nevilles Crosse. Chiefes among the English at this triumphant journey were, * the Archbishop of Yorke, Gilbert Vmfreuile Earle of Angos, William Lord la Zouch, with eight other Lords, Percy, Mowbray, Neuile, Deincourt, Mauley, Leyburne, Scroope, and Musgrave. Sir Robert de Bertram Sheriffe of Northumberland, and other noble Baneretes. In this battell also were many * Priests and Clergy-men of England, to whom necessity for defence of their Countrey, made the bloudy use of Iron and Steele warrantable: nor could the Scots be accused to have lost any thing for want of manhood, specially the King himselfe, who had two speares hanging in his body, his legge almost incurably wounded with an arrow, his sword and weapons beaten out of his hand; who disdeining captivity, invited the English by opprobrious words to kill him, and when John Copland (an Esquire of the North-Country, * Captaine of the Castle of Roxborough in Scotland,) advised him to yeeld, hee stroke him on the face with his Gantlet so fiercely, as that two of his great teeth were smitten out therewith: but seeing he could not force a death but must bee Prisoner, John Copland conveyed him away with eight of his owne servants out of this field. There lay dead upon the ground the * Earles of Murray and Stratherne, the Constable, Marshall, Chamberlaine, and Chancellour of Scotland, with many other Nobles. There were taken Prisoners (beside the King) the Earles of Dowglasse, Fife, Southerland, Wigton, and Menteith. Thus the fortune of King Edward, by the vertue of his valiant subjects, prevailed in every place.

(105) It could not be excused, if wee forgat the Offices of Queene Philip in her Husbands absence; who * being then in England, and great with Child of a Daughter (afterward called * Margaret) rode in Person about the battels of the English, encouraging them with so wife, princely and gracious words, as did not a little sharpen and assure their otherwise fervent courages: which done, shee retired her selfe to Newcastle upon Tine, there to attend the successe, which God would send. After the battell, understanding that King David was taken, shee by letters willed the Esquier to render up his royall Prisoner; which he refusing, she (impatient) sends over a complaint to King Edward: At * whose commandement, repairing to the Campe before Calis, he so discreetly anfwered, that he was sent backe into England with the reward of * 500. pounds land by the yeare, (to lye * where Copland himselfe should chuse, neere to his owne dwelling,) and warrant to deliver up his Prisoner to the Queene, which hee accordingly did at the City of Yorke, with so sober and honest an Apology, as both shee and the Lords of the Councell were satisfied. This Copland (who had lands of King Edwards gift at * Wverston in Lancashire) was also advanced, for this most valiant atchievement, to the dignity of a Knight Banaret, which writers corruptly call a Baronet, Honour having at that time no such kinde of creature. King David was lodged under sure guard in the Tower of London.

(106) Wonder it is to consider, with what golden linkes one good hap was annexed to another, in this full Moone as it were of King Edwards raigne. For within a small compasse of time, all these great atchievements fell. Sir Thomas Dagworth like another * Machabee (saith an Author) with eight hundreth men of Armes, and one hundred Archers, in Britaine overthrew the Lord Charles of Bloys, who having twice in one day with incredible ods in the numbers, (as of above thirty for one,) affailed that brave Knight, was beaten out of the field with marvellous losse of Nobles, and others slaine or taken. Not long after that, the same Sir Thomas also having onely three hundred men of Armes, and foure hundred Archers in his company, affailed the same Lord Charles, lying at siege of Roch-Darien, with twelve hundred Knights and Esquires, sixe hundred other armed men, two thousand Steele bow-men, and of other Infantery great store; and tooke Prisoner the said Lord Charles of Bloys (who as you have heard claimed the Dutchy of Britaine against Montford) driving his whole forces with admirable manhood and great destruction out of the field. This in Britaine.

(107) In Gascoigne the magnificent and noble Henry Earle of Derby, and now (by his Fathers late death) Earle of Lancaster also, pursuing his faire fortunes in Aquitaine, Xantoing, &c. drave John Duke of Normandy, eldest sonne of King Philip, unsought with, from the siege of Aquillon; though it is said, he left it, as * commanded to repaire to his father for the releefe of Calis; hee also tooke sundry places of speciall importance, some by render, some by assault, many profitable prisoners, and rich spoiles, and with triumph returned safe to Burdeaux. Not long before this, at the taking of the good Towne of Brigerac by assault, hee had permitted every souldier to seize any house, and convert all therein to his proper benefit. Hereupon it hapned, that a certaine * Knight or souldier called * Reth, had broken into a Tenement, where the moneys had for safety stowed the money of that Countrey in great long sackes, who (thinking it was not the Generals intention that such a treasure should come to a private share) acquainted the Lord Henry therewith: what was his answer? hee with a Kingly magnificence told him; "That the House, and "all therein were his, according as hee had at first pro- "claimed, let them bee worth (saith hee) what they "would. The party returnes, and while hee is busie in counting his new riches, behold, he finds so much more pure silver in Coyne, that hee could not but once againe acquaint his Generall therewith. What can be added to the honour of the answer which to this effect he now the second time made? "Why tellest "thou me of the greatnesse of the treasure? goe, take and "enjoy it: For to give, and then to take it backe againe, "is childs play: I have once said it, and my word passed, "may not with my honour bee revoked, were it never so "much.

(108) John Duke of Normandy, comming into Picardy, had two repulses and foiles, being driven from the Towne of * Cassels, and Lile, so that King Edwards fortune was availeable, as well to his Confederates as to his owne People: and now, to consummate his glory, the whole power of France, led forth by King Philip to preserve that eye of his Empire, Calis, returned without doing any thing. For when mediators could effect nothing, and Philip would not set up his trust upon battell, lest while hee fought to save a Towne, hee should leese a Kingdome, hee mournefully retired himselfe with losse-full haft into the bosome of France, leaving his desperate Captaines and people in Calis to the Conquerors mercy. So Edward had the Towne delivered unto him, when hee had almost abidden in leaguer before it one whole yeare. The piety of Queene * Philip toward the prisoners selected to dye, and the worthy devovement of some Calisian Townesmen, to that certaine perill, for satisfaction of King Edwards incensed minde, declaring themselves thereby to bee good, true and loyall French-men, are by all Authors celebrated, finding both pitty then, and honour for ever. King Edward having as wisely taken order for safe-keeping of this pretious peece, as hee had constantly endured to carry it, drawing over a substantiall Colony of English-men into it, set faile at last for England, whither with much trouble at Sea (tempests sodenly rising) he at last arrived safe: It is * observed, that hee had alwayes faire weather at his passage into France,

An. Dom. 1348.

(109) Never was the English Name so great, and glorious as at this time, nor did England her-selfe in any fore-going age enjoy a King more renowned for wisedome, chivalry, and felicity in actions; the just brightnesse of his irradiant vertues, not onely adorning her with Garlands, conquered Spoyles, and Trophees, but seeming also (such was the abundance of all things) to infuse fertility into the earth it selfe, like some * new-shining Sunne. Meane while faire France (whose wofull turne it was) fate mournefully weeping, and with great anxietie of mind provided the best thee could against such a deluge of calamities. Neither yet was King Edwards glory at the highest, for God was inclined to make him yet more bounden and beholden. Howbeit as it is a mighty worke to ascend to such an eminencie of renowne, yet when the most of man is knowne and done, let none therefore love themselves, or admire others, for neither hath this world any thing permanent to trust upon, and to God alone belongs the honour. This was found and felt when the celestiall Majestie saw the abuse of his good gifts. It rained from Midsommer till Christmas, and so terrible a plague ranne through the world, that the earth was filled with graves, and the aire with cries: which was seconded with murren of Cattle, and dearth of all things. The plague began among the Turkes, and pierced by degrees into France, where it mowed downe many thousands. In London it had so quicke and sharpe an edge, that in one yeares space, there were buried in one * Church-yard (commonly called the Cistertian, or Charter-house) above fifty thousand. The French notwithstanding practise to recover Calais by bribery, but treason being not true to it selfe, King Edward came sodainely in person, and preserved the inestimable Iewell by policie, and princely manhoode, killing many of them who came upon that blinde adventure.

(110) This invincible King (one great Act over-taking another) hearing that certaine Spanish men of warre, who had in the yeare before cruelly * slaine fundry Englishmen, and taken away their Wines, and other wares, were come into his Seas, hee like a Martiall Neptune encountred them not farre from Winchel-sea in person, with such ships as could then be had; and after a moft bloudy fight, (for there was few or none escaped unmarkt) tooke twenty and sixe of their principall vessels, sunke others, and drave the rest away. The gallantry and spirit of the Spaniards was such, that disdaining to over-live the disgrace of having preserved their lives by yeelding, they * all of them to a man either dyed upon the English weapons, or were drowned in the waves. Thus was King Edward dignified with another Navall Crowne. In this * yeare Philip de Valoys having raigned about three and twenty yeares, dyed. And the yeare ensuing, King Edward, as formerly hee had changed the stampe of his Seale, so changed the stampe of his Coines, coining (by advise of William de Edington Bishop of Winchester, and High Treasurer of England) the groat, and halfe groat, whereas before there was * no silver-coine, but the sterlings onely.

(111) Let us draw King Edwards manifold actions closer together: under his fortune and auspicie, Sir Walter de * Bendeley had in little Britaine (whereof hee was * Warden) a faire day of the Marshall of France, Putting his puissance to flight with much slaughter. Thirteene Lords, one hundreth and forty Knights, one hundreth Esquiers and store of common Souldiers were killed: nine Lords, and one hundreth, and forty Knights and Esquiers taken prisoners; which bred great astonishment among all King Edwards enemies. Neither had the French in other places better fortune, saving that somewhat before, Sir * Raoul de Cahors slew in a skirmish the thrice valiant Sir Thomas Dagworth, and about one hundreth men of Armes with him. Henry Earle of Lancaster and Derby, in honour of his princely bloud, and reward of service, was created Duke of Lancaster: the new Dukes first peaceable employment, was his journey, together with Richard Earle of Arundel, the Bishops of London and Norwich, and Guy de Brian, to the Romane Court, there to see that Instrument of a finall peace, which had beene drawne and sworne unto betweene the two Kings, confirmed (as it was agreed) before the Pope; but by the Coven of the French (as our * Writers impute) and the popes Connivency, who favoured the keeping of France entire, all proved but vapour, and the voyage fruitlesse. King Edward greatly kindled herewith, determined to take deepe revenge, and (as Walsingham and others write) entred then presently with an Armie, and wasted France.

(112) The Staple of Wools which had beene in Flanders, King Edward about this time revoked, establishing the same in Westminster, Canterbury, Chichester, Bristol, Lincolne, and Hull. He did not this (as is probable) without some spleene, as well for the * death of his deare friend Iaques Arteville, as for that the young Earle of Flanders had dishonoured him, by * flying into France out of Gaunt, when hee should have married his daughter.

(113) It had moreover beene signified to King Edward, that John the new King of France (his Father being dead) had given to Charles the Dolphin the Dutchie of Aquitaine: whereupon being exceedingly incensed, hee bestowed the same upon his own sonne, the Prince of Wales; commanding him to defend that right with his sword against his adversaries. All things being ready for his voyage, and having the Earles of Warwicke, Suffolke, Salisbury, and Oxford; the Lords, * Chandoys, Audley, * Butefort, Lile, &c. A thousand men of Armes, as many Archers, with others, hee set saile towards Aquitaine, where he betooke himselfe to doe things worthy of his Name and courage.

(114) On the other side King Edward, stirred with a false Alarum, crost over the Seas, in hope to find his enemy King John at Saint Omers, but failing thereof, hee burnt up to Hesdin, and came backe into England to recover Berwicke, which the Scots had gotten with * mutuall flaughter by surprise. He called a Parliament at Westminster, where toward the furniture of his hostile designes, hee had extraordinary Subsidy granted unto him for sixe yeeres next to come. But Berwicke before King Edward could present himselfe before it with his mighty hoast, was * burnt and dismantled, and then by the Scots abandoned. The French had sent into Scotland forty thousand Crownes of the Sunne, and some men of Armes to maintaine them, in enmity against the English, while as yet their King David the second was prisoner; but King Edward, not contented to have regained his owne, unlesse he made his adversaries smart for their provocations, proceeded in hostile manner against the Scots, both by land and sea. At Roxbrough the Baliol * surrendred to King Edward all the right and title which hee had to the Crowne of Scotland, or any the appurtenances, referring onely to himselfe a yearely pension of * two thousand and fifty pounds.

sand olde Crownes. The Pope sending a Messenger from Avignion, with an overture to intercede for a peace, had answere, that the message must bee sent to the King his father, for he could not meddle without commandement from him. Meane-while hee disposed of things without impeachment, and returnes laden with honor and spoyles to Burdeaux, where the Winter being spent, he sets forth to new adventures. He had in his Army about eight thousand brave, expert, and well disciplined Souldiers, and with them advanceth through Perigort, and Limosin into the bosome of France, up to the very gates of Burgesse in Berie; the terror of his name flying before, to his great advantage. Thus satisfied for the present, he wheeles about with purpose to returne by Remorantine in Blasois (which hee tooke) and so through the Country of Turain, Poictou, and Saintoin to his chiefe City Burdeaux. But John King of France (hasting to goe beyond his father in misfortune) having assembled a compleate hoast, followed, and about the City of Poictiers overtooke the invincible Prince.

The Prince doth things more commendable then his victory.

The English victory at Poictiers, 19. Septem. 1356.

(115) When the Armies (with the ods of sixe to one against the English) were embattelled, two Cardinals sent from Pope [a] Clement, laboured (as they had done before) to take up the quarrell without stroke, whereunto the Prince was with reason yeelding enough, but King John fatally presuming on his advantage, propounded such conditions, as if in a manner the Prince of Wales had already beene at his command; which with just indignation were rejected. It came hereupon to a most bloudy triall, where (if ever) the Prince and English gave full experiment of their valour; for after long conflict and absolute discomfiture of all the 3. French battels, (the least of which exceeded all the Princes numbers) the King himselfe valiantly fighting, and Philip his [b] yongest sonne (who with such boldnesse and zeale defended his distressed father, as it purchased unto him the Honourable surname of Hardie) were taken prisoners.

(116) The English whose valiancy was most conspicuous, were the Earles of Warwicke, Suffolke, Salisbury, Oxford, and Stafford, the Lords Cobham, Spenser, Audley, Berkley, Basset, &c. of Gascoigne, subjects to the Crowne of England, the Capitall de Beuf; the Lord Pumier, Chaumont, with others of lower title, but not of unequall valour. [c] Iames Lord Audley wanne immortall renowne at this bloudy battell, where hee received many wounds, and shared the Princes gift of 500. Markes land in Fee-simple, to his foure Esquiers, who had continued with him in all the brunt and fury of danger. It is the misfortune or glory of the French Nobles, that in all great battels the losse fals heavily upon them. In this most disastrous overthrow, there fell [d] fifty and two Lords, and about seaventeene hundreth knights, Esquiers, and Gentlemen bearing coates of Armes: The chiefe Lords were Peter of Bourbon Duke of Athens, high Constable of France, John Clermont Marshall, George of Charney, Lord great Chamberlaine, &c. and as many other as made up the former account. [e] Sir Reginold Camian, who that day bare the Oriflamb, was likewise slaine: of the common Souldiers there died about six thousand: Great God of victories, how abundantly diddest thou in these daies blesse thine English? The list of Prisoners comprehended these great names, John, King of France, Philip his sonne, afterward Duke of Burgoin; The Archbishop of Sens; Iames of Burbon, Earle of Ponthieu; John of Artois, Earle of Eu; Charles his brother, Earle of Longueville; Charles, Earle of Vendosme; The Earles of Tankervile, Salbruch, Nassaw, Dampmartine, La Roch, and many other great Lords, and about [f] two thousand Knights, Esquiers, and Gentlemen bearing Armories. (117) Now albeit nothing wanted to the title of a perfect victory, yet in two poynts the incomparable Prince out-went that fame and merite; for having vanquished the person of the French Monarch by force of battell, hee much more overcame his heart with true and princely curtesie, delivering his minde in a stile and kinde of eloquence so ponderous, proper, grave, and naturall, and with that stately humility, as onely the best soule, with the best breeding could be capable of; and yet [h] hee spake not more officiously then he performed really. More then all this. The next day causing his Chapleins and the other Priests of the Armie, to celebrate divine service, hee put off from himselfe the whole glory, and gave it most devoutly to [i] God; which being first done, he, in the sight and hearing of the Prisoners, highly commends, and most heartily thankes his Souldiers, with speeches full of sincerity and life, scaling his words to every one, as his present meanes would permit, with liberall deeds and largesse.

under the title of serving the Navarrois. To be briefe, all France swarmed with dissolute souldiers of sundry Nations, which having no Generall, made havocke at their pleasure. They were called people without an head, and by innumerable insolencies made the wretchednesse of Anarchy apparant. In England also swarmed another sort, no lesse burthenous to the Common-wealth and Church, which were the foure orders of Franciscan Fryers; whom the * English Clergy found to be so pernicious to the regiment of the Church, that they selected that renowned Clerke Richard Fitz-Ralph (who was Chancellour, of the Vniversitie of Oxford, Archbishop of Armagh, and Primate of Ireland) to appeare in person before the Pope, and there alleage the * intollerable harmes by them accrewing to the Laity, the Clergy, and the Vniversities, together with their disobedience to Gods Word, their avarice, and pride. All which that noble Prelate learnedly performed, as appeareth by the handling of his 9. propositions against them, which are extant. In his second proposition, hee sheweth, how ordinary a matter it was with them, to allure youth, without consent of their parents, to enter their Orders; which made men withdraw their sons from the Vniversities, lest the Fryars should so steale them away; whereby (saith hee) it came to passe, that * Whereas in his owne time there were thirty thousand Students in Oxford, soone after there were left but sixe thousand. But how infinitely these Fryarly swarmes encreased in all lands, may appeare by that * strange offer made by the Generall of this one Order, to Pope Pius, who promised to bring him (being then about a Turkish Expedition) thirty thousand cunning warriors, out of the number of Saint Francis Fryars, and yet enough should remaine at home to performe the devotions. But the Pope had such use of those Fryars, that Armachanus prevailed not in the matter, * Though he prooved the cause stoutly and manifestly against them, because (ah for pitty, saith our Author) the Clergy flucke not close as they promised, and the Fryars had great store of money to procure favour in the Court of Rome. But here in the English Court, two Cardinals, (one of them, he of Pierregost, who had so diligently travelled for a conclusion at the battell of Poictiers) could not with two yeares labour, draw any thing to such an head, as the French would, for their Kings deliverance, performe; which put King Edward into a new resolution against France.

(121) King Edward (holding himselfe deluded by the French) with a fleete of eleven hundred Saile passeth over from Sandwich to a new invasion. Hee arrived at Callis, from whence he set forward in three great battels, whereof the first, being least, was under Henry Duke of Lancaster, the second being greater, under the brave Prince of Wales, and the last which was greatest, was led by King Edward himselfe. They marched through [a] Artois to the City of Rheims in Champain, where the Kings of France use to be crowned and annoynted. The City of [b] Sens (an Archbishops See) and Nevers doe yeeld without resistance. The [c] Duke of Burgundy, for two [d] hundreth thousand florens of gold, obtained that all Burgundy was spared from sackage or spoile. It was told the King, that the Normans had landed at Winchelsea in the time of divine service, and among other their most impious outrages, a like execrable villany, as that which the Gibeonites, (sonnes of Belial) are recorded to have committed upon the [e] Levites wife, was more wickedly perpetrated by them in the Church it selfe, where the woman, being of singular beauty, was by their insatiable violations murthered; and they got backe to their Ships before the Countrey could rise upon them to take due vengeance. Hereupon [f] King Edward presently raised his Standard, and set forth out of Champain, (where not farre from the City of Rheims hee had [g] kept his Christmas) toward Paris.

(122) Hee came before it with his army divided into [h] nine Battalions, where hee honoured foure hundred Esquiers and Gentlemen with the Order of Knighthood. Charles the Dolphin, Regent of France, was within Paris with a great force, but could not by any meanes bee drawne to hazard battell. There were ample conditions in humble manner tendred to Edward, but hee was yet instexible and deafe against any other, then such as himselfe (like a Conquerour) propounded. Paris (up to whose [i] very walls King Edward ranne) not being seisible, he [k] retires into Britaine to refresh his Army, but upon his returne finding it stronger then before, hee turnes his wrath into the very bowels of France, exercising hostile Actions up as farre as [l] Charters, and Orleans, and as yet continued inexorable. God was displeased thereat, and to let Edward know so much, hee caused the Minister of his wrath, a terrible tempest, to assaile his Hoast, and [m] to kill therein many both men and horses. King Edward is [n] said, upon this occasion, to be so wounded with remorse, that repairing to our Lady-Church of Charters, hee prostrated himself to God, and sorrowing for the bloudshed and wastfull burning which hee had made, vowed to give quiet to the Christian world upon equall conditions. This, and the Duke of Lancasters perswasions, softned him so, that finally (by mediation of the Popes [o] Legate, one Simon de Langres) a peace was concluded at Bretagny neere to Charters upon the [p] eight of May; and in November following King John himselfe was transported to Calis, and there by King Edward (according to the Capitulations of the Treaty) set at liberty, after hee had beene a prisoner above foure yeares.

(123) Articles of this accord, so necessary for the distressed Estate of France were these. 1. That (to the intent these conditions which the French condescended unto, should be more forceable, and not seeme to be extorted by advantage, ods, or iniquity of the times) the two Edwards, Father and Sonne, should for ever release to King John, and to his heires, all the right and claime which they had to the [q] Crowne of France, [r] to the Dutchy and Estates of Normandy, Anjou, Turain, and Main, as also to the homages of Britaine, Armoricke, and the Earledome of Flanders. 2. That King John and his Sonne, for them and their heires, should by a day certaine restore, and release to King Edward and his heires, &c. the whole Country of Aquitaine, enlarged with the bordering and spacious Countries of Saintoin, Poyctou, Pierregost, Limosin, Quercy, Angolesin, Rovergne, &c with all the Cities, Castles, and appurtenances, to bee holden free, without any dependency but of God. 3. That the [s] County of Ponthieu (the proper inheritance of Isabel late Queene Dowager of England Mother of King Edward) the Townes, Countries, and Lordships of Callis, Guines, Mountril, Haim, Wale, Oye, Merck, S. Valary, &c. and all the Ilands which either the English then held, or which lay before any of the Premisses, with onely certaine limitations concerning private mens interest, should remaine in like freedome as the rest of the premisses to the Crowne of England. 4. That King John should pay for his ransome (part thereof to bee in hand, and part upon dayes) the sum of [t] thirty hundreth thousand scutes of Gold, every two of which should bee [u] sixe shillings and eight pence sterling. And that for assurance there should bee assigned a certaine number of Hostages (by King Edward named) to remaine in England. 5. That the French should not ayde, nor assist the Scots against the English, nor they the Flemings against the French. 6. That it should bee lawfull for either King notwithstanding to ayde the Titlers for the Dutchy of Britaine at their pleasures. There were sundry other Articles, as in cases of so transcendent quality must needs happen, but as these were principall, so the moth of them might have beene well left out here, unlesse they had more exactly beene observed by the French. Yet were they ratified with hands, seales, and Oathes at [x] Calis, where the two Kings, in stead of kissing the Pax at Masse (either having for honours-sake refused to take it first) [y] saluted each the other with a

(124) The Hostages were absolutely of the greatest Princes, and Lords of France, * Lewis Duke of Anjou, and Iohn Duke of Bery, sonnes to King Iohn; Philip Duke of Orleance, the Kings brother, and Philip Duke of Burgoin: besides * nine principall Earles, twelve great Lords, and certaine * Burgesses out of every good Towne; which were all to remaine in England, and accordingly did remaine: and Ambassadors were sent from both the Kings, to advertise the * Pope of the whole happy conclusion.

(125) Not long after, the Prince of Wales was created Duke of Aquitaine, and for the same did homage and fealty to his Father; so that he was Prince of Wales, Duke of Aquitaine, and Cornwall, and Earle of Chester and Kent; this last by Ioane his wife, daughter and heire of Edmund Earle of Kent. Laden with this new honour, he, together with his dearest wife, and whole Court, sailed into Gascoigne, where at Burdeaux he remained.

(126) Now was this renowned Monarch Edward the Great, King of England, upon the day of Saint Brice, (the day * on which by King Etheldreds commandement all the Danes in England were murthered,) aged fifty yeares; at which time a Parliament (where * none were permitted to appeare by Proxy) was holden at Westminster upon prorogation. Therefore to make the memory of his birth day acceptable by acts of gracious goverment, as in a yeare of Iubilee, he granted his generall and speciall pardon to offenders without fine or Fee-paying for the Seale, set Prisoners at liberty, revoked such as were in banishment. Moreover, upon the grievances of his people, pestred with the doublings of Lawyers, hee commanded, that * Pleas should from thenceforth be made in English, not in French, a necessary Law, if it had beene as carefully observed, especially, if withall hee had ordered the same should not be written also in French, that his people might know their owne duties. It is observed that the Law of Magna Charta (confirmed also in this Parliament) was about a dozen severall times confirmed by this King during the yeares of his raigne. That which * another notes by occasion of this Iubilee, we would not omit; for the famous custome of our Kings, who upon Maunday Thursday in imitation of Christ, wash, feede and cloath as many poore, as themselves are yeares old, is referred to this celebration which King Edward made of his fiftieth yeare, in regard of the number fed, which number he cals the Iubilee of their ages: but as hee imparted Grace to his people, so hee also tooke order to replenish his purse. That seldome or never the poore Commons have any thing which they pay not for.

(127) The estate of our great Edward thus flourishing, hither (upon sundry occasions) Iohn King of France, David King of Scots, who had lately both of them beene Prisoners in England, and Guy of Lusignan, King of Cyprus came in person. The French Kings affaire was, the more commodiously to transact for the remaine of his ransome, the discharge of his pledges, and other things. Guy of Lusignan King of Cyprus (by that right which as you have * heard before, his Ancestor had by donation and investiture from Richard the first, King of England) negotiated his own relicfe, under the just Title of the common cause of Christianity, so fearefully by the prevailing Turkes empaired in the Easterne world, and not long after departed hence. Iohn King of France * had promised to Pope Vrban (at Avinion) his personall ayde in the holy warre, but was prevented by death, which * seized upon him here in England at the Savoy. From, whence by the piety of Charles his sonne, then King of France, his body was in most royall manner conveyed to Dover, at the King of Englands voluntary charge, and enrombed among his fore-fathers at S. Denys with all funerall majesty, nor farre off from the Soveraigne City Paris, seat of the French Monarchs, as the other their place of Sepulture. Likewise Ione Queene of Scots, comming into England (with her husband belike) * deceased here.

(128) That King Edwards fortune was not onely availeable to himselfe, or to his Lieutenants, but also to his friends and favourites, appeared in the great quarrell about the title of Britaine Armoricke, which about this time was determined by the death of the Lord Charles Earle of Bloys, head of the one faction, (but willing to have ended it by word, not by the sword, if hee could have prevailed with his wife) who was slaine in an encounter made against the Lord Iohn de Montford, head of the other side, where the * Lord William Latimer, * Sir Iohn Chandoys, Sir Hugh Calverly, with other of the English, which stucke to Montford, wanne much honour. This field was fought at Aurey not farre from Vannes in low Britaine. After * which (having performed certaine estates to the widow of the Lord Charles, a man of singular sanctimony and integrity of life) hee did homage to Charles King of France, and was accepted Duke of Britaine, with consent of the King of England, his speciall raiser and protectour. The * losse was great upon the enemies side; for there were slaine besides the said Earle of Bloys, (Montfords competitor) the Lord Iohn his brother, and sixe Lords with many other of speciall note; * Walsingham saith about a thousand men of Armes and Esquiers: and there were taken Iohn and Guy the Earles sonnes, and nine other Lords, and of those whose fame for chevalry countervailed halfe the rest; Sir Bertram de Glequin Marshall of France, under the banner of Sir Iohn Chandoys.

(129) In the * meane space, from what part of the World did not the English bring testimonies of their valour: for such as had warred under the Cypriot King against the Turkes, and taken a part of Alexandria in Ægypt, returned with much riches in cloths of gold, velvets, and pretious stone. About these times and long after also, Sir Iohn Haucut (or Hawkwood) that valiant man of Armes, made his owne name, and his Countrimens the English, very honourable by martiall vertue in sundry parts of Italy. And as their valour was one way seene beyond the Alpes, so there fell out occasions not long after, which made it knowne another way, beyond the mountaines Pyrenen.

(130) The family of the Lord Edward, Prince of Wales, who lived in Burdeaux, was now with great honour encreased: for his dearely loved wife, who the last yeare bare unto him Edward his first borne, (which lived but feaven yeares after) bare unto him a second sonne, for whom Richard King of Navarre, and * Iames King of Majorca undertooke, as Godfathers, giving him to name Richard. The companies of Soudiers, most of whose Chiefes were English by birth or obedience, having now no employment, because the warres of Britaine were appeased for the present, ranged desperately over France; but it was not long before Sir Bertram de Glequin (having paid his ransome) had meanes to draw the more part of that military Pestilence into another Coast: for, by the assistance of Peter King of Arragon, the banished Earles, and the power of Glequin, with the floting Bands, called the Companions or Adventurers; Peter King of Castile and Leon was driven out of his Kingdome, his bastard brother Henry chosen and crowned King of Spaine at Burgos.

(131) This Peter was * sonne to Alfonse the eleaventh King of Castile, and had to wife a French Lady called Blanch, daughter to Peter Duke of Burbon, who was father also of Ioan the French Kings wife. His tyrannicall cruelties, by the Spanish Stories, are reported so foule, and so many, that they * scarce suffer Nero or Caligula to goe before him; though hee were otherwise a Prince, who had such parts of mind (saith Rodericus) as doe set forth and adorne the Owner, but cannot make him happy. His naturall bloud-thirstinesse was encreased and precipitated, some say, by the magicall practises of Maria de Padilla his concubine, who (calumniously * charging the Queene with that which her selfe acted,) by meanes of a Iew so enchanted a rich Girdle of King Peters, which Queene Blanch had given him, that the next time he ware it, the same * appeared to himselfe and the beholders like a snake. This cursed disciple of * Iannes and Jambres, hated the vertuous Queene, for that she had so prevailed with Don Pedro her husband, that no Iew was suffered to beare office, or enjoy any favours in Court, neither wanted shee much of expelling them wholly out of Spaine. But by this practise Maria de Padilla (who * some erroneously say was a Iew) got all the King to her selfe, and so persecuted the innocent Queene, that it was not long before she dyed, the Popes intercessions failing to effect any good with the Tyrant. The Nobles of Spaine, who laboured to have brought her againe into deserved grace, are by him pursued as fautors of her supposed witchcrafts. Other things also whetted him to savage and Turkish Butcheries, as thirst of Gold, and somewhat which had by divellish arts beene fore-told him concerning his end. His brothers, kinsfolke, Nobles, and others, he causelesly massacreth or forceth to seeke their safeguard by flight, among which the Lord Henry, his forefaid bastard brother was one. Peter notwithstanding was in the truth and right of blood King of Spaine, but his faid brother (a Gentleman in whom nothing was to be taxed, but that which he was not to be blamed for, his birth) being worthily popular and potent, had now obtained both the Title of King, and possession of the Crowne.

(132) Peter, before this hapned, so soon as his wife Queene Blanch was dead childlesse, * married his late Concubine Maria de Padilla, a woman of a noble house, though not so rarely honest, as to refuse the unlawfull love of a King: who having issue by her Alfonso a sonne (who dyed young) and three daughters * Constance, Beatrix, and Isabel, made to her and them the best amends he could for what was passed. It is the fitter this truth should appeare, for that within a few yeares after, Iohn Duke of Lancaster, one of the sonnes of England, married Constance the eldest sister, claiming the Crowne of Castilla in her right, as * the Earle of Cambridge had another, and for that * come (either through hatred of a wicked Tyrant, or through haft or misinformation) have in many points foully erred, and in particular, untruly leaving upon the Lady the Title of a Strumpet, who was honested by lawfull matrimony. Divers notwithstanding of * the Spanish Lords, like good subjects acknowledged their duty to Peter (though a most violent Prince) nor could the usurper Henry, but by deepely impairing the revenewes of the Crowne of Spaine with immoderate gifts, winne any of them. Peter thus driven from his kingdome, with his Wife, Children, and (if * some say true) but one servant, repaires to the Prince of Wales (at * Bayon) that is, to honour and humanitie ie selfe: who seeing it a dangerous president against all lawfull Kings, that any one should be so dethroned, and not looking into his vices but his right; signified the same to his father: who enjoynes him to aide Don Peter, so that now the Prince, (burning with desire of renowne) (upon truft of pay for his Armie and of other commodities by King Peter, when he should be re-established in his throne) is ready to passe into Spaine.

(133) Hee makes his way through the famous straights of Rouncevallux in Navarre by permission of the King thereof, who * yet suffered himselfe (as most men write) to be taken prisoner by the French, and carried into Castile, that he might not in person seeme to crosse the French Kings designes on the behalfe of the usurper Henry. The Prince of Wales had with him an Armie of about thirtie thousand men, and in his company, besides most of all the prime Captaines of the English, there were in person two Kings, Peter of Castile, whose the quarrell was, and the King of Majorca, and Iohn Duke of Lancaster, who some while after Don Petro his death writ himselfe King of Castile and Leon. On the other side King Henry for defence of his new Diadem, had assembled a very great number, aswell of French (under Glequin their famous Captaine) as of Castilians and other, both Christians and Sarazens, not fewer then foure-score, or an hundreth thousand. Vpon the Borders of Castile it came to a battell; where the Prince of Wales obtained a very great victory, killing many thousands of his enemies. Henry himselfe * was wounded in the groine, but escaped. There were taken the Earle of Dene, * Bertram de Glequin himselfe (who shortly after by paying a great ransome had libertie) the Marshall Dandrehen and many others. Neither was it lesse worth to King Peter then a Kingdome, for the most noble Edward left him not, till he had set him in Burgos upon his throne againe.

(134) But his fallhood and ingraritude were monstrous: For the Prince notwithstanding his so great goodnesse extended towards him, was enforced to returne to Burdeaux without money wherewith to pay his army, which was the cause of exceeding great mischiefe to himselfe, and to the English dominions beyond the Seas; as if God had beene displeased for succouring such a Tyrant. The Prince to pay his fouldiers (who were not able to tarry King Peters leasure) coyned even his plate, and when all would not serve, fought to lay upon his Subjects in Gascoigne and thereabout, a new taxation, which bred a most dangerous revolt. God notwithstanding found out Peter, for it was not long but his bastard brother Henry returned with new forces, and by the aide of Glequin and the French, hee both thrust him againe from the Throne, and * murthered him also with his owne hand. The Prince of Wales himselfe was in this journey poisoned (as * was thought) for he never after had his health. Duke Iohn his brother is not freed * from the suspition of having hastened the Princes end, but whether it is meant of any practise at this time or no, appeares not.

(135) Now began the peace betweene England and France to unsettle and untwine. For while King Edward rejoyced in the excellent vertues and actions of his sonnes and people; Charles the fifth, King of France, warned by so manifold calamities, as his Dominions had sustained by the English in faire warre, and yet most earnestly coveting to recover the honour of his Nation, betakes himselfe wholly to other arts and traines; never adventuring his owne person, but executing all his designes by Deputie, wherein the fervice of Bertram de Glequin Constable of France stood him most in stead: neither neglected he before hand to lay up colours wherewith to over-paint his * collusions and devices for saving his honour; insomuch that when it came to scanning, the losse was clearely upon King Edwards side, and the cause of the breach made at least-wise doubtfull. His practises notwithstanding were palpable, and it must be confessed that our truly noble King (without suspition of craft) reposing himselfe upon the rules of * magnanimitie, did not reape the stable effects of so great and important victories, nor of a peace so ceremoniously made, that (in the worlds opinion) it might never bee infringed without the manifest breach upon one side of all bonds both divine and humane. The Prince of Wales by Letters advised his father not to trust to any faire words, nor overtures of farther amitie made by the French, because he said they entertained practises under-hand, in every place against him. But the Prince was * judged to speake out of a restlesse humour, delighting in warre, and therefore prevailed not. The effects disclosed that his words were true.

(136) For now King Charles surnamed the wise, having by quicke paiments, and by one meanes or other gotten home all the hostages which had beene empledged for performance of the Articles of peace before mentioned, sets all his wits on worke to abate

His brothers, kinsfolke, Nobles, and others, he causelesly massacreth or forceth to seeke their safeguard by flight, among which the Lord Henry, his forefaid bastard brother was one. Peter notwithstanding was in the truth and right of blood King of Spaine, but his faid brother (a Gentleman in whom nothing was to be taxed, but that which he was not to be blamed for, his birth) being worthily popular and potent, had now obtained both the Title of King, and possession of the Crowne.

(132) Peter, before this hapned, so soon as his wife Queene Blanch was dead childlesse, * married his late Concubine Maria de Padilla, a woman of a noble house, though not so rarely honest, as to refuse the unlawfull love of a King: who having issue by her Alfonso a sonne (who dyed young) and three daughters * Constance, Beatrix, and Isabel, made to her and them the best amends he could for what was passed. It is the fitter this truth should appeare, for that within a few yeares after, Iohn Duke of Lancaster, one of the sonnes of England, married Constance the eldest sister, claiming the Crowne of Castilla in her right, as * the Earle of Cambridge had another, and for that * come (either through hatred of a wicked Tyrant, or through haft or misinformation) have in many points foully erred, and in particular, untruly leaving upon the Lady the Title of a Strumpet, who was honested by lawfull matrimony. Divers notwithstanding of * the Spanish Lords, like good subjects acknowledged their duty to Peter (though a most violent Prince) nor could the usurper Henry, but by deepely impairing the revenewes of the Crowne of Spaine with immoderate gifts, winne any of them. Peter thus driven from his kingdome, with his Wife, Children, and (if * some say true) but one servant, repaires to the Prince of Wales (at * Bayon) that is, to honour and humanitie ie selfe: who seeing it a dangerous president against all lawfull Kings, that any one should be so dethroned, and not looking into his vices but his right; signified the same to his father: who enjoynes him to aide Don Peter, so that now the Prince, (burning with desire of renowne) (upon truft of pay for his Armie and of other commodities by King Peter, when he should be re-established in his throne) is ready to passe into Spaine.

(133) Hee makes his way through the famous straights of Rouncevallux in Navarre by permission of the King thereof, who * yet suffered himselfe (as most men write) to be taken prisoner by the French, and carried into Castile, that he might not in person seeme to crosse the French Kings designes on the behalfe of the usurper Henry. The Prince of Wales had with him an Armie of about thirtie thousand men, and in his company, besides most of all the prime Captaines of the English, there were in person two Kings, Peter of Castile, whose the quarrell was, and the King of Majorca, and Iohn Duke of Lancaster, who some while after Don Petro his death writ himselfe King of Castile and Leon. On the other side King Henry for defence of his new Diadem, had assembled a very great number, aswell of French (under Glequin their famous Captaine) as of Castilians and other, both Christians and Sarazens, not fewer then foure-score, or an hundreth thousand. Vpon the Borders of Castile it came to a battell; where the Prince of Wales obtained a very great victory, killing many thousands of his enemies. Henry himselfe * was wounded in the groine, but escaped. There were taken the Earle of Dene, * Bertram de Glequin himselfe (who shortly after by paying a great ransome had libertie) the Marshall Dandrehen and many others. Neither was it lesse worth to King Peter then a Kingdome, for the most noble Edward left him not, till he had set him in Burgos upon his throne againe.

(134) But his fallhood and ingraritude were monstrous: For the Prince notwithstanding his so great goodnesse extended towards him, was enforced to returne to Burdeaux without money wherewith to pay his army, which was the cause of exceeding great mischiefe to himselfe, and to the English dominions beyond the Seas; as if God had beene displeased for succouring such a Tyrant. The Prince to pay his fouldiers (who were not able to tarry King Peters leasure) coyned even his plate, and when all would not serve, fought to lay upon his Subjects in Gascoigne and thereabout, a new taxation, which bred a most dangerous revolt. God notwithstanding found out Peter, for it was not long but his bastard brother Henry returned with new forces, and by the aide of Glequin and the French, hee both thrust him againe from the Throne, and * murthered him also with his owne hand. The Prince of Wales himselfe was in this journey poisoned (as * was thought) for he never after had his health. Duke Iohn his brother is not freed * from the suspition of having hastened the Princes end, but whether it is meant of any practise at this time or no, appeares not.

(135) Now began the peace betweene England and France to unsettle and untwine. For while King Edward rejoyced in the excellent vertues and actions of his sonnes and people; Charles the fifth, King of France, warned by so manifold calamities, as his Dominions had sustained by the English in faire warre, and yet most earnestly coveting to recover the honour of his Nation, betakes himselfe wholly to other arts and traines; never adventuring his owne person, but executing all his designes by Deputie, wherein the fervice of Bertram de Glequin Constable of France stood him most in stead: neither neglected he before hand to lay up colours wherewith to over-paint his * collusions and devices for saving his honour; insomuch that when it came to scanning, the losse was clearely upon King Edwards side, and the cause of the breach made at least-wise doubtfull. His practises notwithstanding were palpable, and it must be confessed that our truly noble King (without suspition of craft) reposing himselfe upon the rules of * magnanimitie, did not reape the stable effects of so great and important victories, nor of a peace so ceremoniously made, that (in the worlds opinion) it might never bee infringed without the manifest breach upon one side of all bonds both divine and humane. The Prince of Wales by Letters advised his father not to trust to any faire words, nor overtures of farther amitie made by the French, because he said they entertained practises under-hand, in every place against him. But the Prince was * judged to speake out of a restlesse humour, delighting in warre, and therefore prevailed not. The effects disclosed that his words were true.

(136) For now King Charles surnamed the wise, having by quicke paiments, and by one meanes or other gotten home all the hostages which had beene empledged for performance of the Articles of peace before mentioned, sets all his wits on worke to abate most brotherly embracement and loving kisse.

(124) The Hostages were absolutely of the greatest Princes, and Lords of France, * Lewis Duke of Anjou, and Iohn Duke of Bery, sonnes to King Iohn; Philip Duke of Orleance, the Kings brother, and Philip Duke of Burgoin: besides * nine principall Earles, twelve great Lords, and certaine * Burgesses out of every good Towne; which were all to remaine in England, and accordingly did remaine: and Ambassadors were sent from both the Kings, to advertise the * Pope of the whole happy conclusion.

(125) Not long after, the Prince of Wales was created Duke of Aquitaine, and for the same did homage and fealty to his Father; so that he was Prince of Wales, Duke of Aquitaine, and Cornwall, and Earle of Chester and Kent; this last by Ioane his wife, daughter and heire of Edmund Earle of Kent. Laden with this new honour, he, together with his dearest wife, and whole Court, failed into Gascoigne, where at Burdeaux he remained.

(126) Now was this renowned Monarch Edward the Great, King of England, upon the day of Saint Brice, (the day * on which by King Ethelredes commandement all the Danes in England were murthered,) aged fifty yeares; at which time a Parliament (where * none were permitted to appeare by Proxy) was holden at Westminster upon prorogation. Therefore to make the memory of his birth day acceptable by acts of gracious goverment, as in a yeare of Iubilee, he granted his generall and speciall pardon to offenders without fine or Fee-paying for the Seale, set Prisoners at liberty, revoked such as were in banishment. Moreover, upon the grievances of his people, prefred with the doublings of Lawyers, hee commanded, that * Pleas should from thenceforth be made in English, not in French, a necessary Law, if it had beene as carefully observed, especially, if withall hee had ordered the same should not be written also in French, that his people might know their owne duties. It is observed that the Law of Magna Charta (confirmed also in this Parliament) was about a dozen severall times confirmed by this King during the yeares of his raigne. That which * another notes by occasion of this Iubilee, we would not omit; for the famous custome of our Kings, who upon Maunday Thursday in imitation of Christ, wash, feede and cloath as many poore, as themselves are yeares old, is referred to this celebration which King Edward made of his fiftieth yeare, in regard of the number fed, which number he cals the Iubilee of their ages: but as hee imparted Grace to his people, so hee also tooke order to replenish his purse. That feldome or never the poore Commons have any thing which they pay not for.

(127) The estate of our great Edward thus flourishing, hither (upon sundry occasions) Iohn King of France, David King of Scots, who had lately both of them beene Prisoners in England, and Guy of Lusignian, King of Cyprus came in person. The French Kings affaire was, the more commodiously to transact for the remaine of his ransome, the discharge of his pledges, and other things. Guy of Lusignian King of Cyprus (by that right which as you have * heard before, his Ancestor had by donation and investiture from Richard the first, King of England) negotiated his own relief, under the just Title of the common cause of Christianity, so fearefully by the prevailing Turkes empaired in the Easterne world, and not long after departed hence. Iohn King of France * had promised to Pope Vrban (at Avinion) his personall ayde in the holy warre, but was prevented by death, which * seized upon him here in England at the Savoy. From whence by the piety of Charles his sonne, then King of France, his body was in most royall manner convayed to Dover, at the King of Englands voluntary charge, and entombed among his fore-fathers at St. Denys with all funerall majesty, not farre off from the Soveraigne City Paris, seat of the French Monarchs, as the other their place of Sepulture. Likewise Ione Queene of Scots, comming into England (with her husband belike) * deceased here.

(128) That King Edwards fortune was not onely availeable to himselfe, or to his Lieutenants, but also to his friends and favourites, appeared in the great quarrell about the title of Britaine Armoricke, which about this time was determined by the death of the Lord Charles Earle of Bloys, head of the one faction, (but willing to have ended it by word, not by the sword, if hee could have prevailed with his wife) who was slaine in an encounter made against the Lord Iohn de Montford, head of the other side, where the * Lord William Latimer, * Sir Iohn Chandoys, Sir Hugh Calverly, with other of the English, which stucke to Montford, wanne much honour. This field was fought at Aurey not farre from Vannes in low Britaine. After * which (having performed certaine estates to the widow of the Lord Charles, a man of singular sanctimony and integrity of life) hee did homage to Charles King of France, and was accepted Duke of Britaine, with consent of the King of England, his speciall raiser and protectour. The * losse was great upon the enemies side; for there were slaine besides the said Earle of Bloys, (Montfords competitor) the Lord Iohn his brother, and sixe Lords with many other of speciall note; * Walsingham saith about a thousand men of Armes and Esquiers: and there were taken Iohn and Guy the Earles sonnes, and nine other Lords, and of those whose fame for chevalry countervailed halfe the rest; Sir Bertram de Glequin Marshall of France, under the banner of Sir Iohn Chandoys.

About these times and long after also, Sir Iohn Haucut (or Hawkwood) that valiant man of Armes, made his owne name, and his Countrimens the Englishs, very honourable by martiall vertue in sundry parts of Italy. (130) The family of the Lord Edward, Prince of Wales, who lived in Burdeaux, was now with great honour encreased: for his dearely loved wife, who the last yeare bare unto him Edward his first borne, (which lived but feaven yeares after) bare unto him a second sonne, for whom Richard King of Navarre, and * Iames King of Majorca undertooke, as Godfathers, giving him to name Richard. The companies of Soudiers, most of whose Chiefes were English by birth or obedience, having now no employment, because the warres of Britaine were appeased for the present, ranged desperately over France; but it was not long before Sir Bertram de Glequin (having paid his ransome) had meanes to draw the more part of that military Pestilence into another Coast: for, by the assistance of Peter King of Arragon, the banished Earles, and the power of Glequin, with the floting Bands, called the Companions or Adventurers; Peter King of Castile and Leon was driven out of his Kingdome, his bastard brother Henry chosen and crowned King of Spaine at Burgos.

This cursed disciple of * Iannes and Iambres, hated the vertuous Queene, for that she had so prevailed with Don Pedro her husband, that no lew was suffered to beare office, or enjoy any favours in Court, neither wanted shee much of expelling them wholly out of Spaine. But by this practise Maria de Padilla (who * some erroneously say was a lew) got all the King to her selfe, and so perfecuted the innocent Queene, that it was not long before she dyed, the Popes intercessions failing to effect any good with the Tyrant. The Nobles of Spaine, who laboured to have brought her againe into deserved grace, are by him pursued as fautors of her supposed witchcrafts. The English foreigne Empire undermined by practise of the French.

(136) For now King Charles surnamed the wise, having by quicke paiments, and by one meanes or other gotten home all the hostages which had beene empledged for performance of the Articles of peace before mentioned, sets all his wits on worke to abuse abuse the King of England's credulitie, till he had gotten before-hand as farre as dissimulations could advance: He courts the good old Prince with loving letters and presents, while in the meane time his plots ripen abroad, and the County of Ponthieu (the King of England's undeniable inheritance) was first surprised before King Edward heard thereof. And whereas the Prince of Wales had at a Parliament in Gascoigne propounded a demand for fowage, or of money to be levied by the Chimney, the Earles of Armignac and Cominges, and other Lords the Princes subjects, bearing no found affections toward the English Empire (the lesse for that by the policy of Glequin, and the Chancellor of France * Dourmauns, all or most of the Countries and Townes (which by vertue of the peace made at Bretigney) were annexed thereunto, were cunningly wrought to returne to their old Lords) repaire to the French Court at Paris, there to pursue an appeale for redresse of this oppression against the Prince (who was not so happy as to follow the counsell of Sir Robert Knols, and other wisest Captaines, who disswaded this imposition,) pretending that hee was to answer before King Charles as before his superiour Lord, of whom (they said) he held by homage and fealtie. This practise of the disloyall Lords (for what could they be else? seeing King Edward and his heires were absolutely freed (by vertue of the said Treaty) from all manner of service for any of their Dominions in France) King Charles did openly at last entertaine, and upon hope to recover by surprise, and plot, what the English had wonne by dint of sword and perfect manhood) proceeded to summon the Prince of Wales to Paris, there to answer such accusations as his subjects made against him.

* Inventory of France in Charles the 5. Serres.

(137) To encrease the indignity of these devices, you should heare the French Kings Orators before the Pope and Emperour, to whom King Edward had severally sent Ambassadors, full of complaints against King Charles, laying wholly upon the French the blame of the new warre, as upon open breakers of faith, and violaters of the league, most confidently on the contrary part charge the English.

Paul. Æmyl. in char. 5.

"We had suffered the French hostages to visit "their friends at home upon the French Kings word, "that they should come backe by a day, contrary to "which word, they, nor any of them, either were, or "are returned. That not so much as the Law of Na- "tions was kept with us, which tyes Princes to de- "mand restitution by their Officers of Armes, or "upon denial to defie them, but where (say we) are "the * Heralds which King Charles did send? We "say, that without notice hee surprised by stealth "the Earledome of Ponthieu, King Edwards unque- "stionable right, and hath disseised us in Aquitaine, "which doth no lesse belong unto us then Ponthieu. "That * Margaret the Inheritrice of Flanders, which "had beene promised to the Lord Edmund, one of "our Kings Sonnes, was by their injurious practise "wonne away, and bestowed in marriage upon Phi- "lip Duke of Burgundy. Finally, we say, that Lewis "Duke of Anjou, one of the pledges, making an "escape by that, contrary to honour, and the league, "was by them received, and not returned, which "points being all of transcendent qualitie, are (say "we) directly contrary to the Treatie and sworne "agreement at Bretigny.

Serres rashly affirmes the did.

Polydor. Virg. in Edw. 3.

The French hereunto answer, and charge upon us, to shew the fault of first breach, not theirs, but ours.

The points charged upon the English.

"That we by vertue of the said Treaty were bound "immediately to withdraw our Army out of France, "which yet (they said) we did not during all the raign "of John their King.

"That the peace was made thereby more noyous, "and hurtfull then the warre, and that they were "faine to purchase the departure of our Souldiers "with a greater charge then would have maintained "a very gallant Armie: That this breach was ours, "because the Souldiers were ours. That King Ed- "ward was bound in an open assembly of the States "of both Realmes, to renounce his right in the "Crowne of France: when (say they) was this done?

In Charles 5. Serres.

Thus they, and Serres addes that the Estates of those Countries which had beene assigned by the Treatie to the English, affevered, that it was against the fundamentall lawes of France to alien any part, and that they neither could, nor would cease to be members of that Crowne.

(138) So ye behold that the fortune of the great is never to want friends to speake for them, nor occasions to slip out or in, whensoever profit and advantage doe invite. Memorable (if true) is that part of the Frenchmens defence, in that polite and learned Italian, P. Aemylius, where it being objected with what honour and clemency King John was used by us, they breake out and affirme, that wee (being their Beneficiaries or Free-holders for such Countries as we held in France) tooke more gold for the onely ransome of King John, then they payed to redeeme S. Lewis their King, and his brother, the Peeres, and whole French Army captivated in the Christian warres by the barbarous Souldan. But (good Aemylius) say that were so, yet cannot you say, that the summe wee tooke was worth the least Countrey in France, and when all France was ours, was it not great bountie to take so small a pittance? If you reply that we had many Countries besides, wee rejoyne and truely say, that we quit more then we acquired. But let us proceed: for now all claimes and quarrels were as open, as if no obstacle had ever beene interposed: the ignominie of their late terrible foyles wounded all true French hearts, and they desire (King Edward growne aged) not to seeme by sitting still upon so many thornes of disgrace, and losse, to have been out-warred, though over-warred, and though in two or three battels inferiour, yet not to have beene clearely debellated.

(139) What doth our King Edward now? Hee * cals a Parliament, declares the breach, prayes aide, obtaines it, and claimes the Crowne of France afresh. John Duke of Lancaster, and Humfrey de Bohun Earle of Hereford, are sent over to Calis with a great force, to invade France. No great matter as then ensued. * Thomas Beauchamp Earle of Warwicke comming over in hope to have worke for his Curtelax, for the French affronted our Armie under the conduct of Duke Philip de Hardy (though at this time scarce shewing himselfe worthy that surname) but rose upon the Earles arrivall, and retyred, accused the Lords for sloath, and sware he would abroad among them to find fighting, while English bread was as yet undigested in his Souldiers stomackes. Somewhat he did, but death by a pestilentiall dart prevented the rest. This Earle had with him a learned man (as Scipio had Polybius) to register the acts which he saw done: A worthy example ill followed by posteritie. The * Duke of Lancaster pierced up with his army so farre as Roan. The same Polydor wondering why they of Ponthieu having for an hundreth and twelve yeares (that is, ever since King Edward the first had it given to him with his wife) beene ours, should revolt, onely daring the greatnesse of the English, can finde no other reason for their doings, but this pleasant one, that as dispersed catrell gather to their owne heard, so Frenchmen flocke to the French, and English follow English.

(142) Among the States and Townes (assigned to the English by vertue of the treaty at Bretigny) which had revolted to the French, was the City of Limoges in Limosin, whither the Prince marcheth, and sits downe with his army before it. Thither * came unto him out of England his brethren the Duke of Lancaster and the Earle of Cambridge, with a fresh supply of valiant Chiefes and Souldiers. (143) The French in the meane time wonne Townes and places in Aquitaine, gathering new hopes after so long and perpetuall infelicities. The losse of that expert Captaine Sir John Chandoys (unfortunately slaine) was a great advantage to their desires, whose whole care for warre rested upon Glequin, not long before advanced for his military vertue from low estate to so great eminency, as to be Constable of France, the chiefest officer for warre which that Kingdome hath) and hee a man of much proofe, in good and evill fortune, so tempered his courage with discretion, that hee onely first bad his Country rise againe, and endeavour in despite of evill fortune to re-flourish.

(144) The Prince of Wales (wanting health) upon comming to his fathers sight, rendred up the Durchy of Aquitaine, to be disposed of, as to his royall pleasure seemed good. While King Edward was at Clarendon, there repaired to him the factious King of Navarre, whose errand was to make an overture of association against the French; but as his offers were acceptable, so his cautions not seeming sufficient, he returned (after great entertainement) without concluding.

(145) John Duke of Lancaster, and his brother the Earle of Cambridge, doe now returne out of Aquitaine, with the Ladies Constance and Isabel, daughters of Don Pedro late King of Spaine, whom they married: The Duke thereupon inflaming himselfe King, and his wife Queene of Castile and Leon. Nor was the English name onely encreased in titulare honours; for about this time, the Flemings (who had provoked us) were vanquisht by the * Earle of Hereford at sea in a sharpe fight, * about twenty and five of their Shippes being taken, and all the men slaine. The sweet of this victory was fowred not long after with a grievous losse: for the French having besieged the strong City of Rochel in Santoin, with the ayde by Sea of Henry King of Castile, to relieve the English, John Earle of Pembroke was sent with about forty Shippes, men, victuals, munition, and money, to the value of twenty thousand markes, for the uses of the Warre; but being sodainely affailed with the Spanish Armado, which consisted of many great Ships, under the command of Ambrose Buccanigra and others, the English after a long and cruell conflict were utterly distressed, the Earle taken prisoner, and almost all the rest either taken, or put to the sword. * Rochel held out notwithstanding, to whose relieve while King Edward himselfe in person, with an extraordinary force set saile, the wind (always till that time favourable to his voyages for France) came Easterly, and drave him backe into England with great griefe, and the waste (they write) of * nine hundred thousand pounds sterling. Not long after he drew into the field, and a day was appointed betweene him and the Duke of Anjou, the French Kings brother, to have tryed the quarrell of their Nations by set battle, before the City of Tholouz in Languedoc, but by an untimely and a pernitious short truce (to which King Edward yeelded, because his son the Prince lay dangerously sicke) the hoped victory not onely slipt out of the Englishmens hands, but almost all advantage also of doing any thing else seasonably. The French boasted * themselves as of a Conquest, who notwithstanding did helpe out their valiancy with policy. Glequin makes his use of all occasions, and workes much harme to the English party in Guien and Britaine: But in Britaine * Sir Robert Knols did so nobly acquit himselfe on the behalfe of his Soveraignes sonne in law the Duke, that he onely seemed a fit parallell to Glequin, like as hee stopt the current of his fortune.

(147) The next yeere the Duke of Lancaſter returned into England, after whoſe departure all Aquitaine almoſt revolted, and fell to the French, who by the advantage of King Edwards age, the Princes pining malady (which ſome ſay was not poyſon but a * dropſie) and the ſucceſſe of their practiſes more then of their valour, were growne brave againe: A treaty of peace was holden at Bruges, all was but painted: for even then the French moſt of all prepared under-hand for new attempts. But who wonders at this truce? The Prince of Wales was likely to dye; plots on foot at home; the Duke of Lancaſter had an eye to the Succeſſion; things grew troubled: the Kings age was abuſed by dame Alice Peirs (a moſt buſie Court-flye) who (after Queene Philips death) kept the old man warme, and the French ſaw all theſe matters, and ſlept not.

(152) About this time the famous Doctor Iohn Wicleffe, a man of ſharpe wit, profound learning, and great judgement, did in the Vniverſity of Oxford publikely maintaine ſundry propoſitions and dogmaticall points againſt the Church of Rome, of which the Pope (fore-ſeeing the hazard hanging over his Triple-Crowne) condemned * three and twenty as hereticall; whereupon the Archbiſhop of Canterbury and Biſhop of London having attached the body of the ſaid Wicleffe, did in the preſence of the Duke of Lancaſter and the Lord Henry Piercy (* his great favourers,) declare the judgement of the Pope concerning Wicleffes Doctrine, which had then taken deepe roote both in the Vniverſity, Court, and Country. So for a while all was quiet. But (upon ſome ſecret encouragements) hee held not peace long. His followers were, in the phraſe of thoſe darke dayes, called * Lolardi, whereas, in truth, they endeavoured to extirpate all pernitious weeds, which through time, ſloath, and fraude, had crept into the field of Gods Church. The Duke of Lancaſter (the rather, ſome thinke, upon private emulations againſt Courtney Biſhop of London) was engaged ſo farre in his protection, that he and the Lord Piercy hardly eſcaped the fury of the Londoners, who would without queſtion have hewed them in pieces in revenge of ſome diſgracefull ſpeech uttered by him againſt their Biſhop. dignity of his royall bloud was empaired. By this outrage the people (a moſt dangerous and heady water when once it is out) made knowne, what he, and the Lord Percie were to have hoped, if they could have fingred them, before they had gotten to Kemington to Prince Richard, they there remained with his mother: The Duke for this bare the Londoners much evill-will; neither reſted till (for a commencement of revenge) hee had procured the Major and Aldermen to be thruſt from their places, and ſubſtituted others in their ſtead.

(153) France in the meane time erected with new hopes, breathes nothing but warre. Proviſions in that reſpect were not neglected here. His second wife was Constance, the eldest daughter of Peter King of Castile and Leon, in whose right for the time he entituled himself King of both those realmes; by her he had issue one onely daughter, named Katherine, married to Henry the third, sonne of King John, in possession before, and in her right, after, King of both the said realmes. His third wife was Katherine, the widow of Sir Hugh Swinford, a Knight of Lincolnshire, eldest daughter and Coheire of Payn Roet a Gascoigne, called Guien King of Armes; for that Countrey, * his younger daughter being married to Sir Geffrey Chaucer, our Laurent Poet. By her hee had issue (borne before matrimony, and made legitimate afterward by Parliament holden in the twentieth yeare of King Richard the second,) John Earle of Somerset, Thomas Duke of Exceter, Henry Bishop of Winchester and Cardinall, and Ioane, who was first married to Robert Ferrers (Baron of Wemme and Ovesley, in the Counties of Salop and Warwicke) and secondly to Ralph Nevil the first, Earle of Westmerland. Shee and all her brethren were surnamed Beaufort, of a Castle which the Duke had in France * where they were all borne, and in regard thereof bare the Porculeys of a Castle for the Cognizance of their family. This Duke in the thirteenth yeare of his Nephew King Richard, at a Parliament holden at London, was created Duke of Aquitaine, but in the sixt yeare after, he was called home, and this Title re-called, in the third yeare after, the sixtieth of his age, An. 1399. he dyed at Ely-house in Holborne, and lyeth honourably entombed in the Quire of Saint Paul.

Edmund, their fift sonne, surnamed of Langley, was created Earle of Cambridge, Ann. 1362. in the same Parliament, wherein Lionel was created Duke of Clarence. He was afterward made Duke of Yorke, Anno 1386. and married Isabel daughter and Coheire to Peter, King of Castile and Leon. His sonne Richard Plantagenet Duke of Yorke, tooke to wife Anne Mortimer heire of the foresaid Lionel, elder brother to Edmund Langley.

William, another of their sonnes, surnamed of Windsor where he was borne, dyed young, and is buried at Westminster.

Thomas, the youngest sonne of King Edward and Queene Philip, surnamed of Woodstocke, (where he was borne) was first Earle of Buckingham, created by his Nephew King Richard the second on his Coronation day, An. 1377. by whom, after also he was made Duke of Glouceſter, 1385. The Earldomes also of Essex and Northampton, and the Constablesship of England, fell to him by right of his wife Eleanor, the onely daughter and heire of Humfrey de Bohun Earle of Hereford and Essex. Hee was a man of valour, wisedome, and vigilancy, for the behoofe of the King his Nephew and the State, but those noble vertues (distempered with too much wilfulnesse and froward obstinacie) bred him, first Envy, and after ruine. For the King surmising him to be a too severe observer of his doings, consulted with Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norfolke how to make him away, whom Mowbray unawares surprising, convaied secretly to Callis, where he was strangled 1397. the twentieth of his Nephews raigne. Himselfe in his life had provided a goodly Tombe at Playsie in Essex, (his owne Towne, and * the usuall seat of the great Constables of England) * where he Founded a Colledge; whither his body was brought, and laid with all funerall pompe, but afterward it was translated to Westminster, where also lyeth Eleanor his wife, who dyed 1399. Their issue was Humfrey Earle of Buckingham, * who dyed at Chester of the pestilence, Ann. 1400. Anne (married first to Edmund Earle of Stafford, by whom shee had Humfrey Duke of Buckingham, secondly to William Bourchier Earle of Eve, by whom she had Henry Earle of Essex,) Ioane married to *Gilbert L. Ioane, their second daughter and third childe, was borne the ninth of her fathers raigne, An. 1335. Being foureteene yeeres of age, shee was desired in marriage by solemne Embassage, from Alphons the eleventh King of Castile and Leon, sonne of King Ferdinando the fourth, was espoused by Proxie, intituled Queene of Spaine, and conveyed into that Country, where she presently deceased of a great plague that then raigned; so as the King comming to meet her to solemnize the espousals, with great griefe accompanyed her to Church onely at her funerall the two and twentieth of her fathers raigne, An. 1348.

Blanch, their third daughter, died young, and lieth buried at Westminster.

Mary, their fourth daughter, was married to John Montfort Duke of Britaine.

Margaret their youngest daughter, borne in Callis, was the first wife of John de Hastings Earle of Pembrooke, but she died without issue.

RICHARD THE SECOND, KING OF ENGLAND, AND FRANCE, LORD OF IRELAND: THE FIFTIETH MONARCH OF ENGLAND, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND TROVBLES.

CHAPTER XIII.

An. Dom. 1378.

RICHARD of Bourdeaux, sonne to that Great Starre of English Chevalrie, Edward, by-named the Blacke Prince, and grandchild to the most renowned Edward the third, (both of them lately deceased) was crowned in the eleventh yeere of his age, and upon the sixteenth day of Iuly. Seldome hath beene seene so magnificent a Coronation, as that of this young King, but the thing which gave a better lustre of hope at his beginning, then the shine and majestie of that publike Act, was the wise course which in this his child-hood was taken; to wit, the reconciliation of the Lord John Duke of Lancaster, and the Citizens of London; with the restitution of Sir Peter de la Mare Knight, Speaker in the late Parliament (whom King Edward had committed to prison, at the instigation of Dame Alice Pierce now banisht, and confiscated) not onely to former libertie, but likewise to favour and honour extraordinary.

The Coronation of the King.

(2) At this Coronation, (which, as matters not unworthy to be kept alive, wee following the immethodicall order of the Record, have here for perpetuall memory thought good to abridge out of authentike Monuments) John the Kings eldest uncle, under the stile of John King of Castile and Leon, and Duke of Lancaster, by humble petition to the King, claimed to be now Steward of England, in right of his Earledome of Leicester; and as he was Duke of Lancaster, to beare the Kings chiefe Sword called Curtana; and as Earle of Lincolne, to cut and carve at the royall Table before the King. His petitions being found just, were confirmed to him, and to his Assignes, the two Earles of Derby and Stafford, the first to beare the Sword, while the Duke should be busied about other offices as Steward, and the other to cut and carve. The Duke then in great estate, held this the Kings high Court of *Steward*ship in the White-hall of the Kings Palace at Westminster, neere

Acere to the Chappell of the said Palace, upon the Thursday, before the Coronation, which was also upon a Thursday. There Thomas of Woodstocke the Kings Vncle, was admitted to exercise the office of Constable of England, in right of his wife, one of the daughters and heires of Humphrey de Bohun, late Earle of Hereford, and Constable of England. Henry de Percy (Lord Percy) was by the Kings consent and writ authorized to exercise the place of Marshall of England for that time, saving to every one their right, for that by reason of the times shortnesse, the claime, which Margaret daughter and heire to Thomas of Brotherton, late Earle of Norfolke, and Marshall of England, laid thereunto, could not bee discussed. Robert de Veere Earle of Oxford, though then in minority, being notwithstanding found to have right in Fee, was by the Kings speciall consent allowed to have, and use, the office of Chamberlaine. Hee was also admitted to his right of powring out water for the King to wash with, when hee went to meate, at the Coronation. John Wiltshire, Citizen of London, by reason of certaine tenements (heretofore the possession of John Picot) being a Moity of the Mannour of Heyden, and holden in Serjeanty, had his right, to hold a Towell for the King to wipe with, when hee went to meate, found and allowed, and Edmund Earle of Kent appointed to serve as his Deputy. Thomas Beauchampe Earle of Warwicke was found to have right, and admitted thereupon to beare the third sword of estate before the King at the Coronation, as also to exercise the office of Pantler, and to enjoy all such fees as to the same appertained. Sir John de Argentheim Knight, by reason of the tenure of his Mannour of Wimondley in the County of Hertford, was admitted to serve the King at his Cup, upon the day of the Coronation, and for his Fee to have that * Cup of Silver wherewith hee then served the King in his royalty. William Lord Furnivall, for his Mannour of Farnham and Hamlet of Cere, was proved to have right to support the Kings right arme, when it held the Scepter royall therein at the day of Coronation; which service, being first * honourably Knighted by the King at Kenington, hee was admitted accordingly to performe. Anne, late wife of John de Hastings Earle of Pembroke, for her Mannour of Asbele in Norfolke, was admitted by her Deputy Sir Thomas Blunt Knight, to use the office of Naperer, and to enjoy the fees thereof. Edmund, Earle of March, was assigned to carry the Kings great gilt Spurres, saving to every one their right; for John, the sonne of John de Hastings late Earle of Pembroke, claimed that office to bee his, as William le Marshall his Ancestor held the same at the Coronation of King Edward the second; but by reason he was under age, and in Wardship, the King for that time disposed it to the Earle of March: Who also, with the said Spurres was assigned to beare the second Sword before the King; for which, the said young Earle of Pembroke, and the Earle of Arundell (in the right of his Ancestor the Earle of Surrey) contending, it was adjudged to Pembroke, for his Castles and Townes of Pembroke and Tenby, &c. but the execution of that honourable place was assigned by the King as before. Richard Earle of Arundell, for the Mannour of B. in Kent, was admitted to bee chiefe Butler at the Coronation, for that (after the sale thereof) the Earles Ancestors had exercised that office at Coronations, and the claime of Edmund Staplegate, who then had that Mannour as sonne and heire of Edmund Staplegate (ward to Geffrey Chaucer, who had freed him for one hundreth and foure pounds) for that time put off his right to him, in the meane time saved notwithstanding. The Lord Mayor and Citizens of London (such as were chosen for that high dayes service among themselves) were found by good Record to have their severall rights. The Mayor to attend in his owne person as chiefe Cup-waiter, (charged with the Cupbord-royall) aswell in the Hall at dinner, to serve the King in a Cup of Gold with Spices, and for his Fees to have the said Cup, and a * Water-spout-pot of Gold thereunto belonging, when hee tooke his leave at night. The Citizens, to helpe their Lord Mayor in his office of chiefe Pincern or Cup-wayter, and to minister or serve the Lords aswell at Dinner in the Hall, as in the Chamber after Dinner. Whereupon the King, (saith the Record) perpendens gratitudinem magnam & subsidium quæ Progenitores sui, &c. weighing with himselfe the great gratitude and ayde which his Progenitors had heretofore abundantly found in the Citizens aforesaid, and hoping himselfe to finde in them the like gratitude and ayde hereafter, and to the intent that they might with the more joyfull hearts performe loyall obedience to the King, and more earnestly helpe him in his occasions, hee being heartily desirous to content them, did will and ordaine that the selected Citizens should exercise their said attendance. Sir John Dymmocke Knight, in the right of Margaret his Wife, for the Mannour of Scryvelby, and Sir Baldwine de Frevile Knight, as Cousen and next heire to Philip Marmion, by Lionnese Daughter of the said Philip, for the Castle of Tamworth in the County of Warwicke, contended each of them to have the office, and Fees belonging to the Kings Champion upon that royall day; but because the said John shewed better Records then Baldwine, and for that King Edward and the late Prince of Wales, were often heard to say that John ought to doe that service for the said Mannour of Scryvelby, hee was admitted for that time, and day was given to Baldwine to shew farther cause of his claime within three Weekes after the Feast of Saint Hilarie next, or else for ever to bee utterly excluded.

The Kings Champion.

This Champion is to have for accomplishment of that service (and the same also for his Fees) one of the best Horses of Warre and Caparisons, which the King hath, one Saddle plated with Iron, and one compleate armour with the whole furniture, in such sort as the King himselfe useth, When hee is to goe into a martiall battle (Sil deust aler, saith the Record, en une battaile mortele) in which sort being mounted, hee is to ride before the King in procession to his Coronation, and to cry thrice to the people before all the World; That there is no man of high or low estate, who will say, that our liege Lord Richard, Cousen and heire of Edward, late King of England, ought not to bee crowned King of England, against whom hee the Champion is not ready with his body to maintaine, and will maintaine that hee doth falsely lye as a Traitor. William de Latimer, and John the sonne and heire of John Mowbray of Axholm, the Kings Ward, joyntly petitioned at the same Court, to bee admitted in the right of William Beauchampe of Bedford (whose Lands the King held in right of the said Wardship, and William de Latimer in his owne right,) to have the office of Almoner at the Coronation, and to enjoy the Fees thereof. And because in the red Booke of the Exchequer it appeared, that the said William Beauchampe, (late deceased) used the said office; William de Latimer was there admitted, aswell for himselfe, as for the said heire, to exercise the same, and for his Fee to have the Silver-platter of Almes which stood before the King as he sate at the Table upon that day; and if afterward it should reasonably appeare, that they likewise ought to have an * Hogshead of Wine, they should have it.

William Bardolfe shewed by petition (as all the rest did) to the right noble, and right redoubted Lord, the King of Castile and Leon, Duke of Lancaster, and Steward of England, that certaine of the said William his Fee-simple Lands in his Towne of A. were holden of the King in chiefe by Serjeanty. The words of the petition, shewing the service, which we (fearing to erre) leave for other to interpret, are these: De trouver le jour due Coronnement nostre tresredoubte Seigneur le Roy, ung homme de faire une messe quest apelle Dilexisti, & si apponatur sanguincum adonques il est apelle appelle Milpeygeryn en la Cuisin de Roy. And accordingly the said William was admitted to that service by his Deputie. Richard Lyons, as Tenant of the Mannour of L. which John de Lyston, and his Ancestors held by the service of making Wafers for the King at the day of Coronation, was accordingly thereunto admitted. The Barons of the Cinque ports, upon their petition and claime, the matter being evident, were admitted to beare (and to have for their Fees) the Kings Canopy of cloth of Gold, (or of what other stuffe else it pleased the King) upon foure staves of silver over the Kings head upon the day of Coronation, and also to sit at meat in the Hall at the highest Table on the Kings right hand. John Fitz-John, in right of his wife, shewed, that the Mannour of S. in Norfolke was holden of the King by the service of Chiefe Larderer at his Coronation, and that Geffrey Burdeleys did exercise the same at the Coronation of King Edward the third; whereupon John Fitz-John was admitted to exercise that office by himselfe and his Deputies. Richard Hering for the Mannor of C. in the County of Surry, in the right of Agnes his wife, claymed to be Visher of the Kings Chamber; but because that claime did no way concerne the Coronation of the King, hee was left otherwise to pursue his intereste if he so thought good. These are the services which were then claymed before the D. of Lancaster, Steward of England, which hee with his * owne hands delivered into the Kings Chancery there to bee enrowled. At the same Coronation also Thomas of Woodstocke, youngest sonne of the late King, was created Earle of Buckingham, Thomas Mowbray Earle of Nottingham, Guychard d' Angolem Earle of Huntington, and Henrie Percie Earle of Northumberland. Thus the bounty of the young Monarch imparted large rayes of his imperiall Splender to these eminent persons of his Kingdome: Howsoever, these and the like honours have not in our Common-wealth eyther alwayes beene fortunate to the Receivers, or without repentance to the Donors.

(3) But the Generall State of the Kingdome being implicated, before the late King Edwards decease, by reason of that opportunity and advantage to their designes, which the Neighbour-enemies of the Crowne of England found in the olde age of that victorious Monarch, was now no lesse entangled through the contempt of King Richards youth. For before his Coronation, the French with fifty Ships (as Walsingham cals them) thrust into the Haven of Rie) the Towne whereof they rifled, and consumed with fire. The Crowne of England was scarse setled on his head, when the Scots at the other end of England set fire upon the Towne of Rocksbrough: but the French (encouraged by their late exploit at Rie) arrived in their Gallies, and tooke the whole Ile of Wight, the Castle (which Sir Hugh Tyrell manfully defended,) onely excepted, levying upon the inhabitants one thousand Markes in lieu of sparing their houses from the rage of warre, and flame. Neither was it long before they landed at Winchelsay, though being from thence repulsed, they burnt the Towne of Hastings at that present.

(4) These petty braves thus given to the King, were farther fortunated with a little victory. For they, emboldened with such successes (dishonourable and dangerous to King Richard, who seemed to have lost the Soveraigntie of the English Ocean, where Pyrates durst so revell, and also to have had as little counsell, courage, or forces, left about him upon the Land) come on shore at Rotingdene in Sussex. The Prior of Lewis with some slight tumultuarie Forces, rashly adventures himselfe against them, where he with two knights, and some few others were taken prisoners, and about 100. English slaine, but of the French many more, who returned with their Prisoners to their Navie.

(5) The chiefe charge of affaires lay upon the Duke of Lancaster, the Kings Vncle, or upon some such as he did put about him, through whose want of care, things declining to a shamefull change, and the glorious atchievements of the two late Edwards falling under Eclypse, there was onely found one private Citizen of London, that (without regard to the envy of the slothfull Lords, or his owne hazards, or of any thing else, so much as the good of his neglected Countrey) put his whole strengths to support the same. This was the worthy John Philpot, who at his owne charges mans out a Fleete to the Sea, raignes by them therein, and guardes both water and land from their intollerable violences. Nor did his so great pietie fayle of happy event, for God (who favours all vertuous actions) had put into his hands within a short space 15. Spanish Ships fraught with rich Merchandize, which the right of warre made his, whereby his great charges were abundantly repayed. Let us see his Statue erected now at last, with the Statues of Walworth, and other honourable Citizens in London.

(6) What therefore the love of their Prince and Countrey could not stirre up in the Lords, that very shame and indignation doe. There is consultation had, and the King of Navarre (an unquiet subject of the Crowne of France) morgageth the Haven-towne of Cheirbrough in Normandy to king Richard. The occasion was the rather not omitted, for that, by thrusting into it a good Garrison (which was forthwith done, and first Sir Robert Rouse, then Sir John of Harleston, both worthy Knights, made Captaines there) the same would at all times serve to give quiet entrance to an invasion of France which now was meditated.

(7) How loosely, the meane while the affaires of the State and Iustice were managed, by reason of the unripe yeeres of the King, may appeare by a bloudy outrage then perperrated and unrevenged. The occasion this. In the warres of Spaine, (which Edward the late Prince of Wales made for restoring Peter to the Crowne,) the Earle of Dean was taken and adjudged Prisoner (from all others clayming that honour) to two valiant Esquiers Robert Haule and John Shakel, who both of them belonged to that martiall Knight Sir John Chandoys. They free the Earle, taking his sonne and heire for assurance of performances. This young Gentleman (utterly neglected hitherto by his dishonourable Father,) was now demanded of them in the Kings name, by the Duke of Lancaster, with a purpose (as was thought) the rather either to advance thereby his (the said Dukes) title to the Crowne of Spaine, or to make a peace there, with the better conditions. The Esquiers refuse, and shift their Hostage out of the way; are thrust therefore into the Tower of London; but escaping from thence, take Sanctuary in Westminster. Thither with fifty armed men doth Sir Alan de Bruxhull secretely repaire, drawes Shakel by a wile out of the priviledge of the Church, and expostulates the matter with Haule in the Kings name; upon whom (protesting against the abuse offered to that Majestie in his tender yeeres, and freely taxing his Councellours with injustice, avarice, and evill advice,) while they sought to lay hands, he with his short sword valiantly made them all fly off, but in the end they most wickedly murthered him in the Chancell: commending himselfe, in his last words, to God revenger of such injuries, and to the liberty of our holy mother the Church. With him was murthered a servant of his, thrust in with a Iavelin at the backe. This is that Haule whose body lies buried under a brasse-plated stone in the Abbey Church at Westminster, whose bloud (by the violence of the said Duke) found not that fulnesse of legall vengeance, which so hainous an homicide required.

The Earle of Dean taken Prisoner.

(8) The North parts of England were about this time greeviously visited with the stroake of pestilence, and their lamentable affliction encreased by the inroads and outrages of the Scots; who had now surprized Berwicke, killing Sir Robert Boynton

An. Dom. 1379. (9) Neither was the ſpirit of the Engliſh (after it began to re-quicken) idle elſewhere; for as Sir Robert Rous had divers waies vexed the French, and taken Olivier (the brother of that renowned Bertram de Glequin) priſoner, ſo Sir John de Harleſton, Captaine of Cherbrough after him, ſlew and tooke divers French in a skirmiſh. Theſe were the few fore-going drops of greater approaching ſhowers. For Sir Hugh Calverley and Sir Thomas Percy, made admirals of the narrow Seas, tooke many rich prizes, and exploited ſundry other things very praiſe worthily, bringing home the acceptable newes of the diſlike which the Britons had conceived againſt the French Kings Government; for hee commaunded them to render up to him all their ſtrengths, Caſtles, and walled Townes, and many of them, who refuſed to obey, he put to death.

The Britons diſlike of the French Government, matter of new troubles.

(10) Theſe employments, and freſh deſignes for other like, found need of pecuniary ſupplies; whereupon, in a Parliament holden at London, it was agreed, that for ſupply of the Kings wants, the Commons ſhould be ſpared, and the burthen be wholly undergone by the able. The rates then of that taxe were theſe; Dukes, Archbiſhops, Earles and Biſhops at tenne markes each, mitred Abbots at as much, beſides fortie pence for every Monke under their ſubjection. Briefly (ſaith Thomas Walſingham) there was no religious perſon, man or woman, Iuſtitiar, Sheriffe, Knight, Eſquire, Parſon, Vicar, or * Chauntry Prieſt free from this taxe, rated according to the value of their yeerely receipts.

The Commons ſpared in the Subſidie.

* Simplex ſacerdotulus, Walſingh.

(11) We formerly mentioned, how Iohn Shakell (the other companion of Robert Haule, ſo execrably murdered in Gods-houſe) was taken. He now upon condition that the King (beſides 500. markes in money) ſhould give him Lands to the yeerely value of one hundreth markes, and ſhould alſo found and ſufficiently endow, at the Kings coſts, a Chantrie with five Prieſts for their ſoules, whom the Kings Officers had wickedly murthered, he rendred up his Hoſtage, the eldeſt (but naturall) ſonne of the ſaide Earle of Dean. At the diſcovering and bringing-forth of whom, all men were ſtroken with wonderfull love and admiration: for the young Gentleman (having given his faith not to diſcloſe himſelfe,) appeared in the ſhape of a baſe groome, in which (unknowne to all the World but his Maſter) he had of his owne accord lurked. An example of ſuch a poynt of perfect honeſty as cannot be forgotten without injurie.

A memorable example of a noble young gentlemans faith-keeping.

(12) The ſame yeere, the Lord John Mountford, whom the French had driven out, being invited home by his Barons, returned into his Dutchy of Britaine, accompanied with the valiant Knights Calverley and Percy aforeſaid, where he, his friends, and followers were received with ſingular honor. Soone after Sir John of Arundell, brother to the Earle of Arundell, being ſent into Britaine to aid the Duke, was with many other valiant Knights and Eſquires drowned. It is imputed by our author to a juſt effect of Gods anger againſt the ſaid Sir Iohn, and his houſhold, for their manifold vices and outrages, practiſed by him and them, before they ſet out from England, for which they had the bitter curſes of the people; and the Angell of deſtruction to execute thoſe imprecations upon the delinquents.

Aids ſent into Britaine drowned.

Other aides paſſe into Britaine from Calis by land.

An. Dom. 1380. (13) But the action of aiding did more deepely import, then that it ſhould be abandoned for the loſſe of that unfortunate fellowſhip, and the exceeding riches which were with them: therefore the Lord Thomas of Woodſtocke Earle of Buckingham, with Calverley, Percy, Knols, Windleſhores (or Winſor) very valiant Knights, and other competent forces, was ſent to aſſiſt the Duke of Britaine. But becauſe the French Galleys hovered upon the narrow Seas, they landed at Calis, and from thence march through France, ſpoyling Countries, burning townes, the French not * daring to empeach them, and killing people, till they and their whole equipage came ſafe into Britaine.

French troubles profitable to the Engliſh.

(14) There were about theſe times civill diviſions in France; for the Duke of Burgundie, younger brother of King Charles (lately dead) being made Guardian of the perſon and dominions of his Nephew. Charles then in minority, had the Duke of Anjou (being an elder brother to the Duke of Burgundie) a mortall enemie. Their bloudy quarrels fell out luckily for the Engliſh aydes in the Dutchie of Britaine, out of which as Duke Iohn had beene driven for adhering to his father in law the late King Edward, ſo the Engliſh did their beſt to uphold him in it, as there was cauſe.

(15) The French in theſe extreames are releeved by their ancient diverſion: for the Scots entring about that time with fire and ſword into Cumberland and Weſtmerland; and the forreſt of Inglewood, drave away much Cattle, ſlew the Inhabitants, rifled the booths and houſes of Perith in the Faire time, killing and taking many, and driving away the reſt. The Earle of Northumberland preparing a bloudy revenge, was (not without wonder) prohibited ſo to doe by letters from the King, that is, from ſuch as were about the King.

The Earle of Northumberland counterminded from purſuit of the Scots. The Perſian means at Nonſamion.

(16) But how coldly ſoever the publike affaires were followed, the want of money for ſupplies was ſtill pretended. And therefore in a Parliament holden at Northampton, was granted to the King a generall ſupply of money; the pretended occaſion of monſtrous miſchiefe which followed, by reaſon of a clauſe in that grant of Subſidie, that every one of each ſexe, being above a certain age, ſhould pay by the head, or per Pol as they cal it, twelve pence.

An. Dom. 1381. The Earle of Cambridge ſets with an Armie into Portugall.

(17) The Engliſh Chevalry began now againe to diſplay it ſelfe farre off, to gratifie the private ends of Iohn Duke of Lancaſter, who claimed the Crowne of Caſtile and Leon, in right of Conſtance his wife: For John King of Portugal had a defenſive warre againſt Iohn then King of Caſtile, who challenged the Crowne of Portugal * in right of Beatrix his Wife, (by whom he had no iſſue) the onely daughter of Ferdinand King of Portugal, which this other Iohn (a baſtard ſonne of Ferdinands) had by faction uſurped. There were ſent to his aide the Lord Edmund de Langley, Earle of Cambridge, the Kings Vncle, and ſundry Knights and others of good experience with an Armie. Theſe arriving in Portugall valiantly defended the ſame for about two yeeres, and were the chiefe cauſe of giving the Spaniards an overthrow in battle, where they loſt * tenne thouſand men. At laſt the two Kings agreeing together bare the charges of conveighing home the Engliſh in common, that their countries might be freed from them, being both alike jealous of their puiſſance. In this time Edward ſon to the Earle of Cambridge, uncle to Richard King of England, married the daughter of the King of Portugall, but afterward neither would the Earle leave his ſon behinde, as ſuſpecting the Portugeſes faith, nor the other entruſt his daughter to the Earle, ſo as they remained disjoyned in body, howſoever united by Ceremony.

(18) Not long after the time of that Earles imployment into Spaine, there fell out accidents which doe plainely convince their errour to be great, who thinke that any madneſſe is like that of an armed and ungoverned multitude, whereof theſe times (by a kinde of Fate proper to childrens reigne) gave a moſt dangerous document. The extreme hatred borne by the people to Iohn Duke of Lancaſter, calling himſelfe King of Caſtile and Leon, and the diſcontentment taken at an extraordinary taxe, levyed per Poll, upon all ſorts of people, who were above ſixteene years of age, which (as all other the evils of the time) they imputed to the Duke (the manner being to count them the authors of evils, who are ſuppoſed to have the greateſt power of doing them) moved the enraged enraged multitudes upon ſlight and ſmall beginnings to runne together in ſo fearefull a Torrent, that it ſeemed the King and Kingdome were ſodainely falne under their moſt wicked fury. There were in this moſt rebellious inſurrection, the Commons and Bond-men (who aſpiring by force to a free manumiſſion) principally thoſe of Kent and Eſſex, whoſe example was followed in the Neighbour-Shires of Surrey, * Suffolke, Norfolke, Cambridge, and other places, by incredible heards and droves of like qualified people, who (ſpecially in Norfolke) forced ſundry principall Gentlemen to attend them in their madding.

* L. S. Albertus. S.

(19) They of Kent embattelled themſelves under two Banners of Saint George, and about threeſcore and tenne Penons, upon Blacke-heath by Greene-wich, and from thence came to London, where, the generality of people inclining to them, they are maſters. The Priory of Saint Iohns without Smithfield they kept burning for about ſeven dayes, and the goodly Palace of the Savoy, belonging to the Duke, with all the riches therein, they conſumed by fire, in a kinde of holy outrage, for they threw one of their fellowes into the flame, who had chruſt a peece of ſtolne Plate into his boſome. The Rebels of Eſſex came to Lambeth, burnt all the Archbiſhops goods, and defaced all the Writings, Rowles, Records and Monuments of the Chancery, as having a ſpeciall hatred to the Lawyers, little to their diſgrace, for that they ſhared herein with good men alſo, whom they hated. But their deſperate wickedneſſe extended it ſelfe beyond the ſpoyle of houſes and ſubſtance, laying bloudy hands upon the moſt eminent and worthy men in the Kingdome, for that they had diſſwaded the King to put himſelfe into their hands at Greenewich, where he talked with them our of his Barge, and thereby had their maine deſigne diſappointed. Simon Tibald Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Chancellour of England, a right worthy Prelate, and Sir Robert Hales a Knight of high courage, Lord Prior of Saint Iohns, and Treaſurer of England, with others, they without reſpect to the Majeſty of the King, or priviledge of their moſt honourable dignities, moſt barbarouſly murthered by beheading them upon Tower-hill, among infernall ſhoutes and diveliſh yels. For the Tower it ſelfe (from whence they had haled them, the young King being there in perſon) was open to their execrable inſolencies. Neither doth the authority of * Polydor Virgill, affirming that they were not haled forth, but onely ſtayed by the Rebels, to whom (hee ſaith) they were ſent, induce us rather to credit him, then Authors living about thoſe very times. There was no little ſtore of other innocent bloud ſhed by them in theſe tumults. Nor was the Kings owne perſon without manifeſt perill, againſt whoſe life they had damnably conſpired. It were long to reckon up the kinds of ſuch villanies as they wrought, but endleſſe to recount the particulars. The common * Annals ſer forth this whole Tragicall buſineſſe very diligently.

* Polyd. Virg. hiſt. lib. 20.

(20) They had many Captaines of miſchiefe, but two principall. Wat Tyler of Maidſtone in Kent, (whom Walſingham pretily cals the Idoll of Clownes) and Iacke Straw, who together had followers to the number (as they were eſtimated) of about one hundreth thouſand, and at one Sermon made to them by Iohn Ball, Walſingham ſaith, there were about twiſe as many. Their Petitions were full of pride and malice, but eaſily granted by the King, the neceſſity of the times extorting them. They had a Chaplaine as graceleſſe as themſelves, one John Ball an excommunicated Prieſt, who with his wicked doctrine nouriſhed in them their ſeditious furies, to his owne juſt deſtruction in theend: but when a great multitude accepting the Kings mercy were gone, Wat Tyler and his Campe departed not, but upon pretence of diſliking the Articles of peace, ſought to winne time till he might put into full execution his incredible Treaſons, which (as Iacke Straw at the time of his execution confeſſed) were upon that very night of the day, wherein Wat Tyler was ſlaine, to murder the King, and chiefe men, and to erect petty Tyrannies to themſelves in every ſhire: and already one John Littiſtar a Dyer in Norwich had taken upon him at Northwalſham in Norfolke, the name of the King of the Commons, and Robert Weſtbroome in Suffolke, to whom Iohn Wraw another lewd Prieſt had aſſigned it.

(21) Never was the Kingly race and Commonweale ſo neare to an utter extirpation, as at this preſent, which was (wee may truely ſay) miraculouſly prevented. The yong King in theſe feares and dangers repairing to Weſtminſter, moſt devoutely commended his Crowne, life, and whole eſtate to God, nor that in vaine. For Wat Tyler with his Campe of Raſcals eſteemed to be ten or twenty thouſand (according to the Kings Proclamation, attending in Smithfield, but cavilling of purpoſe upon the conditions of peace, as hee that meant a further miſchiefe, though they of Eſſex were returned) was entreated to ride to the King, who alſo ſate on horſebacke before Saint Bartholmewes, in whoſe company was that renowned Lord Mayor of London, William Walworth, with many other men of birth and place.

(22) Wat Tylar ſcarſe at the laſt comming, behaved himſelfe ſo inſolently, offering to murther one of the Kings Knights, Sir John Newton, for omiſſion of ſome punto of reſpect, which he arrogated to himſelfe in more then a Kingly manner; was (upon leave given him by the King) boldly arreſted with a drawne weapon by the Lord Mayor, a man (ſay Writers) of incomparable courage, which blow was ſeconded by the ſaid Lord, and others, ſo ſpeedily, that there this prodigy of a Traytor was feld and ſlaine. A death too worthy, for that he dyed by the ſwords of honourable perſons, for whom the axe of an Hangman had beene farre too good.

(23) The Commons perceiving the fall of their Captaine, prepared to uſe extreame revenge, when the moſt hopefull yong King with a preſent wit and courage (it being for his life and kingdome) ſpurred forth his horſe, and bad them follow him, without being grieved for the loſſe of a ribauld and traitor, for now he himſelfe would be their Captaine. Hereupon they thronged after him into the field, there to have whatſoever they deſired. But the moſt worthy of all Londoners, Walworth, ſpeedes with one man onely into the City, raiſeth a thouſand Citizens in armour, brings them (being led in good array by Sir Robert Knolles and others) with Wat Tylers head (which the Lord Mayor had commanded to bee chopt off from his dead carkaſe) borne before him upon a Speare to the King. That very head, the curſed tongue whereof had dared to ſay, That all the lawes of England ſhould come out of his mouth.

(24) This act reſtored the Crowne (as it were) and Realme to King Richard, for the Rebels ſeeing themſelves girt in with armed men, partly fled, partly fell upon their knees, and (throwing away all hope in weapon) they anſwerably to their baſeneſſe, begged their lives, who, but even now reputed themſelves Maſters of the field, and of the King. And albeit there was a generall deſire in the hearts of loyall men to expiate ſo many villanies with the bloud of the Actors, yet things abroad in the Realme being as yet unſetled, they had a generall Charrer of pardon ſealed, and were ſo ſent home into their Countries.

(25) Certainely although the City of London (the moſt noble and able part of the Engliſh Empire) hath otherwiſe deſerved of the Kings of this land very well, yet the honour of this ſervice worthily ſtands higheſt in the many great praiſes thereof. Which the King did thankefully and publikely teſtifie by Knighting Walworth, and by beſtowing upon him (when hee modeſtly excuſed his unworthineſſe and and in-ability) one hundreth pounds land by the yeare in fee simple. Hee alſo at the ſame time beſtowed the ſame honour upon that right worthy Citizen and Patriot, Sir Iohn Philpot, and two other Aldermen, Sir Nicholas Brember, and S. Robert Laund, to each of which he gave a like eſtate of 40. pounds. There bee who write that hee then alſo Knighted Nicholas Twiford, and Robert Gayton Citizens. The memories of theſe and other ſuch, deſerve and ought to bee honoured with ſtatues, advanced in the moſt conſpicuous place of that great City, leaſt otherwiſe ſhee be holden ingratefull to them, from whom ſhee derives ſo honourable ſplendor. That the beauteous Armories of London were at this time augmented with that weapon which we ſee in the dexter Canton thereof, in remembrance of this ſervice done by Walworth is affirmed by * ſome, but with what warrant let themſelves ſhew.

* Holinſh. in Richa. 2.

(26) The young King, after this fortunate concluſion given to ſo helliſh uproares about his principall City, repaired in good array to * Tower Royall, or the Queenes ward-robe, a Palace then in the boſome of London. There the Queene-mother had remained in very great feare and griefe for the ſpace of three dayes, and two nights; but the ſight of her ſonne, and relation of his good ſpeed, blotted out of her memory the ſorrowes formerly ſuſtained.

* Survay of London.

(27) It was not long, but that the King (ſupriſed before with that popular innundation) had ſure notice that the divelliſh rebels were in all other places diſſipated, but neither till themſelves had done much miſchiefe, and ſuffered juſt puniſhment. Memorable was the ſervice of Henry le Spencer the ſtout Biſhop of Norwich againſt the Bondmen and Peſants of Norfolke, whom hee drave out of their Trenches, ſlew divers, and cauſed their muſhrom King Iohn Litteſtar to bee hanged, drawne and headed. But that which univerſally moſt of all prevailed to the reduction of theſe audacious wretches to due obedience, was the death of Wat Tyler, and the certaine newes of their diſſipation who were aſſembled about London, where for a few dayes they had moſt barbarouſly tyrannized. In Hertfordſhire at Saint Albans, Barnet, &c. in Suffolke, Cambridgeſhire, and the Iſle of Elye the popular outrages were now in a manner appeaſed. Yet wonderfull is it, that all theſe execrable furies, being in ſo many ſeverall places, with ſo great forces in each, (for at Bury, where Iohn Weſtbroome Kinged it, they are reported to have beene about fifty thouſand, making it their ſavage ſport, to cauſe the heads of great perſons, which they had cut off and fixed on Poles, to kiſſe and whiſper as it were one in the others eare) laſted not in the high ſpeed and full rage thereof the ſpace of eight dayes, (being not long before Midſommer, as if it had beene a ſyderiall infection or generall Lunacy) and the whole time thereof from the beginning to the end, is accounted, by Act of Parliament, but from the firſt of May till Midſommer, the Feaſt of Saint Iohn Baptiſt.

Statut. An. 6. Rich. 2. Seſſion 1. cap. 13. The royall power like the Sunne after a long darkeneſſe puts forth it ſelfe againe.

(28) The royall power which had thus beene foiled, and trodden underfoote, could not longer brooke ſo intollerable debaſement, but to repaire and eſtabliſh it ſelfe, there was proclamation made that all men who had horſe and armour, and loved the King, ſhould forthwith come to London in their beſt manner. There were never ſeene together ſo great a multitude of horſe-men in England. The muſters were taken upon Blacke-heath, where the King himſelfe, being mounted on a goodly courſer among the armed men, and having his Standard royall advanced before him, daily rode forth to view his people, rejoycing to bee ſeene among them, and acknowledged their Lord. It is ſaid, that within three dayes ſpace there appeared upon that heath for the Kings ſervice, not fewer then forty thouſand horſemen moſt bravely appointed.

Forty thouſand Engliſh horſe-men in field together.

(29) This force had beene employed againſt the Kentiſh-men, even to the utter rooting out of all the guilty, who againe began to ſtirre, but that the King was perſwaded by the Nobility and Gentlemen of that County, to proceede by ordinary juſtice; which was done. The Kings peace was alſo proclaimed in every place according to his letters dated at London the ſeventeenth of Iune, in the fourth yeare of his reigne, to the great encouragement of good ſubjects, and confuſion of the wicked. There were executed about one * thouſand and five hundreth in all places, beſides five of a new forlorne Company; which having deſperately dared to gather head againe in Eſſex about Billericai, had tendered to the King certaine inſolent demands, which were juſtly rejected, and they ſlaine. The Lord Thomas of Woodſtocke, Earle of Buckingham, the Kings Vncle, with Sir Thomas Percy brother to the Count Northumberland, were ſent with force againſt them. The Rebels being many in number, were notwithſtanding broken at the very firſt with a Charge made upon them by a ranke in front of ten men of Armes or Lances. There were taken eight hundreth horſes belonging to the Rebels. Sir Robert Treſſilian was principall Actor in the matters of Iuſtice, which hee rightly and ſeverely adminiſtred. The King himſelfe had ſo great a force of horſe-men with him, that (as Sir Walter at Lee Knight, ſaid in his ſpeech to Saint Albans-men) there was neither graſſe nor blade of Corne, old or new, leſt within five miles compaſſe of the Kings perſon.

* Holinſh. in Richa.

(30) And leaſt the miſchievous multitude ſhould, to the Kings diſhonour and common hurt of the Church and Kingdome, enjoy any the leaſt benefit by their late unſpeakeable villanies; the King, by adviſe of his Councell, ſent letters revocatory into the Shires about, by which he commands, that no man ſhall enjoy any freedome or profit by vertue of any extorted grants, during the time of the Inſurrections: but yet that his Majeſties purpoſe was by the adviſe of his Councell to grant to his ſubjects (notwithſtanding their ſo heynous treaſons) ſuch mercy as ſhould bee pleaſing to God, and profitable to him, and to the Kingdome. After which, ſundry executions were done at Saint Albans, and elſewhere. And this end for the preſent had theſe infernall attempts of the baſer people, in which we may cleerely behold the hideous face of Anarchy and Plebeian fury.

All grants of pardon and manumiſſion revoked.

The hurling times.

(31) Which fearefull convulſion in this State, ſome imputed to Gods wrath on this Land for the generall coldneſſe and neglect of their duties in the chiefe Prelates of the Kingdome; others to the great vices, and irreligious tyrannies of the great ones; others to the abounding ſinnes of the common people. But * our Author judgeth, that the full heapt of thoſe cauſes of Gods vengeance, was made up by the begging Fryars, who (ſaith he) to purchaſe wealth, contrary to their owne Oaths, did ſooth the great men in their vices and nouriſhed the vulgar in their errours, feeding on the ſinnes of both: calling good evill, and evill good, ſeducing Princes by flatteries, and the common ſort with lyes, carrying both headlong with themſelves aſtray. For their outward profeſſion of truth they have ſo defiled with their wicked life, as that it is now in every mans mouth a good Argument, holding in matter and forme; This is a Fryar, Ergo, a lyar; even as true as to ſay: This is white; Ergo, it is coale-black'd.

(32) The Duke of Lancaſter, at the firſt breaking forth of theſe Rebellions, was upon the borders, about ſettling of a truce with the Scots, who therefore did ſhut up the matter ſpeedily before the Scots had any intelligence, ſetling a two yeares abſtinence from Hoſtility. The Scots (though they were ſorry that by the peace ſo concluded, they had loſt an opportunity of making a dangerous impreſſion upon the Engliſh,) underſtanding the Dukes perill, offered him twenty thouſand men to defend his honour, but hee loyally refuſing that, they gave him leave to come and goe at his pleaſure, with all other rites of ſacred Hoſpitality.

(33) After

An. Dom. 1382. A. Reg. 5. mouſſing him before the yeare 2 Chriſtmas day Incluſively.

(33) After Chriſtmas King Richard tooke to wife the Lady Anne, daughter to the Emperour Charles the fourth, and ſiſter to Wenceſlaus King of Bohemia, called Emperour; which Lady by the Duke of Taſſill, was in the name of her ſaid Father, formerly promiſed and aſſured unto him, as one whom the King did ſpecially affect, though the daughter of Barnabas Duke of Millaine was alſo offered with a farre greater ſumme of gold. Shee was with great pompe and glorie at the ſame time crowned Queene, by the hand of William Courtney (a younger ſonne of the Earle of Devonſhire) Biſhop of London, lately promoved from London to the See of Canterbury. The Nuptials and Coronation of the beauteous Queene being, the Parliament (which by this great Ladies arrivall was interrupted and prorogued) began againe. Where many things concerning the exceſſe of apparell, tranſportation of Coine, &c. were wholeſomely enacted. Sed quid juvant Statuta Parliamentorum? &c. but to what purpoſe (ſaith Walſingham) are Acts of Parliament, when after they are once paſt, they take no manner of effect? For the King with his private Councell, was wont (ſaith he) to change, or aboliſh all things, which by the whole Commons and Nobility of the kingdome had in former Parliaments beene agreed upon.

(34) Nevertheleſſe, it was then provided, that ſuch as had done any thing in their owne defence againſt the Rebels, or to their ſuppreſſion, without the ordinarie formes of proceſſe in law, ſhould ſuſtaine no dammage thereby, but for ever bee as cleare as if they therefore had enjoyed their particular pardons; and that all releaſes, feoffements, and other acts done in the late rebellions, (during the hurling times, for ſo they were called) by way of conſtraint or dureſſe, ſhould be utterly voide.

(35) With the good liking of this Parliament, Sir Ricard Scrope Knight, was made Chancellor of the Realme, and Sir Hugh Segrave Treaſurer; but it was not long before the Chancellour, denying to paſſe ſuch large gifts under the Great Seale, as the King in his youthfull humor had imprudently granted, therewith to gratifie his ſtill craving Courtiers, fell into the Kings undeſerved diſpleaſure. For albeit he alledged important cauſes of ſuch his deniall, (as, that the King was greatly in debt) and therefore ſuch largeſſes were fitter to bee imployed in diſcharging ſome of his Creditors, that knowing how the King was intangled with Creditors, ſuch cravers were not truly well affected to him, as regarding their owne private avarice more then the Kings profite, or the publike wants; that thoſe ſelfe-ſame cravers had formerly received ſuch gifts of his Majeſtie, as were (at leaſt) anſwerable to their deſervings; and that himſelfe, if he ſhould ſeale thoſe grants (made in the Kings childhood) was like to have ſmall thankes of him, when hee ſhould come to riper judgement: yet thereupon hee was twice or thrice willed to ſend the Seale to the King, who comming in perſon ſurrendred the ſame, with ſuch like words, That he would alwayes bee loyall and true to his Majeſtie, but never beare any office under him againe. Not long after which ſurrender, Robert Braybroke Biſhop of London was made Chancellour in his place. This act of the Kings was diſpleaſant to the whole Realme, and one of the firſt things by which hee fell into diſlike, it being among the infelicities of King Richard, that thoſe times were too full of ſower and impatient cenſors, for a Prince of ſo calme a temper, and as yet unſeaſoned yeares.

after he had performed ſundry things very happily, taken Graveling, Burbrough, Dunkirke by aſſault, and beene victor in a ſet battell againſt thirty thouſand abettors of Clements claime, he was enforced to returne, as deſtitute of thoſe farther ſuccours which were exacted out of England. But the King upon pretence that he had not obeyed his royall mandate, by which he required him, (before hee tranſported) to returne, for a while ſeiſed upon all his temporalities.

The Kings enrichment of the Bohemians diſpleaſant.

(37) But K. Richard having before given the realme diſcontentment, by removing Scrope from the Chancellorſhip, encreaſed the ſame by ſome manifeſt ſignes of levitie and prodigality toward Strangers, then which nothing makes a Prince leſſe pleaſing to the Engliſh: for, in the progreſſe which with his beloved Queene he made to Bury, Theſford, Norwich, and other places, gifts were taken on all hands by the King, and they again through the Queene were powred forth to enrich her Bohemians.

An. Dom. 1384.

(38) Iohn Duke of Lancaſter embarckt himſelfe for France, where hee concluded a truce to endure betweene the two Nations Engliſh and French, from the preſent Chriſtmas till Midſommer. At his returne, he and his brother Thomas of Woodſtocke Earle of Buckingham, went with an Armie into Scotland, to revenge the breach of truce: but as it ſeemes by ſome, the Duke had rather an hoaſt of men, then an hoſtile mind; for he ſo ordered the matter (as not forgetfull perhaps of curteſies ſhewed to him in his late dangers, when the Commons were out in Armes,) that the Scots having had time inough to withwraw both their goods and perſons, and his army ſuffering farre more loſſe by penurie and cold, then it could inflict upon the enemy, returned * fruitleſſe and inglorious.

* John Stow.

(39) Not long after his returne, he was encountred with a more capitall and dangerous enemy, then thoſe in Armes: for a certaine Carmelite Fryer, by birth an Iriſhman, delivered to the King (in the time of Parliament at Saliſbury) a writing, which contained therein a heinous accuſation of the Duke of Lancaſter, that he had conſpired to murther the King, and to crowne himſelfe. The accuſer diſcovered the day, place, and other circumſtances, to induce a beliefe of the pretended intention, and tooke his oath upon the Sacrament, which that day hee had received, that no one word in the ſcroll was untrue. The Dukes Apologie and favour with the King, prevailed above the accuſers confidence; whereupon the Fryer is committed, at the Dukes requeſt, to the Lord Iohn Holland (the Kings halfe-brother by his mother) and a day appointed, wherein the accuſer was to ſhew a cauſe of his crimination.

The Duke of Lancaſter accuſed of highest Treaſon.

(40) But in the night which next fore-went the deſigned day, the ſaid Lord Iohn Holland (if a man may beleeve, that a thing ſo villanous could be done by men of honour) and one Sir Henry Greene knight, are reported to have truſſed up the Fryer in a cord by the necke, and parts of generation, laying upon his breaſt a ſtone of great weight to breake the chine of his backe; and that they alſo ſcorcht the ſoles of his feet. By which miſerable and quadruple manner of death, without triall or conviction, (as alſo without * recantation of any thing which hee had uttered againſt the Duke) he is ſaid to have breathed his laſt. Neither was his death ſmothered, for the next day they cauſed his ſtrangled carkaſe to bee dragged through the City, that it might not be thought hee had periſhed unjuſtly. But the Lord Thomas of Woodſtocke (the ſame who was afterward Duke of Glocester) went farther, for hee ruſhed into the Chamber where the King was, and bound his words with a "terrible oath, That hee would kill any one living "who durſt lay treaſon to his brothers charge; neither did hee except the King himſelfe: In which ſpeeches, as piety and zeale for his brothers honour and ſafety were not wanting, ſo certainely duty to his Prince was exceedingly forgotten.

* John Stow.

(41) That

(41) That which followed, may give us iust cause to suspect the truth of that Fryars accusation: for the Lord William la Zouch was also by the Fryer accused, of having beene the Inventer, broacher, and provoker of him, to set downe all that which was comprehended in the accusation; who thereupon sent for to Salisbury (though then very sicke of the gowte) repaired thither in a Horse-litter, where hee was compelled to answer to all such points as were objected, like a Felon, or a Traitor, standing bare-headed: but the privity, or least thought of any such matter as the Fryar affirmed against the Duke, hee confidently forswore, and was thereupon acquitted and dismissed. Howbeit (saith Walsingham) La Zouch was from that time forward a professed enemie, not onely of Carmelites, but of all other orders of Fryars whatsoever. But these disgraces came unseasonably upon the Duke, whose head was undoubtedly full of designes, and of cares, how to atchieve to himselfe the crowne of Spaine.

(42) There were then sundry incursions made by the English and Scots, each into the others Country, the Earle of Northumberland being leader to the English, with little advantage to either. But to take away the very cause of this continuall bad neighbourhood, or to lessen it by an established peace with France, the Duke of Lancaster sailed to Calis, about the beginning of August, there to treate with the Duke of Berry, on behalfe of the young French King Charles the sixt, but after hee had in that voyage expended (as was said) fifty thousand Markes, hee brought into England nothing backe, except onely a truce, to continue till the first day of May next. His desire to have procured a surer peace both with the French and Scots, seemes to have beene great, that so hee might the more freely pursue the conquest of Spaine which he intended.

(43) Whiles hee was absent in this Ambassage, there ensued the arraignement of a great favourite of the Dukes, Iohn Northampton, alias, Comberton, whom his adversaries by-named Cumber-Towne. This man is by them reported to have exceedingly troubled the City of London, during his late Mayoralty there, nor lesse afterward; for that being followed with many abettors, hee publikely disturbed Sir Nicholas Bramble his successor, (but a * bloudy minded man by report,) and wrought other masteries, till Sir Robert Knowls caused one of the busiest companions to bee drawne out of his house, and (as some say) shortned by the head. This Comberton was by his housholl Clerke accused, as privy to some practices, in prejudice as well of the King, as the City; and when sentence was to bee pronounced in the Kings presence (being then with great store of his Nobles at Reading,) hee durst (as is said) affirme, That such judgement ought not to proceed against him in the absence of his Lord the Duke. This againe unraked the burning coales of envy, and suspition against the said Lord Duke; and perhaps malice to the Duke procured this hatred against his favourite. Whereupon hee was confined to the Castle of Tyntagell in Cornwall, and all his goods seized upon by the Kings Servants, whom Walsingham expresseth, by calling them after the name of those Poeticall ravenous Birds, Harpyes.

(44) That heere which Polydor Virgil (assigning causes to actions, not always such as are, but such as seemed to him most probable, not seldome confounding and changing persons, times, names, and things) tels us, concerning a combate within lists, betweene Sir John Ansley Knight, and one Carton hath little ground, (so farre as we can find) in history. He saith they were teterrima capita, both very wicked men, and that there was a reall plot to murther the King. Wee can neither find the crime nor the men: there had beene a folemne combate long before, between such a Knight and one * Katrington an Esquire, in which the Knight was Challenger and victor, but the crime was not treason against the Kings person, nor for any thing done in his time, but in his noble Grandfathers. Neither was Ansley, teterrimum caput, but a valiant and loyall man of Armes. The crime which he objected to that Esquire (his kinsman) was, that for money hee had traiterously given over the Castle of Saint Saviour, in the Land of Constantine in Normandy, when hee had store of victuall and munition. The Esquire was vanquished in faire fight, and dyed franticke the next day. Polydors errour therefore is joyned with manifest wrong to the Knights name, wherein we ought to bee very circumspect, for that, honour is inestimable and descendeth to posterity. There was indeed at the time hee speakes of, another combate, fought also within lists before the King, (for Duels then were performed, not on private choise or quarrell, but on publike appointment) betweene one Iohn Welsh an Esquire of England, and one * Martilet a Gentleman Navarrois, who in revenge against Welsh, for having at Cheirbrough (where the said Esquire was under-captaine) committed (as Martilet said) adultery with his wife, accused him of high treason against the King and Realme. But Welsh prevailed; and the Navarrois, at his execution (for hee was * drawne and hanged after he had beene foild in battell,) confessed the cause of his evill will, and the innocency of Welsh in the matter of treason.

(45) The Scots had this while by practice and money gotten the Castle of Berwicke, whereof the Custody belonged to the Lord Henry Percy Earle of Northumberland. The Duke of Lancaster was not sad at this, but so pursued the matter, that the Earle (as if by his negligence and privity the same royall Castle had beene lost) was condemned in Parliament. But the King relieved him with extension of favour. This was a great cause of confirming the rancour already kindled in the hearts of these two principall Peeres. But the Earle to wipe away all blemishes of disgrace, encloseth the Castle with a siege both of forces and large proffers, so that after some time spent therein, he had it re-delivered upon payment of two thousand markes.

(46) The Flemmings had heretofore in the fift yeere of this King, sent Ambassadors at the time of Parliament, to submit themselves and their Country to his Dominion, renouncing alleageance to their naturall Lord the Earle, whom they had by force of Armes expelled, upon pretence of oppression used by him, and for other causes; but because they seemed not either persons sufficient, or sufficiently instructed with authority, to transact with the King in a matter of so high nature, they were commanded, to returne, and fetch more ample power, and to bring certaine men of every good Towne in Flanders. Now againe, the Citizens of Gaunt, though they had in battell against the French King, (who was there in person on behalfe of the Earle,) * lost twenty * thousand men not long before, desired of King Richard, that they might have an English Generall to command in their warres; to whom was sent a wise and valiant Gentleman, the Lord Edward le Bourser, who demeaned himselfe in that charge with much commendation. But when afterwards he went more abundantly and strongly to have supported them, they sodainely turned French, shewing Se nescire (saith * Walsingham) uni amice, vel domino, fidem diu servare.

(47) The Duke of Lancaster (whose, or the like greatnesse may perhaps seeme more then can stand with the narrow limits of England, which, without danger to the Common-wealth, can hardly afford such a proportion of estate to any Subject) was about this time enformed, that the King had a purpose to arrest his person, and to try him upon capitall points before Sir Robert Trisilian, his Chiefe Iustitiar, a man ready, (under the Kings protection) to deliver judgement without respect to Titles. The King was nourished in this * deliberation by young men, who combined against the Dukes life. This being discovered, the Duke (a potent Prince) withdrawes upon his guard to his Castle of Pomfret in the the North; nevertheless the hopes of wicked men, delighting in their Countries miseries, and civill combustions, were made voide by the great diligence of the Kings mother, the Princesse Ioan, who spared not her continuall paines and expenses, in travailing betweene the King and the Duke, (albeit she was exceeding tender of complexion, and scarce able to beare her own bodies weight through corpulency) till they were fully reconciled.

(48) It had indeed beene a most wretched time for a civill warre, not onely because the French Admirall, Iohn de Vienna, had beene sent with forces, embarke in threescore saile of Ships, to be employed out of Scotland against the English, but for that the French prepared a generall invasion of England, having in hope already as it were devoured it. There reigned at that time in France, Charles the sixt, a yong and foolish Prince, (saith Tillius) who having in his treasury, left to him by his prudent Father, * eight-teene millions of Crownes, (and not onely eighteene hundred thousand, * as some, fearing perhaps that the other summe might seeme incredible, have written,) and being moreover set on fire with an inconsiderate love of glory, rather then upon any found advise (though * some impute the Counsell to the said Admirall) would needs undertake the conquest of our Country. These newes stirred all the limbes and humours thereof, though the event (God not favouring the enterprize) was but like that of the Mountaine, which after long travaile brought forth a ridiculous Mouse, nevertheless it had beene a most desperate season for a civill warre to have broken forth in England.

(49) The preparations of the French doe hold notwithstanding, and the generall Rendevous of their huge forces was at Sluse, in the Port whereof, and other places about, there were assigned to assemble for their transportation, * twelve hundreth saile of ships. At the same time (as if the two young Kings had beene rivals in shew of men) Richard raiseth so great an Army to over-runne Scotland, as the like for beauty and number was never seene together, consisting wholly of Englishmen. But may we beleeve that England could spare three hundreth thousand men, and as many horses for the use of warre? Certainely a needlesse multitude, but onely to terrifie the French with the fame, for there might have beene fewer, for any great Act which Richard (full of jealousie against his Uncle of Lancaster, wherewith his head and heart were full,) effected. But wee may the rather beleeve the account, for that Walsingham vouchеth * Serveants and Armes (if he meane not Heralds by those words) whose office (he saith) it was to number the hoast, and they affirmed the same. This is sure, that * among other the arguments used by the Duke of Bury (one of the French Kings Vncles) to frustrate this enterprize, he alleaged, that the King of England had mustred ten thousand Horsemen, and one hundreth thousand Archers for his defence; whereas the Admirall Iohn de Vienna affirmed, that having seene the forces of the English, they were but eight thousand horsemen and threescore thousand foot; and he might well say having seene: for, though Aemylius bring him in speaking to the French King, and vaunting that hee had encountred them, yet nothing is truer, then that the English returned out of Scotland without the least offer of battell. The Admiral was willing indeed to have fought, but when hee saw our Army from the hil-tops, his fury gave place to reason.

(50) While the Army was upon the way toward Scotland, the Kings halfe brother the Lord Iohn Holland, wickedly slew the Lord Stafford, sonne to the Earle of Stafford, not farre from Yorke, being upon his journey to the Queene, whose favoured Knight hee was. For which heinous homicide the King seised upon his whole estate, denying to his Mothers most earnest prayers any pardon or grace for his Brother. Which was to her so grevous, that within five or sixe dayes after shee gave up the ghost at Wallingford. The young Lord tooke Sanctuary at Beverley, and the King by his justice herein wanne the hearts of the said Earle of Stafford, the Earle of Warwicke, the Lord Basset, and other great men of Staffords kindred and friends; neither did this empeach at all the present voyage.

(51) The Scots and French in Scotland, seeing themselves unable to withstand such forces, had so retired themselves and all their goods, that when the English should come, they, (as Walsingham pleasantly saith) could see no quicke things left but onely Owles. That which was greene in the fields, the horses devoured or trampled downe, yet such harme, as the materials of buildings were capable of, was done. Edenburgh also and the * noble Abbey of Mailrosse were fired. The Duke of Lancaster perswaded the King to march beyond the Frith or Scottish Sea (as his great Ancestors had done) to seeke out his enemies; but he, very suspicious that the Duke gave him this counsell with a purpose to betray him to destruction by famine, and want, which hee was there to looke for, expressed much displeasure and returned. The Dukes words notwithstanding and behaviour were tempered with much duty and modesty; but that would not serve, till the Lords peeced their affections together by intercession in the best manner the time would suffer. But the English hoast was scarce returned and discharged, when the Scots and French sodainly powred themselves forth upon our Country, and did whatsoever hurt the shortnesse of time in their incursion could permit.

(52) To resist and endammage the French, there were appointed Admirals for the narrow Seas, the Master of Saint Johns, and Sir Thomas Piercy Knight, (the Earle of Northumberlands Brother,) who did nothing worthy their fame or place. Onely the Townesmen of Portsmouth and Dart, maund forth a few ships at their owne perill and charge, wherewith entering the river of Sein (upon which the renowned Cities Roan and Paris are situated) suncke some of their enemies ships, tooke others, and among them one of Sir Oliver de Clisson's, the goodliest that France had. The successe answered their hopes, and they were enriched with the spoyles of their adversaries, whom thus they compelled to beare the charge of their proper mischiefe.

(53) Meane-while that the French lay at Sluse, attending the approach of their kings uncle the Duke of Burie, (who favoured not this enterprize of invasion, but fought * aswell by delayes, as by perswasion and authoritie to make it frustrate,) they of Gaunt had gotten the Towne of Dam, by the good liking of the Inhabitants, to whom the French government was odious. For recovery whereof, the French King drew his army (prepared against England) to the siege of Dam, which (the same being first secretly abandoned, after a moneths siege and many repulses given to the French) was by him recovered. This, and other things, did so protract the great expedition intended, that (after waste of infinite treasure) Charles returned home, without having seene England, which was by these meanes most graciously freed by God from so dangerous, and greatly feared an impression. But that the English might the better endure the same, Iohn King of Portugall, having lately in a great and bloudy battell (where some of the English deserved well of him,) overthrowne the Castillians, and thereby setled his estate, sent into England sixe Galleys throughly well appointed, for Sea-service, though (as God would) there was no need of them.

(54) Of those French, which (after the Cloud of warre at Sluse was disperled into ayre,) passed over-land into their Countries, many were taken and slaine by the Gauntiners. Their Navie was no lesse unfortunate; for at one * time the English of Calis tooke of them eighteene, and the rage of weather brake and sunke divers, so that this Bravado was not onely costly to the French, by reason of the charges, but hurtfull in the losse of time, men, ships, and hoped glory. Such are the events of humane enterprises, where God is not pleased to give successe. The English thus delivered from feare, make a road into France out of Callis, and with a prey of foure thousand sheepe and three hundreth head of great cattell, besides an hundreth good prisoners, returned safe to their Garrison.

(55) The multitude of memorable things which present themselves to us in the lives of our English Monarches, is such, that if we did not use choise, and in their relation brevitie, we should not relieve our Readers of that molestation, with which the vaste volumes of former labours doe oppresse the memory. The Laitie, at the Parliament now holden at London, had yeelded to aide the King with a Fifteenth, upon condition, that the Clergie should succour him with a Tenth and an halfe; against which unjust proportion, William de Courtney, Archbishop of Canterbury most stiffely opposed; alleadging that the Church ought to be free, nor in any wise to bee taxed by the Laity, and that himselfe would rather die then endure that the Church of England, (the liberties whereof had by so many free Parliaments, in all times, and not onely in the raigne of this King beene confirmed) should be made a bond-maide. This answere so offended the Commons, that the Knights of the Shires, and some Peeres of the land, with extreame fury besought, That Temporalities might bee taken away from Ecclesiasticall persons, saying, that it was an Almes deed and an Act of Charitie so to doe, thereby to humble them. Neither did they doubt, but that their petition which they had exhibited to the King would take effect. Hereupon they desigued among themselves, out of which Abbey, which should receive such a certaine summe, and out of which, another. I my selfe (saith a * Monke of S. Albans) heard one of those Knights confidently sweare, that hee would have a yeerely pension of a thousand Markes out of the Temporalities belonging to that Abbey. But the King having heard both parts, commanded the Petitioners to silence, and the Petition to be razed out, saying, Hee would maimaine the English Church in the qualitie of the same state or better, in which himselfe had knowne it to bee, when he came to the Crowne. The Archbishop hereupon having consulted with the Clergie, came to the King, and declared, that he and the Clergie had with one consent, willingly provided to supply his Majesties occasions with a Tenth. This grant the King rooke so contentedly, as he openly affirmed he was better pleased with this free contribution of one Tenth for the present, then if he had gotten foure by compulsion.

(56) Robert de Vere Earle of Oxford (a young Gentleman in speciall grace with the King) was at this Parliament created Marquesse of Dublin in Ireland, which mooved great despight against him, those rough times being impatient to beare the unequall advancement of favourites. Nevertheless, though the gentle King was thought heerein to please his owne fansie, rather then to reward merite, yet did hee so sweetly temper it, as there was no justice, nor reason to envie to him that solace which hee tooke in his friends encreased honour; for at the same time hee advanced two of his Vncles, Thomas of Woodstocke, Earle of Buckingham, to the title of Duke of Glocester, and Edmund of Langley Earle of Cambridge, he created Duke of Yorke, allotting severall proportions of pension to bee paide out of his Exchequer. In Vere there was ancient Nobilitie to justifie his new degree the better; but in making the Lord Chancellor Michael de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, with the yearely pension of 1000. Markes, was matter of more envie; because he was not descended of such honourable Parents: a defect (if it be a defect) which none more willingly upbraid to men of worth, then who themselves are not alwayes the most worthy. The first raiser of this family of De la Pole was Edward the third, who made William de la Pole, of a brave Merchant, a * Knight Baneret, and gave him great possessions, in requitall of an extraordinary and voluntary loane of treasure, advanced by him to supply the King in a time of speciall necessitie, when money could stand him in more steed then a thousand men of Armes: no little merite in a subject, nor a slender reward of a most munificent Prince.

The first Marquesse made that ever was in England.

(57) Henry Spencer the martiall Bishop of Norwich found grace with the King at this Parliament, to be restored to his temporalities, at the speciall suite of Thomas Arundell Bishop of Ely: whiles the Bishop of Ely thus beseught his Majesty of Grace, the said Michael de la Pole (Lord Chancellour, and Earle of Suffolke) stood by, and brake out with much offence into these words. What is that (my Lord) which you aske of the King? Seemes it to you a small matter for him to part with that Bishops temporalities, when they yeeld to his Coffers above one thousand pounds by yeare? Little need hath the King of such Counsellors, or of such friends, as advise him to acts so greatly to his hinderance. Whereunto the Bishop of Ely not lesse truely, then freely replide. What saith your Lordship, my Lord Michael? Know that I require not of the King that which it his, but that which hee (drawne thereunto either by you, or by the Counsell of such as you are,) with-holds from other men, upon none of the justest titles, and which (as I thinke) will never doe him any good: as for you, if the Kings hinderance bee the thing you weigh, why did you so greedily accept of a thousand Markes by yeare, at such time as he created you Earle of Suffolke? The Chancellour was hit so home with this round retort, that he never offered any further to crosse the restitution of the Bishops temporalities.

(58) After this the King being with his Queene at their manour of Eltham in Kent, there came thither Leo King of Armenia, a Christian Prince, whom the Tartars had expelled out of his Kingdome. The pretence of his negotiation was to accord the Realmes of England and France; that the Princes thereof might with joyne forces remoove the common enemy from Christendome. Therein he could effect nothing, but his journey was not otherwise unfruitfull to himself, for King Richard (a Prince, to speake truly, full of honour and bountie) gave him besides a thousand pounds in a * ship of gold, letters Pattents also for a thousand pounds yearely pension during life.

(59) The time now was come, wherein King Richard should see himselfe delivered of all that feare and jealousie, which the greatnesse of his Vncle the Duke of Lancaster stirred in him. His Forces were now ready, and his Navy (encreased with * seven Gallies and eighteene ships sent out of Portugall) attended at Bristoll, to transport him toward Spaine, (for Castile is high Spaine) the Crowne whereof hee claimed in right of Constance his second wife, daughter of Don Peter the cruell. Before he set forth, the newes came that such English as were already in Portugall, with their friends, had overthrowne the Spaniards, French, and Britons, at a battell in Spaine. This was a spurre to quicken the Dukes enterprise, which Pope Vrban the sixth (by granting plenary remission of sinnes to all such as gave the Duke ayde) did specially favour, as against them who did partake with his enemy the Antipape; * but the frequent grant of such pardon and releasement, was now growne so vile and contemptible amongst the people, that few were found open handed towards this Crucesa. Admirall of this Fleet was Sir Thomas Piercy, Sir John Holland (who had married one of the Dukes daughters, afterward created Earle of Huntington) was Constable of the hoast, and Sir John Mereaux (who had to wife one of the Dukes illegitimate Children) was one of his Marshals. There were in this noble and excellently well appointed Armie, the Lords, Talbot, Basset, Willoughby, Fitz-walter, Poynings, Bradston, Fitz-warren, (60) It was now the moneth of May, when the great Duke of Lancaster comming to take leave, had of the Kings gift a Diademe of gold, and his Dutchesse of the Queene another: he also commanded the English to call, and hold his Vncle for a King, and to doe him answerable honour. But after all this, he lay for a wind so long, till his whole provisions were almost spent; at length yet, hee set forward. The first land they touched was neere to Brest in Britaine, where Sir John Roch, the Governour against the French, complained of two Forts built about him to empeach his quiet egresse; whereupon the Duke of Lancaster caused them to be assaulted; so both of them being taken by surrender, were razed to the ground, though some English first lost their lives, among which was, * Sir Robert Swinarton, a valiant Knight of Staffordshire, and John de Bolton a couragious Esquier of Yorkeshire, whom the sodaine ruine of a Tower (overturn'd by mining) whelmed and slew out-right. Sharpned with the successe of this victorie, they commit themselves to God, and the Sea, and prosperously arrive with the whole Fleet in the Port Corone, or the Groyne, * in August.

* vigil. S. Laurent.

(61) The French (belike) thought England could not furnish another Armie for France, as thee had for Spaine: whereupon there was now no false nor vaine rumour spread againe, that the French would besiege Callis. The King to secure that precious transmarine part of his Dominions, sent thither store of men and of all provisions. The most eminent person was Henry Lord Piercy, Sonne to Henry Earle of Northumberland. This was hee whom the Scots by-named Hotspur, a young Gentleman, in whom (saith Walsingham) the patterne of all vertue and martiall prowesse shined: and indeed his nature did answer his by-name; for he made such ridings into the quarters about Callis, that they could never wish a worse Neighbour. After which, when the fame went that the French King would not delay, or (as they call it) beleaguer Callis, but rather invade England, hee returned to be present where the greatest danger was expected. At this time, the English Seamen of warre, brought two French prizes to Sandwich, in which was taken a part of an huge strong Timber-wall, which the French King, preparing now for Englands invasion, had caused to bee built in length three miles, in height twenty foot, which had at every twelve paces a Tower (ten foot higher) and each capable of ten men, the whole to be a defence for the French encampments against our shot, and a shelter for theirs, there was also in the same Ships the Enginer and Master-workeman, who was an Englishmen, and great quantities of powder, and store of Ordnance, together with the French Kings * Master-Gunner.

The Lord Henry Piercy by-named Hotspur, sent to Callis.

* Magister Gunnarius. A Parallelization of the English and French States in their times.

(62) There was in this time a great resemblance betweene England and France in the chiefe points of State. As England had Richard, so had France her Charles, both young Kings. Charles with an huge Army had prepared to invade England, but did nothing: Richard with no lesse forces entred Scotland, and did no great thing. Richard had Vncles which bare great sway in the Realme; so had Charles. Richard had his Vncle John more potent then the rest; Charles had his Vncle Lewis. John upon his Wives title claimeth the kingdomes of Castile & Leon; Lewis by the gift of Ioane the Queene, claimes the Kingdomes of Naples and Sicil. Lewis went with an Army of * thirtie thousand horse into Italy to atchieve his claime; with what force John set forth you have heard. But Lewis died without obtaining; John prevailed so farre as to settle his childe by marriage. The King and great Lords of France were glad (with any charge) to enjoy the absence of Lewis, and Richard and his favourites were not sad, that the Realme was for the present rid of John.

* Paul. Aemyl.

(63) The forces of the French provided for this invasion of England, were reported in open Parliament (which the King held about Michaelmas in London) to consist of * 15. Dukes, 26. Earles, two hundreth Lords, and an hundreth thousand Souldiers, and a thousand Ships, assembled about Sluse, with full purpose to take revenge of all the evils which the English nation had formerly wrought in France, and to destroy the English Kingdome. But though these reports were not fained, (for the French attended nothing in a manner but a faire gale of winde to bring them,) yet could not the King, without Capitulations made by the Duke of Glocester, obtaine any aydes of money; so that, whereas it feemed to the King, that by the Duke of Lancasters departure, hee was become more free, yet had he left behind, spirits much more stiffe and intractable. O deare Countrey, hadst thou not then beene apparantly in Gods protection, (for the French having stayd for a winde till Hallon-tide, and then having it halfeway, were beaten backe, and the voyage made utterly voide, certainely thy ruine had then beene certaine. What shall we thinke or say of those popular Lords, by this gentle King armed (to his owne bane) with power and greatnesse, who under the specious pretext of reforming abuses, did fatisfie their envy and inbred insolency.

(64) The King tels them, that England is, as they saw, in manifest danger, and prayes their succour in money: what is the answer? That the Duke of Ireland (for now the Marquesse of Dublin was made a Duke,) and Michael at the Pole (so they scornefully called the Earle of Suffolke) and other, must be removed. Things are badly carried at home, say they; (and they perhaps said truely,) but where was now the care of our Countrey? God indeed turned from us the mercilesse point of the French sword: but here began the seedes of innumerable worse miseries, never to bee remembred without sighes and teares.

The first seeds of the civill warres.

(65) The seeds (we say) of those fearefull calamities were then first here sowne, whose summe a flourishing * Writer in our age (willing neerely to have imitated Lucan, as hee is indeed called our * Lucan) doth not unfortunately expresse, though hee might rather have said he wept them, then sung them; but so to sing them, is to weepe them.

While all pretending right, all right throwne downe.

But Robert de Vere, saith Thomas Duke of Glocester and his party, was unworthily created Duke of Ireland, and De la Pole the Lord Chancellor seemed to the onely great Lords (for so they would seeme) to be in the Kings debt. Strange colours for Subjects to capitulate with their King; upon giving their joynt aydes against the common enemy, now ready with one destruction to overwhelme them all. The time they tooke to worke this pretended amendment in state, was not well fitted. It favoured of somewhat else besides the love of Common-weale. Private ambitions and passions could not be wanting in such oppositions. This is some mens judgement, let the sequels shew how just.

(66) There were called up at this Parliament for defence of the Realme innumerable people out of all Shires, which forces lay about London within twentie miles round, and had no pay but lived upon ſpoyle. Theſe at laſt were licenſed to depart to bee ready at warning. There was alſo the Lord Chancellour accuſed, of (we wot not what) petty crimes (for the abuſes of following ages have made them ſeeme ſo,) as for paying to the Kings Coffers but *twentie markes yearely, for a Fee-farme, whereof himſelfe received threeſcore and ten, and ſome ſuch other. To pacifie theſe great Lords, the Lord Chancellour is diſgraced, and the ſeale taken from him, againſt the Kings will, and given to Thomas Arundell Biſhop of Elye, and then the houſes of Parliament yeelded to give halfe a Tenth, and halfe a Fifteenth, but upon condition that it ſhould bee diſpoſed of, as the Lords thought fit, for defence of the Realme. The money was thereupon delivered to the Earle of Arundell to furniſh himſelfe, for that purpoſe, to the Sea. But to rid the Duke of Ireland out of the Realme, the Lords were willing he ſhould have thoſe thirtie thouſand Markes, for which the heires of Charles thouſand Markes, for which the heires of Charles of Bloys, (who heretofore challenged Britaine) were tranſacted to the French, upon condition that the ſaid Duke ſhould paſſe into Ireland before the next Eaſter.

* Tho. Walſ. in Rich. 2.

(67) The Parliament was no ſooner diſſolved, but the King recals the Earle of Suffolke to the Court, keepes both him, the Duke of Ireland, and Alexander Nevile Archbiſhop of Yorke about his perſon, in greater favour then before. Inſomuch that at Chriſtmaſſe he made De la Pole to fit at his owne Table, not in the uſuall garment of a Peere, but Princely robed. Surely therein not well; for ſome of thoſe great Lords, (though not by ſo ſweet meanes as were fit) did deſire to waken him out of Courtly drowſineſſe, and (as men that knew not whāt peace meant) to put him into actions worthy of his name and greatneſſe. Theſe other perſons were not ſo friended, or qualified, that they could ſupport a King againſt an univerſall miſlike. But the King upon a ſtomacke doth it; ſo that (ſaith Walſingham) here firſt grew the Kings hatred againſt the Peeres, that from thence-forth hee never (as it is ſaid) regarded them but fainedly. So much more dangerous ſometime is the remedy then a very grievous malady.

(68) King Richard (whoſe age and place ſtood in need of wiſer inſtructions) not thus contemned to have whetted the diſpleaſures of the greater Peeres, as if hee had ſaid to himſelfe, Rumpatur * quiſquis rumpitur invidiâ; is further drawne, as was ſaid, to plot the death of his Vncle, Thomas of Woodſtocke Duke of Gloſter, and other enemies of De la Pole; who together being invited to a feaſt (by the bloudy deviſe of Sir Nicholas Brambre late Lord Major of London) ſhould together have periſhed. But the preſent Lord Major Nicholas Exton (whom the conſpirators would have had their Partaker, if it may be beleeved) honeſtly refuſed to aſſent. The Lords hereupon having admonition, reſtrained to come.

The Lord Major of London refuſeth to be of conſpiracy againſt the Duke of Gloſter.

(69) The perſons which were in the publike envie for their over-ſwaying grace with the King, were (as you have heard) Robert de Vere Duke of Ireland, Michael de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, the ſaid Archbiſhop, Sir Thomas Burley Knight, and Sir Richard Stury: Theſe men hearing that Richard Earle of Arundel, and Thomas Earle of Nottingham Marſhall of England, * had encountred with a great Fleet of Frenchmen, Flemmings, Normans, and Spaniards, and taken above one hundreth ſaile of Ships, and in them nineteene thouſand Tunnes of wine, depraved the victory, ſaying, that the vanquiſhed were but Merchants, whoſe loves had beene more profitable to our Country, then ſo to ſtirre them to inexorable hatred. But theſe (ſaith * one) who thus judged, were rather the *Knights of Venus then Bellona, fitter for a Canopy then a Campe, for language then a lance, as they who were awake to diſcourſe of martiall actions, but drowſie when they ſhould come to doe them. Such therefore converſing with the King (not * without ſuſpition of foule familiaritie) never tooke care to put into his minde any matter which beſeemed ſo patent a Prince, we ſay not (quoth our Author) as concerning the uſe of Armes, but not even concerning thoſe very recreations, which moſt of all become great ſpirits, as hunting, hawking, and the like.* But the Earles did more then meddle with Merchants (who yet were able to make dangerous reſiſtances) for they landed at Breſt in Britaine, and with great difficultie delivered it againe from ſo bad neighbours as the two wooden Forts neerely buile, where the other had ſtood, one of which they fired, and the other they mand with the Engliſh Garriſon of Breſt. Then ſtuffing it with all ſorts of proviſions for a yeare, and furniſhing the wants of the Souldiers with all neceſſaries, they returned, having worthily wonne the love and praiſes of the people. Which, as they were alſo due to them from the King, yet comming to his preſence, they (by theſe mens evill offices) had ſo cold entertainment, as they eſtſoones with-drew themſelves from Court to live quietly upon their owne at home. After them the brave yong Henry Hotſpur, Lord Piercy was ſent (ill provided) to the Sea; nevertheleſſe hee ventred, and returned (when his commiſſion was expired) with honour.

(72) One thing done by the Duke of Ireland was furely full of wickednеſſe and indignitie. For he having to wife a young, faire, and noble Lady, and the Kings neere kinſwoman, (for ſhee was Grandchild to King Edward by his * daughter Iſabel,) did put her away, and tooke one of Queene Annes women, a Bohemian * of baſe birth, called in her mother tongue Lancetrone. This intollerable villanie offered to the blood royall, King Richard did not encounter; neither had the power, ſome ſay, who deemed that by witchcrafts and ſorceries (practiſed upon him by one of the Dukes followers) his judgement was ſo ſeduced and captivated, that hee could not ſee what was honeſt or fit to doe. But where Princes are wilfull or floathfull, and their favourites flatterers, or time-ſervers, there needs no other enchantments to infatuate, yea, and ruinate the greateſt Monarch.

(71) The Duke of Gloceſter tooke the matter more to heart, reſolving to be revenged for the infamy and confuſion, which was brought thereby upon his noble kinſwoman. Meane-while the King, as if hee meant to conduct his deare friend the Duke toward Ireland, went with him into Wales. There the King deviſeth with him, the Earle of Suffolke, Sir Robert Treſilian, and others, (who were equally afraid of the Lords) how to deſtroy the Duke of Gloceſter, the Earles of Arundell, Warwicke, Derby, Nottingham, and ſuch others, as from whom they thought fitte to bee cleare. Much time beeing trifled thus away in Wales, they come together (as if the Dukes appointed voyage, or rather baniſhment into Iraland, were quite forgotten) to the Caſtle of Nottingham, there more freely to deliberate. A fearefull eſtate of a Monarchie. Hee among a few, generally ill-beloved, and ill-adviſed, and ill-provided; for their whole ſtrength was the King, and theſe emulations made that force feeble both to him and them: the Lords, potent, martiall, rich, and popular; he at Nottingham, they not neere him, but abroad farre off: the Duke of Lancaſter with the flower of the Engliſh Forces, and mightie neighbours, watching for the ruine of all. The courſe agreed upon by the King and that ill-choſen Senate, was firſt to have the opinion of all the Chiefe Lawyers concerning certaine Articles of Treaſon, within whoſe nets and ſprindges they preſumed the reforming Lords were; and if the Lawyers (who ſeldome faile Princes in ſuch turnes) did conclude, that thoſe Articles contained treaſonable matter, then under a ſhew of juſtice they ſhould be proceeded againſt accordingly. Theſe Lawyers (who were the very men, which in the laſt ſeditious Parliament, gave advice to the Lords to doe as they did) now meeting, were demanded, whether by the law

The Sheriffes of Shires (being queſtioned) denied, that they could raiſe any competent forces againſt the Lords, their whole Counties were ſo addicted in their favour: and being further willed to ſuffer no Knights to be choſen for the Shires, but ſuch as the King and his Councell ſhould name, they anſwered, that the election belonged to the Commons, who favoured the Lords in all.

(72) Vpon the 25. of Auguſt there met before the King at Nottinham theſe Lawyers, Robert Triſilian his chiefe Iuſtitiar, Robert Belknap chiefe Iuſtitiar of the common Pleas, John Holt, Roger * Stilethorpe, and William Burgh Iuſtitiars in the ſame Court, and John Lockton the Kings Serjeant at Law: all which being upon their allegiance charged to deliver their opinions, whether ſuch * Articles as were there in the Kings behalfe propounded (which Articles comprehended all the poynts of advantage taken againſt the proceedings of the laſt Parliament, and the diſplacing of the Lord Chancellor, Michael de la Pole) contayned matter of Treaſon, they all of them anſwered affirmatively, and ſubcribed; which afterward coſt them deare. Iudge Belknap fore-ſaw the danger, and therefore was very unwilling to put his Seale to the anſwеres, ſaying; there wanned but a * hurdle, a horſe, and a halter, to carrie him where hee might ſuffer the death he deſerved; for if I had not done this (quoth he) I ſhould have died for it, and becauſe I have done it, I deſerve death for betraying the Lords. The King in the meane ſpace purvayes himſelfe of people to fight, if need required.

(73) The Duke of Gloceſter (ſadded with theſe newes) ſent the Biſhop of London to bring his purgation upon oath to the King, who inclining to credite the ſame, was in an evill houre diverted by De la Pole. The Duke makes his and their common danger konwn to the Earles of Arundel, Warwicke, and Derby, eldeſt ſonne to the Duke of Lancaſter. They ſeverally gather forces, that united they might preſent their griefes to the King, who to keep them from joyning, ſends the Earle of Northumberland to arreſt the Earle of Arundel at Reygate in Surrey, where he abode. But by reaſon of Arundels power, it was too dangerous a worke. Northumberland returnes, and Arundel (admoniſhed by the Duke of Gloceſter of his farther perill) eſcapeth in poſt to Haringey, where the Duke and Earle of Warwicke had ſtore of people.

(74) As yet no bloud was drawne. Peaceable men procured that the Lords ſhould repaire ſafe to Weſtminſter, and there be heard. Thither approaching they are advertiſed by the Biſhop of Elie and others (who had ſworne on the Kings behalfe for good dealing to be uſed during the Interim) that, at the Mewes by Charing-Croſſe, a thouſand armed men (which without the Kings privitie Sir Thomas Trivet and Sir Nicholas Brambre Knights, were reported to have laide for their deſtruction) attended in ambuſh. The King ſweares his innocency, but the Lords come ſtrong, and truſt no longer. The King royally adorned keepes ſtate in Weſtminſter-Hall with many his Prelates and Peeres about him; the Lords preſent themſelves upon their knees, and being required by the Biſhop of Elye the Lord Chancellour (for the Lord De la Pole never had that place againe) why they were in warlike manner aſſembled at Haringey Parke, contrary to the lawes, their joynt anſwere was, That they were aſſembled for the good of the King and kingdome, and to weed from about him ſuch Traitors as he continually held with him. The traitors they named to be, Robert de Vere Duke of Ireland, Alexander Nevile Archbiſhop of Yorke, Michael at the Pole Earle of Suffolke, Sir Robert Treſilian that falſe Iuſtitiar (quoth they) and Sir Nicholas Brambre that falſe Knight of London. To prove them ſuch, they threw downe their gloves, as gages of challenge for a triall to be had by the Sword. The King hereunto replied, as knowing that they were all hidden out of the way (This ſhall not be done ſo, but at the next Parliament (which ſhall be the morrow after Candlemas) all parties ſhall receive according as they deſerve. And now (ſaith he) to you my Lords; how or by what authority durſt you preſume to levy force againſt me in this land? did you think to have terrified me by ſuch your preſumption? have not I men of Armes, who (if it pleaſed me) could environ, and kil you like caſtle? Certainely in this reſpect I eſteeme of you all no more, then as of the baſeſt ſcullions in my Kitchens. Having vſed theſe, and many the like high words, he tooke up his uncle the Duke from the ground, where all this while hee kneeled, and bad all the other riſe. The reſt of the conference was calme, and the whole deferred till the next Parliament, then ſhortly to be holden at Weſtminſter. In the meane time (that the World might ſee how little able the King was to equall his words with deedes) a Proclamation is ſet forth, in which the King cleareth the Lords (before any trial) of treaſon objected, and names thoſe perſons for unſuit accuſers, whom the Lords had before named.

The Kings reply.

The popular Lords hold anſwer to the King.

(75) The factious Lords nevertheleſſe thought not good to ſever themſelves, but to keepe together for feare of the worſt, which fell out to their advantag; for the Duke of Ireland (with the Kings privity) had gathered a power in Wales and Cheſhire, which they intercepting neere to Burford and Bablake, ſlew Sir William Molineux leader of the Cheſhire men, and ſome others, and made the Duke to flie in great feare. Among the ſpoyles of the Dukes carriages there were found (as the Divell would have it) certaine letters of the King to the ſaid Duke of Ireland, by which their counſels were plainely diſcovered. The Lords hereupon march with ſpeede up to London, having an Armie of about fortie thouſand men. The King ſhuts himſelfe up in the Tower, but is glad before long to admit them to his preſence. There they (unreverently inough) obiect mutability to him and his underhand workings; they objected alſo, that he had ſecretly practiſed to flie with the Duke of Ireland into France, and to deliver up to the French Kings poſſeſſion Callis, and ſuch pieces as the Crowne of England held in thoſe parts: to prove which diſhonourable act, they (as ſome write) produced the French packers intercepted. This wrung teares (perhaps of diſdaine) from the King, and hee yeelded to come to Weſtminſter upon the next day, there to heare and determine farther. The King in ſigne of amitie ſtayed his Coſen the Earle of Derbie (the ſame who afterward dethroned him) to ſupper. O where was the courage of a King? The Lords in their owne quarrell could draw up fortie thouſand men, but in the generall danger of the Realme, when the Commons were up, and the French hung over their heads, with no leſſe hatred then preparations, no ſuch numbers appeared. Was it for their honour or praiſe, that their moſt right full King ſhould by their violence be driven to conſult upon flight out of his proper Kingdome? The City of London was alſo in no little perill at this preſent by their acceſſe, which drawne by juſt feare was contented to open the gates, and harbour the Lords and their partakers. Theſe Lords, who ſo often are called here the Lords, are named in our * Statute Bookes to be but theſe five; The Duke of Gloceſter, the Earles of Derby, Arundell, Warwicke and Marſhall.

(76) The next day, he would have deferred his repaire

repaire to Westminster. This being signified to the Kings Lords (for so they might be called, as being more Masters then the King) they labour not, by humble words, and dutious reasons to perswade the use or necessity of his presence in that place, but contrary to their allegiance, and all good order, send him word; That if he came not quickly, according to appoyntment, they would choose them another King, who both would, and should obey the counsell of the Peeres. They had him indeed amongst them, whom (belike) they even then meant to have surrogated, that is to say, the before said Earle of Derby, heire to the Duke of Lancaster. The Lords certainely had so behaved themselves towards the King, that they well saw they must be masters of his person and power, or themselves in the end perish.

The rough and hautie behaviour of the Lords.

(77) The King (after a preposterous and inverted manner,) attending his Subjects pleasures at Westminster, heavily and unwillingly is drawne to disclaime Alexander Nevil Archbishop of Yorke, the Bishops of Duresme and Chichester, the Lords Souch and Beaumont, with sundry others. Neither was the Male-sexe onely suspected to these curious pruners; the Ladie Poinings, and other Ladies were also removed, and put under baile to answere such things as should be objected. Sir Simon Burley, Sir William Elmham, Sir John Beauchampe of Holt, Sir John Salisbury, Sir Thomas Trivet, Sir James Berneys, Sir Nicholas Dagworth, and Sir Nicholas Brambre Knights with certaine Clerkes were apprehended, and kept in strait prison, to answere such accusations (what if meere calumniations?) as in the next Parliament at Westminster should be objected.

Persons removed from about the King.

(78) The Parliament began at Candlemas, where the King was unwillingly present: The first day of the Session, all the Iudges, Fulthorp, Belknap, Care, Hott, Burgh, and Lockton, were arrested as they sate in Iudgement on the Bench, and most of them sent to the Tower. The cause alledged was; that having first ouer ruled them with their counsels and directions, which they assured them to be according to law, they afterward at Nottingham gave contrary iudgement to that which themselves had fore-declared. Trisilian the chiefe Iustice prevented them by flight, but being apprehended, and brought to the Parliament in the fore-noone, had sentence to be drawne to Tyburne in the after-noone, and there to have his throat cut; which was done accordingly. Sir Nicholas Brambres turne was next. This Brambre (saith Walsingham) was said to have imagined to be made Duke of new Troy (the olde suppofed name of London) by murthering thousands of such Citizens, (whose names hee had billed for that purpose,) as were suspected of likelihood to resist him. Then Sir Iohn Salisbury, and Sir Iames Berneys two young Knights, Sir Iohn Beauchamp of Holt, Steward of the Houshold to the King, and Iohn Blake Esquire, were likewise sacrificed to revenge. Sir Simon Burley onely had the worship to have but his head strucken off. Loe the noble respect which the gentle Lords had to justice and amendment. This was no age (we see) for a weake or sloathfull Prince to sit in quiet; for now the people, and then the Peeres, soyle and trample the regall authoritie under foote: the Duke of Ireland, the Archbishop of Yorke, the Earle of Suffolke, and others, had their estates confiscated to the Kings use by Act of Parliament, as in the *booke of Statutes may be seene, together with a great part of the whole proceedings.

(79) These troubles boiling and burning within, in the Bowels of the State, the Scots abroad had opportunity to invade the North of England, under the conduct of Sir William Dowglasse, a noble young Knight, a parallel and rivall in the honour of Armes to Henry Hotspur, Lord Piercy, whom Hotspur, fighting hand to hand slew in battell: but the Earle of Dunbar comming with an excessive number of Scots, tooke Hotspur and his brother prisoners, killing many Englishi, not without such losse to themselves, that they forthwith returned.

(80) But these unneighbourly hostilities soone after found some surceasse, there being a meeting at Callis betweene the Englishi and French, about establishing a peace: and albeit, because the French would have the Scot and Spaniard included therein, the conclusion was deferred, yet shortly after it was resolved upon for three yeeres, the Scots being comprehended therein. (81) King Richard (being now of age) declares himselfe free to governe of himselfe, without either controlment, or helpe of any other then such as he selected to that place, and in token that he was at liberty, he takes the Great Seale of England from Thomas Arundel Archbishop of Yorke, (Alexander Nevil being attainted and fled) and departs out of the Councell-Chamber: After a while hee returnes, and gives it backe to William Wickham (the * renowned Bishop of Winchester) who was unwilling to have accepted the same. Hee also puts out sundrie Officers, substituting such others as best liked him. From the Councell-Table he removed his uncle Thomas of Woodstocke Duke of Glocester, the Earle of Warwicke, and others; which (as it might) encouraged the Dukes enemies about the King, to doe evill offices betweene them. Yet the King did not prefently credite what was whispered into his eare, concerning a purpose suggested to be in the Duke, to raise forces againe; but acquainting him withall, was satisfied. Nevertheleffe, he would not suffer the Duke to pursue an orderly, or any, revenge upon the Authors, whom indeede it had beene wisdome to have punished in an examplary manner.

The King declares himsilfe to be of age, and takes the government upon him.

(83) The Duke of Lancaster the meane while, returnes into Gascoigne out of Spaine, and not long after into England. The succesfe of that voyage (being made to claime the Crowne of Castile and Leon) was briefly this. Iohn King of Castile * alledged that Constance the Dukes wife was not right heire, but he. For, albeit the Lady Constance was eldest daughter and heire to Peter sonne of Alfonse, whose father Ferdinand the fourth, was son of Sanchez the fourth, and the sonne of Alfonse the tenth, all Kings of Spaine successively; yet, that neither Constance, Peter, Alfonse, Ferdinand, nor Sanchez had the right. His reason was; for that Alfonse the tenth, (chosen Emperour of Almaine) had, before he begat the said Sanchez, an elder sonne, called Ferdinand de la Cerda, who married Blanch the Daughter of S. Lewis King of France, from whom descended Alfonse de la Cerda (who entituled himselfe King, but died without issue) and Ferdinand, who had a daughter married to Iohn, sonne of the Infant of Portugall Emmanuel, mother to the Lady Ioane, wife of King Henry the second, father of Iohn King of Castile defendant.

of food. Thus having said, he held downe his head, as hee sate on horse backe, and wept most bitterly, secretly powring forth his prayers to Almightie God, and most humbly beseeching mercy. From which time forward his affaires in Spaine succeeded happily.

(85) The warres had beene * sharpe and teadious, but the end acceptable. For Don Iuan King of Castile, a Prince of no evill conscience, seeing the right which the Duke of Lancaster urged, and foreseeing what calamities might happen hereafter, (if as was feared the French should match with him) sought and obtained a firme peace. The Principall conditions were: That the Lord Henry, his sonne and heire, should marry the Lady Katherine, daughter and heire to the Duke and Constance his Wife; That the Lord Henry (during his fathers life) should be called Prince of Austria, and Katherine his wife Princesse: That * for default of issue betweene the young Princely couple, the Crowne should come to the Lord Edward Duke of Torke, who had married the other Daughter of King Peter. That the King of Spaine should lade * eight Cars with wedges of gold for the Duke; or (as * some write) pay two hundreth thousand nobles, toward the defrayment of the Dukes huge charges; That finally, he should give sufficient Caution for an Annuitie of * ten thousand pounds, during the lives of the said Duke and Dutchesse, to be duly paid to their uses at the Citie of * Bayon in Gascoigne.

(86) The King, at such time as the Duke of Lancaster returned, was at Reading, whither he had commanded the Peeres to repaire. To that meeting the Duke makes haste, aswell to present his dutie to his Soveraigne, as to be an author of love and peace betweene the King and Lords, against some of whom the King was not thought to be very favourably disposed. Which hee graciously effected, as seeming to addict his minde to offices of pietie and publique benefit. Certainely the wisdome and moderation of the Duke of Torke his brother, were such, in all the late, and other tumults, that he is not so much as once named among the factious; which Christian spirit if it had raigned in all the rest, England had never beene polluted with such infinite blood shed of her noblest Children; neither had the goodly fabricke of State, laden with innumerable trophees, falne under that most hideous Chaos, which succeeding ages saw and sighed for.

(87) The King upon the Duke of Lancasters returne, whether hee felt the keeping of Aquitaine an unprofitable burthen, or the absence of his uncle the Duke, a thing worthy to be purchased at any rate, certaine it is, that in a Parliament held at London, he vested in him that famous Dutchy, by delivering the Cap of State, and Ducal Rod; whither hee shortly went to take possession. His sonne, Henry of Bullingbroke Earle of Derbie, loath to spend his houres in sloath, but desirous to pursue renowne by martiall Acts in forreine parts, fayled over to the warres in Prussia, where in sundry enterprizes against the Lithuanians, he wan great honour, which, by comparison of King Richards calmneffe, prepared a way for him in the Englishes affections, to points more eminent.

(88) The Pope now understood, that the Englisb State began againe to be sensible of Romish encroachments; and as in a * former Parliament they had enacted against all Collations of Bishoprickes and dignities by the Pope, with banishmint to all which did accept such Collations, and death to all that brought in any excommunications from the Pope, to hinder the execution of that Act; so in this last Parliament, * another severe Act was made, against such as went to the Pope to procure any such provisions. A Proclamation also was made at London, * that all beneficed men then being in the Court of Rome, should returne by a day prefixed, or loose all their livings. The Pope himself (saith Walsingham) troubled with * so great a thunderclap, sent with all speed into England, to perswade the King, that such Statutes as had beene thus made in their prejudice who followed the Court of Rome, and such other clauses as tended to the dammage of that See, should be made voide; whereto the Kings answer was, that the Popes Nuncio must expect till the next Parliament: At which Parliament the King, as also the Duke of Lancaster, seemed to have some respect to the Pope, (whose messenger was there Present) but the * Knights of the house would not in any wise give their consents, *that such * Rome-gadders should without due punishment pursue their wonted course, longer then till the next Parliament*. To furnish the Duke of Lancaster into France, to treat of a peace, and upon condition that the King should that yeare invade Scotland, large contributions were there made, both by Clergy and Laity. Hereupon the Lord * Henry Piercy, Hotspur (who had redeemed himfelf) was called from his charge at Callis, and made Warden of the Marches against Scotland; Thomas Mowbray Earle of Nottingham succeeding in the Captaine-ship of Callis. The Dukes chargefull employment in France bare no other flower, then a yeares short truce.

(89) The Kings wants still encreasing with his imployments, the Londoners (carried away with evill counsell) did a thing most unworthy of their Citie and themselves, and it might to them have prooved as hurtfull, as it was unworthy, at such time as the King * desired the loane but of one thousand pounds; which was not onely churlishly denied, but a certaine Lumbard, honestly offering to lend the same, was badly used, beaten, and almost slaine. Their liberties for that and other * disorders are seised, and their proper Magistracy dissolved, (Guardians being given them, first Sir Edward Dallinging, then Sir Baldwin Radington) and their Major, and some chiefe Citizens layed in prisons farre off from London. The punishment brought the soulenesse of their errours to their sight; but by the Duke of * Glocesters intercession (who did not unwillingly lay hold upon such occasions of popularity) the King and Queene are wonne to enter the Citie, which gave them triumphall entertainement. The Sea is not sodainly calmed after a tempest, neither a Princes anger. By degrees yet, and not without deare repentance, they were at last restored to their former condition in all points.

(90) The King declaring his purpose to crosse into Ireland, had an aide of money conditionally granted: foure yeares truce by the travell of the two Dukes of Lancaster and Glocester being concluded in France. This yeare was farther notable for many great Funerals. Constance Dutchesse of Aquitaine, and Lancaster, a Lady of great * Innocency and devotion: the Counteffe of Derbie her Daughter in law, Isabel the Dutchesse of Torke, and a Lady noted for too great a fineneffe and delicacy, yet at her death shewing much repentance and sorrow for her love to those pestilent vanities, left this present life. But all the griefe for their deaths did in no sort equall that of the Kings, for the losse of his owne Queene Anne, which about the same time hapned at Sheene in Surrey, whom he loved even to a kinde of madneffe: but Ladies onely died not; for Sir Iohn Hankwood, whose chevalry had made him renowned over the Christian world, did in this yeare depart an aged man out of this World in Florence; where his ashes remaine honoured at this present with a stately Tombe, and the Statue of a Man at Armes, erected by the gratitude of that State and Citie, which chiefly by his conduct, courage and valour (to this day admired amongst them) was preserved. But

But the Duke of Lancaster having all things ready, sets saile to Burdeaux, there, with the consent of the State to take possession of his lately granted Dutchy.

(91) The King doth the like for Ireland; where that sort of the Irish which are called the wild, had greatly infested the English Pale, and other good Subjects there, to the great dammage of the Crowne of England. In the times of Edward the third, Ireland yeelded to the Kings coffers * thirty thousand pounds yeerely, but now things were so growne out of order, that it cost the King thirty thousand Markes by yeere. To reduce the rebellious, himselfe conducts thither an Army, attended upon by the Duke of Gloucester, the Earles of March, Nottingham and Rutland, all the Irish being commanded to avoyd out of England. The terror of the preparations, and shining presence of a King (which above all worldly things is pleasant to the Irish) had such effects that sundry great men were compelled to submit themselves. To supply the Kings wants, growne in the Irish expedition, Edmund Duke of Yorke, the Kings Vncle, and Custos or Warden of England, called a Parliament at London, (whither the Duke of Gloucester repaired to declare the Kings wants) and hath contributions granted. Nevertheless, so strong a party against the Clergy, and Fryarly abuses of those times discovered it selfe therein, that the Archbishop of Yorke, the Bishop of London, and others, prest over-Sea to the King at Dublin, beseeching him to returne, the sooner to represse the Lollards (so called they the embracers of Wiclieffes doctrine) and their favourers, who sought, not onely (as they untruly pretended) to wring away all the possessions of the Church, but that which was worse, to abrogate and destroy all Ecclesiasticall constitutions, whereas they aymed onely at the redresse of exorbitancy in the Papall Clergy. The King hereupon returnes; by whose arrivall and authority, those consultations of the Laity were laid downe. Sir Richard Story a servant of his had beene forward against the Prelates; of him therefore he takes an oath upon the holy Gospell, that he should not hold such opinions any longer. The Knight takes that oath, and we (saith the King) doe sweare, that if thou dost breake it, thou shalt die a most shamefull death. The rest hearing the Lion roare so terribly, drew in their hornes, and would be seene no more.

(92) The King caused the body of the late Duke of Ireland to be brought into England. His exceeding love to him was such, that he commanded the Cypresse chest wherein his body lay embalmed, to be opened, that he might see, view, handle, and openly expresse his affection. The dead remaines of this noble young Gentleman, (by his birth-right Earle of Oxford, and by race a Vere) were buried at the Priorie of Coln in Essex, there being present the King himselfe, the Countesse Dowager of Oxford, the Dukes mother, the Archbishop of Canterbury with many Bishops, Abbots, and religious persons, but few of the Lords, for they had not as yet digested the hate they bare him.

An. Dom. 1396.

(93) The Duke of Lancaster was this while in Aquitaine, where he had fought to winne the people with incredible largesse, to accept of his Soveraignitie, according to the tenor of King Richards grant. Little did hee then thinke, that within lesse then sixescore and three yeares after, an * Ambassador of King Henry the 8. should write thus of Burdeaux it selfe, the capitall City of Gascoigne and Guien: Anglorum nulla ferè vestigia remanent, &c. There are (saith that learned Gentleman) scarse any foot-prints of the Englishmen remaining. In the Churches, and other places newly refreshed and reedified, such Armories of the English as stood, were utterly blotted and defaced: yet in the Church of the Fryers Preachers, the Armories of the Duke of Lancaster stand entire in a Glasse-window, and in the eldest wall of the Citie those also of England, though consumed in a manner with age: The Lawes, Statutes, and Ordinations which were made by the English, are notwithstanding observed at this day. But the Dukes eye could not looke so farre into the times to come. Nevertheless we that see these things must confesse, that the best Kingdome under heaven is not so worth the getting, as that with the wilfull contempt of God and conscience any man should seeke to purchase it.

(94) But while the Duke was thus busied in Courting the Gascoignes good will, * who had sent into England, to shew causes why they should not attorne to the Duke, (and yet were wrought at last to the point of yeelding,) he receives a commandement from King Richard to returne, that he might goe with him into France; which he obeyed. The King keeping his at Langeley in Hartfordshire, the Duke was there entertained with more honour (as it was thought) then love. Being licensed to depart for a time he repaired to Lincolne, where he a widdower, married his old love the Lady Katherine Swinford, now a Widdow. Men did wonder at it, but hee therein obeyed the remorse of a Christian conscience, without respect to his own unequall greatnesse, for having had sundry Children by her in his former Wives time, hee made her and them now the onely sufficient amends, which the law of God or man enjoyneth. And further in a Parliament held the yeere following, the Duke procured an Act to passe, by which, such children as he formerly had by his new Dutchesse, were legitimated; and surnamed them Beufort, being * foure of them, Iohn, Thomas, Henry, Ioane; the second of which was by the Kings bountie created Earle of Somerset.

(95) The King, being specially accompanied with those his uncles of Lancaster and Glocester, at a most sumptuous and chargefull enterview betweene him and Charles King of France, in the parts of Calais and Gynes, espoused the Lady Isabel, Daughter of the said Charles. At the delivery of her, King Richard, in the presence of all the greatest Princes, Peeres, and Ladies of either Nation, gave the King his father in law great thankes for a gift so noble and acceptable, adding, he tooke her upon the conditions made betweene the two Nations, to the intent that living in peace and rest, they might attaine to the establishment of a perpetuall amitie, for avoyding the effusion of Christian blood, which would in likelihood have followed, had not at that time affinitie beene contracted betweene them. The young Lady was not above seven or eight yeeres old, but the truce was taken for thirtie yeares. Her person therefore was committed to the Dutchesses of Lancaster and Glocester, and other great Ladies, who conducted her to Calais. From whence, after a short stay, the King, his young Queene (with whom he had great riches) and all the glorious company came over into England. Their persons arrived safe, but the Kings gorgeous Pavilions, and a great part of his stuffe was cast away by tempest in the transportation. This journey (beside his losses at Sea) cost the King above forty thousand markes.

(96) The outward felicitie of England seemed at this time very great, and therafter seemed so, because it was likely to continue. In the Duke of Gloucesters person that bright prosperitie was first overshadowed. He, Vir ferocissimus & præcipitis ingenii (as * Polydor censures him,) a most fierce man, and of an head-long wit, thinking those times, wherein he had mastred the King, were nothing changed, though the King was above thirty yeares old, forbare not, roughly, nor so much to admonish, as to checke and schoole his Soveraigne. The peace with France displeased him, that therefore he calumniates. The King had restored Bresse in Britaine to the Duke, upon re-emburfements of the money lent; he tels the King that he should first conquer a Towne, before he parted with any; yet the King answeres, that he could not in conscience deraine the same, now that the Duke had re-paid his loane. There were other things which could not so well be answered. For a vaine rumour * that * that he should be chosen Emperour, put him belike into such a vaine of spending, as caried a proportion with that majestie; his coffers in a short time sounding like empty Caskes, there was no great monied man in whose debt hee was not, nor any in a manner so meane to whom he was not burthenous.

(97) The King had heretofore complayned of his Vncle to the Earle of Saint Paul a French man, (then in England,) whose judgement was, that such insolency was to bee revenged; but complayning to his other uncles of Lancaster and York, they wisely advised the King, not to regard his words, but his heart, which he and they knew sincere unto him. Nevertheless, partly to weaked the intolerable humour of their brother, who like a constant Admirer of his owne wayes, thought nothing well done, but what himselfe either did or directed, and partly to avoid the scandall of the Kings bad courses, they withdraw their presences from the Court. The King notwithstanding is the same man still, as the Duke of Glocester thinkes; wherefore, he breakes his minde to such as he durst trust. Arundell in Sussex is appointed the Consultation-place, where he, the Archbishop of Canterburie, the Earles of Arundel, Warwicke, Marshall and others, take an Oath of Secrecy, and conclude to raise a power to remove * the Dukes of Lancaster and Yorke, and such other as they thought best, from about the King, so to enact a reformation.

(100) In September begins the Parliament at London, where the King had a great guard of Cheshire men to secure his person, and the Lords attended also not without sufficient numbers. The Kings chiefe Agents were Sir John Busby, Sir William Bagod, and Sir Henry Greene, Knights. In the first act (after the liberties of the Church and people confirmed,) wee finde these * words: *The Commons of the Parliament have shewed to our Soveraigne Lord the King, how in the Parliament holden at Westminster, the first day of October, in the tenth yeare of his raigne, Thomas Duke of Glocester, and Richard Earle of Arundell, traitors to the King and his Realme and his people, by false imagination and compassing caused a * Commission to bee made, &c. and that the said Duke of Glocester, and Earle of Arundel, did send a greet man and Peere of the Realme in message to our Lord the King; who of their part said, that if hee would not grant and assent to the said Commission,* HEE SHOVLD BEE IN GREAT PERIL OF HIS LIFE: and so, as well the said commission, as the said Statute touching the said Commission, were made by Constraint, &c. Wherefore, the Commons pray their Soveraigne Lord the King, that the said Commission, &c. be utterly anulled, as a thing done TRAITEROVSLY, &c.

(101) The Sanctuary of former Lawes, and all particular Charters of pardon being now taken away from the Duke, Earle, and others, they lay open to manifest ruine. The * Duke of Lancaster sate in judgement as High Steward upon Richard Earle of Arundel, where, for no other but for the olde attempts, (though the other accusations seeme to have beene averred by the eight Appellants) by which, as ye have heard, so many were displaced and put to death, hee adjudged him to dye that foule death of a common Traitour: but the King satisfied himselfe with onely his head, which was at one stroake taken off at Tower-hill. That hee was a traitor either in word or deede, hee utterly did deny, and died in that denial. The constancy of this Earles carriage, as well as his arraignement, passage, and execution, (as in which hee did not discolour the honour of his bloud with any degenerous word, looke, or action) encreased the envy of his death upon the prosecutors. The Earle of Warwicke confessed with teares, (and as some say, drawne by faire hope of life) that in adhering to the Duke of Glocester in those ridings and assemblies, he was guilty of Treason. The same sentence was therefore pronounced upon him. The King nevertheless did onely banish him into the Ile of Man. But the Duke of Glocester (whom, as the peoples darling, it seemed not safe to bring to a publike triall) was secretly smothered at Calis with pillowes and featherbeds.

(102) The great Parliament (for so it seemes to have beene called, by reason of the extraordinarie numbers of Peeres, and their retinues, which came thereunto) was holden by adjournment at Shrewsbury. In it, those Iustitiars, who were partly put to death, and partly banished, but all attainted (as such time as the Duke of Glocester and the rest were in armes,) doe all of them stand thereby cleared from dishonor, and such * Articles as they subscribed, (being, together with their answers, set downe in the Act) are publikely ratified, and the offendors against them pronounced Traitours. Amongst these Articles, one, containing these great Lawyers judgements concerning the orderly proceedings in all Parliaments, is very observable: * That after the cause of such assembly is by the Kings commandement there declared, such Articles as by the King are limitted for the Lords and Commons to proceede in, are first to bee handled; but if any should proceede upon other Articles, and refuse to proceed upon those limited by the King, till the King had first answered their propositions, contrary to the Kings commaund; such, doing herein contrary to the rule of the king, are to be punished as Traitors. But the King, to content all parts, and to kindle new lights in the place of such as he had extinguished, having first created himselfe * Prince of Chester, made his cosen Henry Earle of Derby, Duke of Hereford; the Earle of Rutland Duke of Aumarl; the Earle of Nottingham Duke of Norfolke; the Earle of Kent Duke of Surrey; the Earle of Huntington, Duke of Excester; the Earle of Somerset Marquesse Dorset; the Lord Spencer Earle of Glocester, the Lord Nevile Earle of Westmerland; William Scrope Earle of Wiltshire; Thomas Piercy Earle of Worcester. (103) The formost in this goody rancke, being Henry Duke of Hereford, not long after accused Thomas Duke of Norfolke, of certaine words sounding to the Kings dishonour, which hee should privately utter to the said Henry. * Polydor (though very negligently he makes Mowbray the accuser, and Hereford Defendant) may yet be heard in reporting the effect of the words, as That King Richard held the Peeres of the land in no account, but as much as lay in him sought to destroy them, by banishing some, and putting others to death. That hee never troubled his minde with considering how his Dominions were diminished through his idlenesse. Finally, that all things went to wracke, as well in peace as warre. But the Duke of Norfolke, (who unlesse it had beene to feele how the Duke of Herefords heart was affected to the King, had little reason so to complaine) most constantly denying that ever hee spake such words; it should have come to a combat within lists; but the King to avoid (as hee pretended) such deadly fewds as might rise in the Families of two such potent Peeres, but (indeed to bee rid of an enemy with the losse of a friend) banished Norfolke for ever, and Hereford first for ten yeares, then for five. Walsingham * saith, that this censure was given against Norfolke, upon that very day in which the yeare before, hee (by the Kings commandement) had taken order for putting to death the Duke of Glocester at Callis, where-of the said Duke of Norfolke had the Captaineship.

(104) Fearefull were the tragedies which ensued these times; and heare now what is written of some Potents or wonders, presaging the same. The * Bay or Laurell trees withered over all Engeand, and afterward re-flourished, contary to many mens opinion; and upon the first of January, neere Bedford Towne, the river betweene the villages of Swelston and Harlestwood where it was deepest, did upon the sodaine stand still, and so divided it selfe, that the bottome remayned dry for about three miles space, which seemed (saith Walsingham) to portend that revolt from the King, and the division which ensued.

(105) Roger Mortimer Earle of March, Lieutenant of Ireland, having in the yeare before, while he to much * trusted to his owne Forces, beene slaine with very many others, by * O-Brin, and the Irish of Leinster, at a place called Kenlis; King Richard determines in person to revenge the bloud of his Noble-kinsman, being the man to whom hee meant the Crowne of England, if-ifsue failed to himselfe. He remembred not how broken an estate he had in England, where the peoples hearts were strongly alienated, not onely for the death of the late great Lords, and banishment of the Duke of Hereford, (whose calamitie encreased his popularity) or for the like passed exasperations, but for that (to furnish his Irish voyage) he had extorted money on all hands, taking up carriages, victuals, and other necessaries, without any recompence; whereby the hatred of his Government grew vniversall.

(106) But the evill fortune which hung ouer his head, laid forth an alluring baite to haste his destruction, by occasion of the Duke of Lancasters decease which hapned about Candlemas, and the absence of his banished sonne and heire Lord Henrie. The King (most unjustly) feizeth upon the goods of that mighty Prince his uncle, and as if all things now were lawfull, which but liked him, he determies to banish the new rightfull Duke of Lancaster Henry, not for a few yeares, but for ever; for which cause he revoked his Letters Patents granted to the saide Henry, by which his Attornyes were authorised to sue his Livery, and to compound for the respite of his homage at a reasonable rate; whereby he made it seeme plaine to the world, that he had not banished him to avoyde dissentions, but (as many said) to fill up the breaches which his riot had made in the royall treasures, with plentifull (though an undue) Escheat, as that of his deceased uncles fortune.

(107) The one stedfast base and buttresse of al lawfull Empire, is Iustice; that supports the kingly Throne. This he overthrew, and how then could himselfe hope to stand long? He lands at Waterford in Ireland with a Navie of * two hundreth ships, having with him the sonne of the late Duke of Glocester, and of the now Duke of Lancaster, to secure himselfe the rather. * His forces consisted much of Cheshire men: But that King is deceived, who reposeth his safety in violence. It was no great matter hee did there, that which fell out to bee done elsewhere, was great indeed. * His warre in Ireland was more dammagefull, then fishing with an hooke of gold, for here the baite and hooke was not onely lost, but the line, rod, and himselfe, were drawne altogether into the depthes of irrecoverable ruine. Duke Henrie sees the advantage which King Richards absence gave him, and useth it. In his Companie were Thomas Arundel the banished Archbishop of Canterbury, and his Nephew the sonne and heire of the late Earle of Arundel, and not above fifteene Laciers. His strength was (where the Kings should have beene) in the peoples hearts. Nevertheleste, the Duke did not sodainely take land, but hovered upon the Seas, shewing himselfe to the Country people in one place, now and then in another, pretending nothing but the recovery of his rightfull Heritage.

(108) Edmund Duke of Yorke, whom King Richard had left behind him to governe England, hearing this, cals unto him Edmund Stafford Bishop of Chichester, Lord Chancellor, the Earle of Wiltshire, Lord Treasurer, and the Knights of the Kings Councell, Bushie, Bagot, Greene, and Russell. Their conclusion was to levie a force to impeach Duke Henries entrance. The assembly was appointed to bee at Saint Albans, which came to worse then nothing, for the protestation that they would not hurt the Duke, whom they knew to be wronged was generall. This made the Treasurer Sir John Bushie, and Sir Henrie Greene flie to the Castle of Briftoll, Sir William Bagot to Chester, from whence he got shipping into Ireland. Meane while Duke Henrie lands at a Village heretofore called Ravenshire, to whom repaired Henry Earle of Northumberland, his sonne Henrie Lord Piercy, the Lord Nevill Earle of Westmerland, and many others, who (saith Walsingham) greatly feared King Richards tyrannie. With an armie of about threescore thousand (multitudes offering their service) they come to Briftoll, besieged the Castle, take it, and in the same the foresaid Treasurer Bushie and Greene, whose heads (at the cryes of the Commons) were the next day after their surrender severed from their bodies.

(109) King Richard was in the City of Dublin, when these most heavie newes arrived. His courage which at no time seemed great, was shortly none at all. Somewhat must be done: he leaves the sonnes of Duke Henry, & of his late uncle of Glocester (which he retained as pledges for his owne indemnitie) in the Castle of Trim, and returnes himselfe into England, entending to encounter the Duke before his force should bee too much established. The great names which accompanied him, were his late noble Creatures, the young Dukes of Aumarle, Exceter, and Surrey, the Bishops of London, Lincolne, and Carleil, and many others. There had beene some more hope for upholding his right, if hee had not made the World know, that tenne yeares space was not able to bury in him the appetite of revenge, which made many forget their owne loyalty to him, and the Crowne. Princes, see in him the use of oblivion: but some conscience of evill deserts seeming to have taken from him all confidence, he dismisseth his Armie, bidding his Steward Sir Thomas Piercy, and others, to reserve themselves for better daies.

(110) His last refuge is in Parle. For that cause there repayred to him, at the Castle of Conway in North-wales, (for thither hee was now come) the late Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Earle of Northumberland at the Kings appointment; The sum of his demands were, that if hee and eight, whom hee would name, might have honourable allowance, with the assurance of a quiet private life, hee would resigne his Crowne. This Northumberland did sweare should bee: whereupon hee forthwith departs to the Castle of Flint in their company. After a short conference there had with the Duke, they all ride that night to the Castle of Chester, being attended by the Lancastrian Army. If, to spare his peoples bloud, he was contented so tamely to quit his royall right, his fact doth not onely not seeme excusable, but glorious; but men rather thinke that it was sloath, and a vaine trust in dissimulation, which his enemies had long since discovered in him, and for that cause, both held his amendment desperate, and ran themselves into these desperate Treasons.

(111) The King did put himselfe into the Dukes hands upon the twentieth day of August, being but the forty and seventh from the Dukes first landing. From thence they travell to London, where the King lodged in the Tower: Meane while writs of Summons are sent out in King Richards name, for a Parliament to bee holden at Westminster, Crastino Michaelis. The tragicall forme of Resignation, you have * had already in Edward the second, of whom this King is a Parallell. There are named to have been present at this wofull joyfull Act, Arundel, Archbishop of Canterbury, Richard Scrope Archbishop of Torke, John Bishop of Hereford, Henry Duke of Lancaster, (who in this serious play must seeme as if hee were but a looker on) the Earles of Northumberland, and Westmerland, the Lords Burnell, Barkley, Ros, Willoughby, and Abergevenie, the Abbot of Westminster, &c.

(112) In their presence Richard as yet a King, and in his Tower of London, but not otherwise then as a prisoner, reades the Instrument of his surrender, with a seeming chearefull countenance, as if he were glad the houre was come, in which hee might tatte what it was to be a private man, and (having otherwise first done and said what then he could to put all right out of himselfe) subscribes it with his hand; but prayes, that his Cousen the Duke of Lancaster might succeed him in the regall governement, and in token that it was his desire (for hee must seeme to desire what hee could not hinder) hee * plucked off his Signet-ring, and put it upon the Dukes finger. Then did hee constitute the Archbishop of Torke, and Bishop of Hereford his Procurators, to declare to the whole Body of Parliament what he had done, and how willingly, where every one (* except the loyall and magnanimious Bishop of Carliel) being particularly asked, did particularly accept of the resignation. Nevertheleste, it was not thought enough to have his Crowne, unleste they also published his shame. Thirty * and two Articles are therefore openly (but in his absence) read; of all which, it was said (for then men might say what they listed) that he had confessed himselfe guilty. In the front was placed his abuse of the publike treasure, and unworthy waste of the Crowne-land, whereby hee grew intolerably grievous to the Subjects. The particular causes of the Dukes of Glocester and Lancaster, the Archbishop of Canterbury and Earle of Arundel, filled sundry Articles. They charged him in the reft with dissimulation, falshood, losse of honour abroad in the World, extortions, rapine, deniall of Iustice, rasures, and embezelling of Records, dishonorable shifts, wicked Axiomes of State, cruelty, covetousnesse, subordinations, lascivious nesse, treason to the rights of the Crowne, perjuries; and briefely with all sorts of unkingly vices, and with absolute tyranny.

(113) We may be assured, that nothing could then be objected so untrue or incredible, but would have gone for current and undenyable with affections so throughly prepared. Hereupon it was * concluded, that in all those thirty and two Articles, hee had broken the Oath of Empire taken at the Coronation, and all the States of the Kingdome (strange that so many should so concurre in disloyalty under pretence of equity) being asked what they thought, did hold that those causes seemed notorious, and sufficient to depose King Richard. Commissioners were therefore nominated by consent of the whole house, to pronounce the sentence of Deposition; which were, the Bishop of Asaph, the Abbot of Glassenbury, the Earle of Glocester, the Lord Barkley, William Thyrning Chiefe Iustice of the common Pleas, and some others. The forme of pronunciation was, IN THE NAME OF GOD, AMEN: We Iohn Bishop of Saint Asaph, Iohn Abbat, &c. Commissioners specially chosen by the Lords spirituall and temporall of the Realme of England, and Commons of the said Realme, representing all the States of the said Realme, sitting in place of iudgement, &c.

(114) The definitive sentence of Deposition given thus in open Parliament, there were further named certaine persons, amongst whom * William Thyrning Chiefe Iustice of the Common Pleas was thought the fitteft man, by whose lawlesse mouth that unjust doome should be delivered to the King, and who on the behalfe of the realme, should renounce to the said Richard the Fealties and Homages heretofore made unto him, and to make relation of the whole manner and causes of their proceedings. The Regall Seate was now reputed voyde; whereupon Duke Henry riseth from his place, and stands upright, that hee might bee seene of the people, then * signing himselfe with the signe of the Crosse upon the fore-head and breast, and invocating the name of Christ, hee challenged the Crowne and Realme of England, with all the members and appurtenances. His words are said to be these.

In the name of God, Amen. I, Henry of Lancaster, claime the Realme of England, and the Crowne, with all the appurtenances, as comming by the bloud-royall from King Henry, and by that iustice which God of his grace hath sent to mee, by the helpe of my kinsfolke and friends, for recovery of the said Realme, which was in point of perdition, through default of Government and breach of lawes.

(115) Which challenge and claime being thus made, all the States of the Kingdome doe with one consent grant, that the said Lord Duke should raigne over them. The Archbishop of Canterbury (brother to the late Earle of Arundel) takes him then by the right hand, and the Archbishop of Torke, (the late Earle of Wiltshires kinsman) being his assistant, placeth him in the royall Throne, with the generall acclamation and applauses of the people. Lastly, in full complement of the present solemnity, the Archbishop of Canterbury (that wee may see how the Divinity aswell as the Law of those times were degenerated into temporizing Policie) made a Sermon upon those words in Samuel, A man shall raigne over the People. By occasion whereof * he describerh out of the holy Scriptures, the happinesse of that Kingdome which is governed by a Man, and the infelicity of those Realmes where a Childe (whether in age or discretion) weeldes the Scepter. The evill whereof as they had dangerously felt under the late King, so they hoped abundantly to enjoy the other in King Henry. To all which the whole Auditory joyoully answered, Amen. Then rose the affable new Monarch, and among a few other words, hee gave the world to understand, that none should thinke hee would, as by way of Conquest, disinherite any man, certaine bad members onely excepted.

(116) From henceforth he was taken for King, and all Writs issued, and went forth in his name: which disorderly matters being orderly related to the deposed Prince in the Tower, by Thyrning the Chiefe Iustice, hee onely used these words; That hee looked not after such things, but (quoth hee) my hope is, that (after all this) my cosen will bee my good Lord and friend. The Archbishop (otherwise inexcusable in those proceedings) yet in his said Sermon seemeth gravely and truely to have described the cause of this effect; for (quoth hee) the child or infipient (which are with him æquiparable) drinketh the sweet annd delicious words unadvisedly, and perceiveth not intoxication, which they beene mingled with, till he be invironed and wrapped in all danger, as lately the experience thereof hath beene apparant to all our sights and knowledges, and not without the great danger of all this Realme. Being thus brought downe to the show, and littlenesse of a private man, wee leave him to draw his comfort out of holy meditations, as one whose violent death ensued before long, and turne over to his politike and martiall Successor.

(117) Yet in our way, wee may not quite overpasse a cursory consideration of the affaires of the Church under this King, which, for avoyding often interruptions of other argument, we have put off to this last place. For albeit the Kingdome indured great crosses in the affaires of State, (yet [a] some have thought, that it found as great blessings in matters of Religion, which in those dayes tooke so deepe roote in Religion, which in those dayes tooke so deepe roote in this our Land, by the preaching of John Wicliffe, that the branches thereof did spread themselves even [b] over the Seas. Nor were the common people onely allured with his doctrine, (though the [c] Londoners favouring of him is thought by Walsingham to have deterred the Prelates from proceeding against him, and a scholler of his in Leicestershire, is said to have drawne by his preaching, [d] all the Laymen in that Countrey) but (as the same Author reporteth) sundry of the Friars themselves fell to him, and imbraced his opinions, amongst whom one [e] being also the Popes Chaplaine, so discovered by preaching, the murders, luxuries and treasons of Fryars of his owne Habit, that the common people were astonied with the horror thereof, and cryed out to have them all utterly destroyed; which his accusations hee particularly justified by publike writing, professing hee came forth of that Order, as out of the Divels nest. But that which Walsingham much more[f] admires, is, that Wicliffes opinions were not onely entertained in ordinary Cities, but even in the Vniversity of Oxford it selfe, where was [g] the very top of wisedome and learning: and where not onely two Chancellors succeßiuely, [h] Doctor Nicholas Hereford and [i] Robert Rugge, were most earnest maintainers of Wicliffes doctrine, but also, when the Pope (to suppresse the same doctrine) sent his [k] Bull to the Vniversity, threatning the privation of all their privileges, the Proctors and Regents thereof were very doubtfull, whether they should receive the Popes Bull with honour, or rather reject it with open disgrace. Yea, the whole body of that glorious Vniversity (as the Pope there cals it in his Bull) gave a glorious [l] Testimony (under their publike Seale) of Wicliffes religious life, profound learning, orthodoxe opinions, exquisite writings, all farthest from any staine of heresie.

(118) And therefore no marveile, if not onely the Duke of Lancaster, with [m] sundry Peeres and great ones, but King Edward the third himselfe, were (as Capgrave testifieth) a favourer of him, and [n] King Richard the second and the whole Parliament did (according to his [o] instructions) much labor to abrogate the Popes transcendent power, which was a principall cause of the Popes hatred against him. Notwithstanding to discountenance the truth which he taught, in defence of Regall Supremacy against Papall Vsurpation, (as also against the Masse, Transubstantiation, Merit: against Adoration of the Hoast, of Saints, Images, and Reliques; against Friarly Orders, Pilgrimages, Indulgences,) many lewd opinions by mis-construction (as his Bookes [p] yet extant, evince) are fathered on him, yea some so monstrous and diabolicall (as, [q] that Men ought, yea, [r] that God himselfe ought to obey the Divell,) that any man which heareth them, will presently beleeve (without further perswasion) that they are but malicious figments. This famous Doctor [s] dying of a palsie, hath this charitable Eulogie or Epitaph bestowed on him by a [t] Monke; The Divels Instrument, Churches Enemy, Peoples Confusion, Heretiks Idoll, Hypocrits mirror, Schismes broacher, hatreds sower, lyes forger, Flatteries sinke; who, at his death dispaired like Cain, and stricken by the horrible judgement of God, breathed forth his wicked soule to the darke mansion [u] of the blacke divell. Whereby, Gods best children may learne, not to regard, whiles they live, the malice of the wicked, nor to expect after their death ought else but their slanderous rancour. And thus wee conclude the raigne, though not the life of King Richard.

His first Wife.

(119) The first wife of King Richard the second, was Anne, daughter unto the Emperour Charles the fourth, and sister to Wenceslaus Emperour, and King of Bohemia, who was crowned Queene the 22. of Ianuary 1382. Having been ten yeares his wife she died without any issue, at Sheen in the county of Surrey, 1392. whence her body was convayed and buried at Westminster, the seventh of the Ides of Iune.

His second Wife.

(120) Isabel, daughter unto Charles the sixth, King of France, was a Virgin about seven yeeres of age, when shee was affianced unto King Richard, 1396. Neither had her Husband (it seemeth) any nuptiall fruition of her, by reason of her tender age, before such time as his traiterous Lords, (to compasse their owne disloyall purposes, and gratifie an Vsurpers ambition) had dethroned him. What became of this young Lady, we shall further see in the ensuing Story.

Henry IV.

HENRIE THE FOVRTH, KING OF ENGLAND, AND FRANCE, LORD OF IRELAND: THE FIFTY ONE MONARCH OF ENGLAND, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND ISSVE.

Monarch 51.

CHAPTER XIIII.

HENRIE of that name the fourth, having thus obtained the title of King, in full accomplishment of all rites peculiar to Majestie, had the Crowne of England set upon his head, with all worldly magnificence and honour at West-minster, by Thomas Arundel Archbishop of Canterbury, upon the * selfe day twelve moneth, in which he had formerly been banished under Richard the second. Power and favour can set up and maintaine a King, though they cannot create a right. But such transcendent courses deviating from all due regulation of Iustice, have beene too frequent in this Kingdome. What right had William surnamed the Conqueror? What right, (we speake of a right of Equitie,) had his sonnes William the second, and Henry the first, while their elder brother lived? What right had that valiant and princely Stephen? What was the interest of Henry the second, during the life of his mother Mathildis? or that of King John, till his Nephew Arthur Duke of Britaine dyed? yea, or that of Henry the third, till Arthurs sister died in her prison at Bristow? Howbeit, in this present case, not onely Richard the late king, but the house of Mortimer, claiming from the onely daughter and heire of Lionel Duke of Clarence (an elder brother of John D. of Lancaster) doubly might have withstood the legall challenge of this Prince? That obstacle which grew by Richard, was in appearance greatest, but the other was onely dangerous. Richard had no issue but the line of Mortimer (engrafted by marriage into the house of Yorke) feeling it selfe unable to prevaile, and during Richards life-time, having no right, secretly fostered in it selfe those fires, which afterward brake forth, and taking hold of the roofe-tops of both the royall houses, never left burning, till no one principall timber was unconsumed in either, all the Male-Issues which could claime by a direct line, utterly dopt downe by mutuall massacres, and extinguished.

(2) But this wife and valiant Prince Henry, besides all other helpes toward the possession of the Crowne in present, had as much strength, as the unordinate affections and siding of a factious greater part could give, for translation of a right from one family to another; which strength (as the basis of his unjustly-reared building) he endeavoureth by all the politike meanes hee may, to make perpetuall. During therefore the former Parliament, (for Parliaments, as Kingdomes, give their voice with power, and hee who hath the force, doth commonly carry the effect of right) he * provided for their indemnities, who either came in with him, or did afterward adhere to his sides, and doth utterly abrogate, and make voide the Acts made in the one and twentieth yeare of the late King Richard the second, for so much as concerned the Attaindors, disinherisons, or other forfeitures of any persons therein named, or (in generall words) comprised. Thereby, his Vncle, Thomas Duke of Glocester, who had beene put to death at Calis without any orderly condemnation, Richard Earle of Arundel beheaded at Tower-hill, and others, were freed from the infamie of that corruption in bloud which followes executed malefactors. And the Statute made in the eleventh yeare of the said Richard, was againe fully set on foote and revived.

* Lib. Statut. An. 1. Hen. 4. cap. 3. 4.

(3) In these things King Henry did (as it were) sacrifice unto the people, aswell as to the weale publike: The said Thomas Duke of Glocester, meaning the reformation of the State, in that eleventh yeare of King Richard procured (as is before touched) an Act of Parliament, to * settle a Super-royall power, for a yeare, in certaine Peeres, by vertue of which commission the intended reformation was so farre prosecuted, that sundry great persons and others (favourites of the unfortunate King) were put to shamefull death, banished and confiscated.

* Lib. Statut. An. 11. Rich. 2. cap. 1.

(4) But Richard * afterward (by the Duke of Aumarls inftigation) re-examines all the former passages and proceedings, and satisfied his pleasure and displeasure, as already hath beene shewed; The Articles in those times sentenced for treasonable by the most eminent Lawyers, did extend themselves so farre, that the Prince seemed to have too great meanes left to worke mischiefe to the Peeres and people: and that we may see the constant humour in Lawyers to judge with the will of the greatest, * the Lord William Thyrning Chiefe Iustice of the Common Bench, the Lord Walter Clopton Chiefe Iustice, and others, being demanded their opinions, upon the same Articles, for which Sir Robert Trisilian had lost his life, and for the which others had so terribly beene censured by the Glosterian faction, affirmed (as Trisilian and others did) that the said Commission was against the royall Prerogative, and the procurers thereof were all Traitors.

* 11. Reg. 21.

* So is he and the rest called, Lib. Statut. An. 21. Rich. 2. cap. 12.

(5) King Henry therefore, in this his first Parliament, reduceth the state of treasons, (being crimes of the highest and foulest nature) to a more certaine head, utterly abolishing all such as were established by the late King Richard. The words of the * Statute it selfe are; Whereas, in the Parliament holden the one and twentieth yeare of the late King Richard, divers paines of treason were ordained by Statute, in as much as there was no man which did know how hee ought to behave himselfe, to doe, speake, or say, for doubt of such paines: It is accorded, and assented by the King, the Lords and Commons, that in no time to come any treason be judged otherwise, then it was ordained by the Statute, in the time of his noble Grandfather, King Edward the third, whom God assoile. So was that net broken, the perilous estate of Subjects relieved, the people well gratified, and the King hereby became gracious and popular.

* An. 2. Hen. 4. cap. 10.

King Henry createth his son Henry Prince of Wales.

(6) And that his indulgent magnificence might aswell appeare, as his civill prudence, hee (in this Parliament) created Henry his eldest sonne Prince of Wales, Duke of Aquitaine and Cornwall, and Earle of Chester, by * assent of all the States. To bis friend the Earle of Northumberland hee gave the Isle of Mann, as that which he had atchieved by Conquest, (so the cited * Record speaks) of Sir William de Scrope Knight, Earle of Wiltshire, beheaded at Bristol. The Earle of Northumberland had it granted to hold by the service of bearing Lancasters Sword on the left hand of the King at the Coronation. Vpon the Earle of Westmerland, hee bestowed the Earledome of Richmond. Lastly, as a binding knot, hee causeth the * Crowne to bee entailed upon the heires of his body, having at that time foure sonnes alive, Henry Prince of Wales, Thomas, John and Humfrey.

* Camb. in Insulis Britannicis, pag. 847.

(7) Now, as in the workes of nature, what the Sea drawes from one Coast, it casteth to another; so, others were diminished, as these encreased; the King bereaving enemies, to enrich his friends, and followers. From Aumarl, Surrey, and Excester, the titles of Dukes were taken, and generally all the great ones of that colour or faction, were reduced to the same estate (for honour and fortune) in which they stood, when first the late Duke of Glocester was arrested. The Castles, Honours, Manours, and the rest of things, which afterward grew to them out of the ruine of that Duke and his friends, or otherwise by the late Kings gift, from the day of that arrest, were by authoritie of this Parliament taken away, or put into the present Kings mercy. It was likewise made unlawfull for them to give liveries or badges to retainers, or to keepe any about them but necessary servants: They were also forbidden, under paine of high Treason, to goe about by any way to re-enable the late King against the authoritie of this Parliament, in which the sentence of his deposition was given and enacted. Finally, (a thing which laide them open to infinite vexations) whereas, in the time of their late greatnesse, they and theirs were charged to have done, and patronized manifold wrongs and oppressions, all people (upon proclamations to that purpose) were willed to come in, and declare their griefes, to the intent they might have redresse and remedy. With these punishments of his adverfaries, King Henry contented himselfe; but * not the Commons who inveighed against the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Earle of Northumberland, and other Lords of Councell, because the said Aumarl, Surrey, &c. were not also put to death, as persons who stood deepe in the peoples hatred.

The late Kings friends disinabled and displumed.

* Hollingsh. ex Rosse pag. 514.

(8) These provisions for his honour, safetie and advantage, King Henry very seeingly contrived, and established at home; but not ignorant under what grievous constructions his actions might fall in forraine parts, sends honourable Ambassadors to * Rome, France, Spaine, and Germany, to give a reason of his doings. To Rome, the Bishop of Hereford, Sir John Cheney Knight, and John Cheney Esquire. To France, the Bishop of Duresme, and the Lord Thomas Piercy Earle of Worcester, and * William Heron. To Spaine, the Bishop of Saint Asaph, and Sir William Par Knight. To Germany, the Bishop of Bangor, and others. These were armed with all sorts of instructions for justification of their new advanced King.

The French practises disinabled.

* Hollingsh. 518.

(9) In France * was worthily found the greatest difficultie of giving satisfaction, for that the French Kings daughter (the designed wife of the late King) did thereby leese the honour, profit and pleasure of a Monarchies fruition. She was as yet scarse twelue yeares of age, and therefore, * till shee attained to more maturitie, the late King had the rather absented himselfe in Ireland. France therefore tooke these newes roughly, and it seemed that matters tended to Armes, which yet came to nothing, for that King Charles relapsed into his old disease of frenzie, and a warre to be made against so politicke a Captaine as King Henry, required a sober man, and not a mad a mad one. Certainly, in the death of Richard which shortly followed, all those tumultuous designes for revenge, immediately expired.

They of Aquitaine discontenced and resisted.

(10) They of Aquitaine (among whom the unfortunate Richard was borne) bare the late King great love, as being their Countriman. These discontentments were so publike, that Burdeaux (the capitall Citie and Presidentiall seat) stucke not openly to say, (as [a] Polydor hath it) that since the world began there was never a more cruell, unreasonable, nor wicked fact done; that the good Prince was betrayed by [b] faithlesse men, and that all law was violated. Thus doe they exclaime, calling to God for vengeance with one voyce. Nevertheleste the French were deceived in hoping to convert these popular passions to their advantage; for partly by the chiefe [c] Magistrates wisedome, and principally by the comparison which the people made of the two sorts of government, English and French, that of the English being farre the more sweet and gentle, they continued firme. Much good labour, and many faire promises Lewis Duke of Burbon was forced to spend in vaine, who by such baites cast into the troubled wits of the Gascoignes, travelled to draw them to a revolt. The mischiefe was the better, and more strongly encountred, by the arrivall of Sir Thomas Piercy [d] Earle of Worcester with competent numbers of men, sent thither to withstand the French practises, and cure the peoples affections, by applying to them the soveraigne balme of reason, or with force to compell obedience.

(11) The first provocation which was given to King Henry was by the Scots, who during the last Parliament exercised themselves in England, and tooke the Castle of Warcke; whose Captaine Sir Thomas Grey at that time gave his attendance at Parliament about the common affaires; and the whole North of England being also infested with pestilence; the Scots had the more opportunitie to range un-encountred. Cause of other ensuing enmities which afterward brake forth, was (as it [e] seemeth) for that King Henry tooke into his protection George Earle of Dunbarre, and other Scots, who fled out of Scotland to avoyd the displeasure of Robert their King, and partly to take open vengeance for wrongs done unto them. Such ofentimes is the corruption of humane nature, that it will not pardon private injuries for the publike benefite, but thrust the pietie due to our Countrey under the inferiour respect of particular interesses. Princes also upon oblique reasons of State, (so bad men call them) which is never well founded [f] upon injustice, are (for their owne seeming good) contented to hold their neighbours in awe, by possessing meanes of their disturbance, which when time serveth also, they are not slacke to use, the profit whereof is seldome or never durable.

(12) But King Henry was scarce warme in his new atchieved Soveraigntie, when a nest of powerfull enemies beganne to hatch his destruction under the shadow of his owne wings. The deposed Richard was yet alive, and howsoever rough and headstrong men of the Kingdome approved his downe-throw, all others did not; for some moved by neerenesse of bloud, as the Earles of Kent, and Huntington his halfe-brothers by one mother; some doubtlesse in conscience (because howsoever Richards actions were unworthy of the Scepter, yet the right was onely his, and besides, Henry seemed to them not the next heire) others transported with envie at Henries super-eminency, and not a few with remembrance of received benefits, or hope of better fortunes in the change of times, inclined to set him againe upon the English throne. But they whosoever seeke the deliverance of a Captive Prince, doe commonly nothing else but hasten his death.

(13) It was our purpose in many great things to have forborne the testimony of Walsingham (otherwise a great light of these times) as one who dedicating his workes to King Henry the fift, sonne to this Henry, may be feared to speake the best and most hee can, for setting forth the honour of that line; but the levity and dissonance of later Writers, enforceth us (though with some warinesse,) to follow his light, for that, concerning this great conspiracy it selfe, our late Authors doe fondly encounter one the other, and some of them (as it must needs bee) the truth. The principall Conspirators (if such in so just a cause may bee so enstiled) were such, whose lives in the last Parliament had beene spared, though many lookes in their periwings of worldly honour were plucked away. Iohn Holland Earle of Huntingdon, Thomas Holland Earle of Kent, and (as [g] some say) Edward Earle of Rutland, (three the late Dukes of Excester Surrey, and Aumarl,) John Montacute Earle of Salisbury, Thomas Lord le Spencer, late called Earle of Glocester, the Bishop of Carlile, Sir Bernard Brokas, Sir John Shevele, (or Shelley) Knights, John Maudler, the Pseudo-Richard, or [h] counterfet King Richard, whose Chaplaine hee had beene, and resembled him very neerely. The [i] Abbot of Westminster is (by some) not onely named a Conspirator, but the first wheele of all the practise, as moving the rest; and with him they adde to the former, Sir Ralph Lumley, Sir Thomas Blunt, Sir Benedict Celie Knights. There were sundry others, but those Earles, and others first named, were undoubtedly the chiefe.

(14) The maine point of the plot was to [k] kill King Henry and his sonne, and thereby to restore Richard to his rightfull dignity; which the more powerfully to effect, (because, though Henry were murthered, yet they were assured that the businesse would not take end in a day, or a death) they resolved [k] to call the French into their succours, which they had reason to expect, for that the young Queene Isabel, daughter to the French King, remained at that present in England. There was nothing feeble or improbable in all this devise; the difficulty was how to come so strong into the presence of King Henry, that they might over-live the Assassinate, thereby to finish their enterprize, which as they could not hope for, but with the helpe of a multitude, nor a multitude be assembled without convenient colour, it was resolved, that the pretence of some extraordinary shew in Christmas was the fittest.

(15) Not long before the time of intended execution, the whole Conjuration was discovered, some say by the late [l] Duke of Aumarl, and afterward by the Mayor of London. Discovered it was, but with so short a warning, that the King scarce found himselfe out of danger, when the Earles of Kent and Salisbury, (not understanding that the bad odour of their conspiracy was come to the King) enter with foure hundred armed men about [m] twy light into Windsore Castle, from whence he was departed to London. But God (whose peculiar Wards and pupils Princes are) having delivered the King out of that most certaine perill, did also sodainely dissipate the further enterprises of the Conspirators. The Lord John Holland Earle of Huntington, one of the chiefe, was not in this defeate at Windsore, but hovered in London, attending the successe, there to raise meanes and men, and to worke such other masteries as hee could, and afterward (for wee credite Walsingham who lived in that time, and neere the place, and saw, and diligently noted things, rather then some [n] others) upon the certaine report of the Kings safety fought to flye away by water.

(16) The two Earles missing their hoped pray, though greatly greeved, yet necessity and new hopes bid them no dare farther. They therefore came to Sunnings. There the young Queene (King Richards spouse) lay; where having spoken certaine big words, to little other purpose then to give the poore Lady a short comfort, and taken King Henries Badges from such as wore them, saying King Richard was at liberty, and in the midst of an army of one hundreth thousand thousand friends at Pomfret: they proceed to Wallingford, then to Abingdon, and so to Circester. The rumors used by them to encrease their numbers, were that Henry of Lancaster (meaning the King) was fled with his sonnes and friends to the Tower of London and that King Richard was escaped. Maudlen also, one of Richards Chapleins, tooke upon him the * person of his said Lord, the more strongly to seduce the multitude, by so bold and perillous a fiction. Thus seemed they to fit their words and sute their Arts to the place. At Sunning, Richard (they said) was at Pomfret, for there the guile had beene transparent; but at Circester, Richard was not at Pomfret, but present.

(17) Howbeit the successe was not answerable to the devise; for, besides, that King Henry was in the heart of his strenghts at London, where fixe * thousand men were put into a readinesse, and would come upon them like a storme, the Townesmen of Circester assailed the Lords, tooke them, and (because their Towne was fired of purpose by some of their followers, the better to recover them while the quenching found the people employment,) haled them forth, and without longer tarriance severed their heads from their bodies: The Earle of Huntington, with a trusty Knight of his, Sir Iohn * Shevele, having (after the fall at Windsore) in vaine attempted to escape by Sea, was taken by the Commons at * Pitwell (perhaps Prittlewel) in Essex, brought first to Chelmsford, and lastly to Plesby, the house of the late Duke of Glocester, (whose Ghost a tragicall Poet would suppose did haunt his persecutors for revenge,) where, partly also by this Earles instigation, the said Glocester was first arrested. The Commons (out of whose hearts the image of that Duke was not vanished) at * the Countesse of Herefords instigation, who was the Dukes Widdow, tooke satisfaction upon the Earle, with the escheate of his head, which there was sundred from his shoulders. The Lord Spenser, called Earle of Glocester (one of the Conspirators) had like execution done upon him, by the Commons, at Bristoll. Some other of them were put to death at Oxford, and some at London; where Iohn Maudlen the counterfeit Richard, (who as it seemes was a beautifull and goodly person) and one William Ferby were drawne, hanged and headed. The Bishop of Carlile nevertheleste was by the Kings clemency preserved alive after the condemnatory sentence. There were * nineteene in all (whereof two had beene Dukes) put to death for this conspiracy, most of which were men of speciall note.

(18) The designes and misfortunes of King Richards friends being made knowne unto him, could not but worke strongly in a soule oppreſt with griefe; but whether so strongly as to make him resolve by voluntary abstinence to starve himselfe (as * the fame went) may bee doubted, though it bee past doubt that King Henry was not sorry hee was dead howsoever. That he was starved seemes very plaine; though, as it is not certaine, (neither yet unlikely) that King Henry was privy to so foule a parricide, so neither is it knowne, but that Richard might as well be starved of purpose, * as starve himselfe. Master * Stow (a man for honest industry (very praise-worthy) saith that King Richard was fifteene dayes and nights together kept in hunger, thirst and cold, till he dyed. How true that was in the circumstance, who knowes? but in the point of starving hee is clearely with Walsingham: and a * Knight living about those times calleth it a death never before that time knowne in England. Harding * also, living under King Edward the fourth, agrees of the rumour of starving. * Master Cambden saith of Pomfret Castle, that it is a place principum cade & sanguine infamis, but seemes to insinuate, that some other torments were most wickedly practised upon this King, as made out of the way with hunger, cold, and unheard of torments. * Polydor therefore in this may bee beleeved, who writes of this poore deposed Monarke, that, (which may well be called unheard-of torments) his dyet being served in, and set before him in the wonted Princely manner, he was not suffered either to taste, or touch thereof. Idle therefore seemes * his dreame, who writes he was murthered in the Tower, and not more credible * theirs, who tell us of Sir Peirs of *Exton*s assault, and the murther basely by him acted upon this most miserable Princes person: but much more are * they to blame, who negligently for credit of the fable quote Walsingham, in whom no syllable of such a thing is found. Onely * Hector Boetius wils us to beleeve that Richard fled disguised into Scotland, was discovered to King Robert, and honorably entertained; but Richard who would no more of the world, gave himselfe wholly to contemplation, and both lived, dyed, and was buried at Striveling. Which fond fable hath nevertheleſſe somewhat in it, for that some personated Richard might so doe, is neither impossible, nor improbable, and indeed it was so.

(19) The late King Richard thus cruelly and heinously murthered (for in regard of pining death the seeming fable of his fight with S. Piers of Exton was a sport, it being both noble and full comfort, for a man of honour and courage to dye with weapon in hand) King Henry causeth his dead body to bee brought up to London. O Henry, if thou wert Author, or but privy, (though for thine owne pretended safety, and for that errours cause which is lewdly miscalled reason of state) of such a murther; we doe not see, how the shewing of the people his uncovered face in Pauls, did either conceale, or extenuate the execrable crime. But to let the world know, that there was no hope nor place for a Richard, that course was used, which may the rather confirme the truth of his enfamishment; for a violent death by braining could not but deforme him too much: and it is most probable, that such a death would bee fought, as might least appeare. Surely he is not a man, who at the report of so exquisite a barbarisme, as Richards enfamishment, feeles not chilling horror and detestation; what if but for a justly condemned gally-slave so dying? but how for an annointed King, whose Character (like that of holy Orders) is indeleble? The tragicall spectacle of his dead body (perhaps because it mooved too much both pitty and envy) was after a while transported without honor to Langley in Hartfordshire, where the last rites were performed by the Bishop of Chester, the Abbots of S. Alban and Waltham, but neither King Henry present, (as at the exequies in London) and the great Lords and such other as were, had * not so much as a funerall feast bestowed on them for their labour. But Henry the fift, in the first * yeare of his raigne with great honour did afterward cause those royall remaines to be interred in the Sepulture of his Ancestors at Westminster. Among the riming Latine verses of his Epitaph, ye may marvell to reade these, confidering upon what points he was tried out of Majestie and State;

Ecclesiam favit, elatos suppeditavit,
Quemvis prostravit, regalia qui violavit.

Fabians English of them:

The Church he favoured, casting the proud to ground,
And all that would his royall State confound.

The said Author therefore Robert Fabian, observing the scope of those lines (to dampe their force) doth under-write and annex this Stanza, with much greater discretion then elegancy:

But yet alas, though that this meeter or rime,
Thus doth embellish this noble Princes fame,
And that some Clerke which favoured him sometime,
List by his cunning thus to enhance his name,
Yet by his Story appeareth in him some blame:
Wherefore to Princes is surest memory,
Their lives to exercise in vertuous constancy.

(20) King Henry, to divert the humors and eyes of the people from the remembrance of this Tragedy, prepareth now a puiſſance, therewith to invade Scotland; some subjects whereof, together with their Admirall Sir Robert Logon a Scottish Knight, were taken at Sea by certaine English ships. But King Henry may seeme to have done any thing rather then to have made a warre; for albeit he did some hurt by * wasting the Country, yet did not the Scots offer battell, and thereſt will well appeare in these words of * Boetius: Hee did small injuries to the people thereof: for he desired nought but his banner to bee erected on their wals. Hee was ever a pleasant enemy, and did great humanity to the people in all places of Scotland where hee was lodged. Finally, he shewed to the Lords of Scotland, that he came into their Realme rather by counsell of his Nobles, then for any hatred he bare to Scots. Soone after he returned into England. Whether the remembrance of the curtesies shewed to his Father Duke Iohn, or the feare of his owne great state so neere to an overthrow by the late furious conspiracy, wrought these gentle effects, it was not long before the event shewed, that his providence in not creating new acerbities was therein needfull.

(21) For albeit the face of England seemed smooth, yet God thrust a thorne into King Henries side, whom and where he little expected, for the Welsh, whom former Kings of England had so yoaked, and subjected, did contrary to all mens expectation, breake forth into open acts of hostility, under the conduct of a Gentleman of that Nation, surnamed Glendowr, of the Lordship of Glendowr in Meriomithshire, whose owner hee was; the wrath and justice of heaven is alwayes so well furnished with meanes to exercise the mightiest, those chiefely at whose amendment God aymes by chastisement. The originall of so great an evill was in the feed but little, as but this: Owen Glendowr, * whom the Welsh call the sonne of Gruffith Vachan, descended of a younger sonne of Gruffith ap Madoc, Lord of Bromfield, was at first a Student of the common lawes, and an Vtter Barister, (but not therefore an Apprentise of Law, as Doctor Powell mistakes for a Apprentise of the Law, is he that hath beene a * double Reader) did afterward serve the late King Richard in place of an Esquire, and was well beloved of him, but in King Henries time (retiring himselfe as it seemes to his Mannour of Glendowrdiny, the L. Gray of Ruthen entred upon a peece of common, which lay betweene Ruthin and Glendowr, which Owen (despite the Lord Gray while Richard continued King) had formerly holden, though not without contention. Owen (a man of high courage, and impatient of force) armes hereupon, and encounters the Lord Gray in the field, where he scattered the said Lords people, and tooke him prisoner, as hereafter will elsewhere be touched.

(22) It seemes heerein that hee had forgotten the lawes which hee had formerly studyed, and wherein hee had beene a licentiate; for shortly after, as he had trodden law under foote, so did hee also cast of loyalty, burning and destroying the Lord Grays inheritances, and killing fundry his servants. The King advertised hereof, passeth with an Army into Wales, burnes, kils, and takes such revenge as that time would permit. Meane-while, Owen (whom pride and folly armed to the farther ruine of his Country) with his trustiest friends (which were not few) withdrawes into the inexpugnable fastnesses of Snowdon, where during this tempest, hee kept his head safe. Shortly after the King with such riches and spoyles as those Parts had afforded, returnes. His next most noted action was peaceable. For one of the house of Paleologus, and Emperour of Constantinople, came into England to pray some succour against the Turke, and upon the day of Saint Thomas the Apostle, was met at Blackeheath by King Henry, highly feasted, richly presented, and his charges borne till departure. But as Tilius * saith of his succesſe in France, verbis & promissis tantum adjutus est, so here his speed was not much better, the point of armed aydes, being onely therein assisted with words and promises.

And in the same yeare also, the Articles of peace being first agreed upon betweene the two Nations, English and French (notwithstanding that they had denyed to match with the young Prince of Wales, * because the former marriage with Richard thrived so badly) the Lady Isabel who had beene crowned Queene of England, as Spouse of the late King, was now sent backe into France, after a most Princely manner, the being not as yet * twelve yeares old, had * no dowry allowed her in England, for that the marriage was never consummated. Before shee was restored to her friends, the Lord Henry Piercy, before the Ambassadors of both the Nations, where they were met betweene Calis and Boloigne, protested, That the King of England his Master had sent her to be delivered to her Father, cleare of all bonds of marriage, or otherwise, and that hee would take it upon his soule, that shee was found and entire, even as shee was the same day shee was delivered to King Richard, and if any would say to the contrary he was ready to prove it against him by combate. But the Earle of Saint Paul saying, he beleeved it to be true, the Lord Piercy tooke her by the hand, and delivered her unto the Earle, and then the Commissioners of France delivered certaine Letters of receipt and acquitall. (24) Owen Glendowr persisting in his pride and disobedience, made incursions upon the English, doing them great harme, and returning himselfe without any; but King Henries danger was greater at home; for treason had crept into his most secret Chamber. In his bed there lay hidden a Galtrope or Engine, with three small yron pikes, long, slender and passing sharpe, all of them with their points set upward, but (God so disposing it) the King before he laid himselfe downe, perceived them, and thereby avoyded that hidden mischiefe, but who was actor therein it doth not appeare.

The King in danger to bee slaine or wounded.

(25) This appeares, that the splendors of his new regality had drawne up many thicke and poysonous clouds of envy and practise, to darken if it were possible the farther brightnesse thereof. Neither was it long before it grew to some extremitie. For Owen Glendowr upon the causes before-said, wasting the Lord Reynald Grays lands, was encountred by him, as presuming that Owen and his friends might easily be overcome, but the contrary hapned, for there in fight he lost very many of his company, and was himselfe taken prisoner. This fortune made the swelling mind of Owen overflow in vaine hopes, who compelling the said Lord to marry his daughter, yet obtained he not his libertie the sooner, but died (say * some) in the power of Owen, if perhaps our Author mistake not the Lord Gray for Edmund Lord Mortimer Earle of March, who indeed did marry so after he was also overthrowne by the said Owen, with the slaughter of above a thousand principall persons of Herefordshire, assembled under his conduct, to resist the Welsh invasions, and there also himselfe was by treachery taken prisoner.

* In Hen. 4.

by the first they * traduced (in libels) Henries actions so to make him hatefull, and by the second they divulged that * Richard was still alive, thereby to raise an head of feparation. Henry thus galled in his honour, and endangered in the maine, resolved to spare none, upon whom the crime or concealement was found. The first of them that fell under his justice, was a Priest of Ware, with whom was taken a list, or roll of names which hee had gathered, supposing them such as in regard of benefits received, would live and dye for King Richard, which vanity of his created trouble to many, till it appeared that hee had therein wronged them, as persons who were utterly ignorant both of the man and matter. Whereupon hee was drawne and hanged. The like fate had Walter Baldocke Prior of Lawne, who confeft that he had concealed others councels against the King, though himselfe had acted nothing. A Frier Minor also being taken, with some other of his Order, for like intendments; was asked, What hee would doe if King Richard were alive and present? hee confidently answered, that hee would fight for him till death against any whosoever; which cost him his life, being drawne and hanged in his Fryers weeds. Neither did this hard fortune fall onely upon the Clergy, for Sir Roger Clarington Knight, (reputed the base sonne of Edward late Prince of Wales) together with an Esquier and servant of his, finished the affection which they bare to the deceased Richard, by hanging. Not long after eight Franciscan Fryers, or Minorities, were taken, convicted, hanged, and headed for the like causes, which made the King an heavy Lord to that whole Order. It is said, that somewhat before this knot was discovered, the divell appeared in the habit of a Minorite at Danbury Church in Essex, to the incredible astonishment of the parishioners; for, at the same time there was such a tempest and thunder with great firebals of lightning, that the vault of the Church brake, and halfe the Chancell was carried away.

(27) But howsoever these out-branches were pared away, the rootes of all the practise lay deeper out of sight; for the * Piercies, Henry Earle of Northumberland, Thomas Earle of Worcester, and Henry Hotspur Lord Piercy, because perhaps they thought they had done wickedly in helping to set up Henry, * began to imagine that bloudy mischiefe, which afterward was prosecuted. This malice the late successe of Owen Glendowr against the Lord Mortimer Earle of March, (taken prisoner, as is said, with no little slaughter of his Herefordshire men) did perhaps nourish; for that hee saw an enemy appeare, who was not unlikely to prove an able member of a greater rebellion. Certainely the King having in September led an Army into Wales, to take revenge upon his Rebels, was in great danger to have perished with sodaine stormes and raines, the like whereof none of his people had ever felt or seene, so that after he had done some wasts upon the Country he returned. The common fame went that Owen was a Conjurer, and had raised those hideous tempests by hellish arts; they seemed so excessive, which (whether true or false) did yet impart no little strength to the Welsh faction.

(28) The Kings fortune was happier in the North, where his Lieutenant had two faire victories, the one at * Nisbet, and the other at Halydown hill, neere to a village called Woller. And although the first was not a small one, yet the other deserved the name of a just battell and garland. To the Scots, having with above ten thousand men (under conduct of Archibald Earle of Douglasse, whom the Scots nick-named Tyne-man, because he never wanne field, though no sort of true manhood was wanting in his person) made great spoiles in England, as farre as to Newcastle, and were now upon returne; Henry Piercy Earle of Northumberland, the noble Henry Hotspur Lord Piercy his sonne, and George Earle of Dunbar (who fled as you have heard out of Scotland) with the forces of the Countries thereabout, not meaning to let them to passe in so slight a fort, opposed themselves. The chiefe feate was wrought by the English Archers, who first with their stiffe, close, and cruell stormes of arrowes made their enemies footmen breake, and when the noble Douglasse descended to the charge with his choisest bands, himselfe being in a most rich and excellently tempered armour, and the rest singularly well appointed, the Lord Piercies Archers making a retreat, did withall deliver their deadly arrowes, tam vivide, tam animosè, tam gravitèr (saith our Monke) so lively, so couragiously, so grievously, that they ran through the men of Armes, bored the helmets, pierced their very swords, beate their lances to the earth, and easily shot those who were more slightly armed through and through. There were taken prisoners the Earle of Douglasse himselfe, (who notwithstanding his armour of the best proofe, had five wounds, and lost an eye) Murdake Stewart Earle of Fife, (eldest sonne to Robert Duke of Albanie,) George Earle of Angus, the Earles of * Murrey & Orkney, the Lords Montgomery, Erskin, and Grane, with about fourescore Knights, besides Esquiers and Gentlemen. There were slaine, the Lords Gourdon, and Swymton, (Belindens Boetius cals them Knights) with sundry other men of honour and marke, besides store of common souldiers. The River Tweed, to shew it selfe meere English, did likewise fight for them, by swallowing above five hundreth in his unknowne depthes, as they, who fled from the battell, sought to passe. This victory hapned upon Holyrood in harvest. The troubles which afterward hapned, did not onely hinder the Lord Piercy from farther prosecution of such a victory, but eclypsed the honour he had gotten now, and gave his dayes a bloudy and foule Catastrophe.

(29) The Lord Edmund Mortimer Earle of March, next generall heire in bloud to the Crowne of England after the death of Richard the second, having through feare of Owen (whose prisoner he was) or hope of recovering his right, or for revenge (because the King did not ransome him) married Owens daughter, by which he must necessarily declare himselfe an enemy to King Henry, entertained intelligence with his neere kinsmen the Piercies, and sundry other his friends in Cheshire, and else-where, to what purpose will shortly appeare. The night in which this Lord Mortimer (though some referre it to Owens birth) was borne, all the horses in his Fathers stable, are said to have beene found standing Belly-deepe in bloud. A fearefull prodigie, as even then it seemed, but verified afterward in the farre more fearefull events, when (upon the quarrell of Mortimers title, by which the house of Yorke claimed,) the horses of warre did not onely stand belly-deepe in bloud, but also swam therein. The mischiefe was already begun: for Henry Earle of Northumberland (when now his owne and his houses strengths were mightily encreased by this late victory against the Scots, which he under-hand seemes to have converted to his secret private ends,) closely * animated his brother the Earle of Worcester, and his fiery spirited sonne, against the King, to both their confusions.

(30) The King tooke to wife the Lady Ione of Navarre, widdow of John de Monfort Duke of Britaine, named the Conqueror (* who died the yeare before) by whom she had issue both sons and daughters, but by the King none. He met, and married her at Winchester, and crowned her Queene at Westminster. The King was not trusted with the custody of any of her three sonnes, John, Richard, and Arthur, who remained in France.

(31) Events are the best interpreters of prophesies and prodigies. Strange was that which * Wallingham hath written of a fatall Spectrum or Apparition in the summer time betweene Bedford and Bickleswade, where sundry monsters of divers colours, in the shapes of armed men were often seene to issue out of the woods at morning and at noone; which to such as stood farre off seemed to encounter one one the other in most terrible manner, but when they drew neere, nothing was to be found. Of another nature were the fiery attempts of the Piercies. The first of them who discovered in armes his mortall hatred, was the noble Hotspur, who (under * colour of the Scottish warre) made head about Chester and the Marches of Wales. To him (by the privitie of Hasburs Father,) repaires the haughtie old man the Earle of Worcester, leaving the young Prince of Wales, and the Princes Houshold, over both which (for their better Government) the King had placed him. Now was the torch of warre lighted up, and began to blaze, for though the chiefe plot-master the Earle of Northumberland was not joyned to them, as hee did intend, yet were their numbers growne mightily, with which they meant to enter the Towne of Shrewsburie, to make thereof a Seat of warre.

(32) Colourable causes of their armes were the ordinary paintings of the like attempts. Care of Common-wealths reformation, and their owne safeties; for having first protested their intentions not to be the breach of loyalty, they pretend and by letters sent about, doe signifie. 1. That * the publike monie was not employed upon the pretended defence of the kingdome, but undulie wasted. 2. That by reason of bad tongues about the King they durst not approach him, to declare their innocency, unlesse the Prelates and Peeres of the Realme did first intercede for them. 3. That they tooke armes onely to guard their owne heads, and to see the Kingdome better governed. These Articles had the place of the Huske, but the Kernell of the enterprize had principally these. 1. To thrust King Henry out of his seat, and consequently to deprive him of life. 2. To advance the title of the Lord Mortimer, Earle of March, their * neerest allie: for the Earle of Northumberland had married Elizabeth the daughter of the Lord Edmund Mortimer the elder, Earle of March, by Philip daughter to Lionel Duke of Clarence. 3. To take revenge of King Henry, for seeking to draw the chiefe benefit to himselfe of the victory at Halidowne hill, whose principall prisoners he required, and for such other private grudges. 4. To share the Kingdome betweene Mortimer, Piercy, and Owen Glendowr. Concerning which partition it is in some found written, that Indentures tripartite were sealed, showing that South-England should remaine to Mortimer, North-England to Piercie, and Wales beyond Severne to Glendowr. But Archembald Earle of Douglasse (who did his Countrey good service by making one in our Combustions) by common consent was allowed for his share to be free from ransome, and to have Berwicke.

(33) This (in our English Adagies) is called to reckon without our host, or to count our Chickens before they are hatched. But though at this time God would have it so, yet who doth not easily see what a wild horse a Kingdome (so gotten) is, and how hard to sit, and not to manage onely? Yet it seemeth, that if Mortimer, having so just a title to the Crowne, had openly professed the cause of his attempt against King Henry, it might justly have beene exempted from all staine of disability. But this partition is * said to have beene wisely built upon a sound Welsh prophecie of Merlins: as if King Henry were the Mouldwarp cursed of Gods owne mouth, and Mortimer, Piercie, and Glendowr, the Dragon, Lyon, and Wolfe, which should divide this Realme betweene them. Surely the Welsh having any hand in such a partition, it is not likely they could thinke it had the right feet, if it stood not upon the supposed Merlins his ridiculous cosenages and riddles. The English (not to be behind in leasings,) doe in the meane time every where spread that * Richard was safe alive and in the Castle of Chester. Who can wonder that this name should be so gracious, as if alone it were enough to have shaken Henry out of his State? When Nero himselfe had so many favorites, that twentie yeares after his death an obscure fellow faining himselfe Nero, was so backt and countenanced by the Parthians, and others, * that not without much difficultie the Romans could get him into their hands.

(34) On the other side King Henry affailed with so unexpected jeopardies, defends his cause by Letters, and strongly puts the blame upon the accusers, saying, That he marvelled exceedingly, seeing the Earle of Northumberland, and Henry his Sonne had the greatest part of the publike moneys delivered to them, for defence of the borders against Scotland, why they should make that a quarrell, which was a meere calumnie. And to take away all pretence of feare from the Conspirators, he sends to the Earles of Northumberland and Worcester, and to the hot Lord Piercie; a safe conduct under his royall Seale, by which hee secures their accesse, but unbridled rashnesse (saith Wallingham) despising the royall clemency, did put on the rigour of rebellion. Meane-while the King armes with all speed against the enemy, the rather at the counsell of George Earle of Dunbar, who (like a valiant man at Armes, and a wise friend) advised him so to doe, before their adversaries numbers were too mightily augmented. The King with his sonne the young Prince of Wales, and a very noble fellowship, was now advanced within sight of Shrewsbury, as the gallant Piercie stood ready to assault the Towne. But so soone as the royall Standard was discovered, that enterprize was left off, and he drew out his people (being about fourteene thousand choise and hardy bodies of men) to trie the fortune of warre against a well tried warriour.

(35) Peace notwithstanding (by the exceeding tendernesse of the King) had ensued, but that the mischievous Earle of Worcester, by mis-reporting & falsifying his Soveraignes words, did precipitate his Nephew into sudden battell. If there were any praise or good example to be drawn out of so detested bloodshed, as that of civill warre, we would willingly destitute unto you the order and actions, but we cannot too soone passe over such mournefull objects, which are rather to be celebrated with teares then triumphs. There is no doubt but Percie, Douglas, and the rest fought terribly. Why should we admire that in them? So doe Lyons, Tygers, and Beares, and yet we admire them not. Where was durie, where conscience, where the other respects, of which onely we are called men? Let none of us honour, or imitate them, in whose eies the price of English bloud is so vile, as that (for private fansies) they can be content to confound all regards, and make sport for common foes, with mutuall massacres. Therefore we will content our selves with the knowledge of Gods part in this daies worke, who gave the garland to the King, though the first arrowes flew from the Piercies Archers.

(36) The Kings courage was not small in the fight, as neither was the danger, the young Prince of Wales also (being then first to enter himselfe into the schoole of bloud and battell,) gave no small hopes of that perfection which afterward shone in him, being wounded with an arrow in the face. The Lord Piercie and Earle Douglas (then * whom the wide world had not two braver Champions) in steed of spending themselves upon the multitude, set the point of their hopes upon killing the King, as in whose person they were sure ten thousand fell. For this cause they most furiously rushed forward with speares and swords; but the noble Earle of Dunbarre, discovering their purpose, drew the King from the place which he had chosen to make good, and thereby in likelyhood for that present saved his life, for the Standard-royall was overthrowne, and (among other valiant men) the * Earle of Stafford, Sir Walter Blunt, the Kings Knight, and the Standard-bearer himselfe was slaine, such was the fury of these fodaine thunderbolts. That day the Douglasse flew with his owne hands three in the Kings Coat-armour, (perhaps some in Heralds Coats) though * Boetius yet saw a fourth. Sure it is, that many of the subjects thought the King was slaine, and not a few * ranne out out of the field. Who notwithstanding, like a valiant Prince, did re-enforce the fight, performing marvels in armes with his owne hands. The slaughter could not be small on both sides, the Archers shooting so continually, and the men of armes doing their utmost for about the space of three whole houres.

(37) That which gave an end to this wofull worke was the death of Hotspur, who riding in the head of the battell in defiance of danger and death, was (by an unknowne hand) suddenly killed, with whose fall (as if his whole army had had but one heart (the courages of all others fell into feet, which now altogether they trusted to. But the King abhorring to make farther execution of the mis-guided multitude, suffered them to shift for themselves. The Earles of Worcester, and Douglasse, Sir Richard Vernon, the Baron of Kindlaton, and divers others were taken. Of the Kings side was slaine (besides the Earle of Stafford) ten new Knights, whose names (as dying in an honest cause) deserve immortalitie, and were Sir * Hugh Shorly, Sir John Clifton, Sir John Cokain, Sir Nicholas Gausell, Sir Walter Blunt, Sir John Calverly, Sir John Massie, Sir Hugh Mortimer, Sir Robert Gausell, and Sir Thomas Wendesley, who dyed of his hurts not long after, as most of the other did about the Standard; all which fighting for their spurres, as being knighted that morning) bought them with the honourable losse of their whole bodies; there were also slaine many Esquiers, and Gentlemen, and about one thousand and five hundreth common souldiers, besides three thousand sorely wounded. On the other part, (omitting that fecond Mars, the Lord Piercy, who drew a ruine after him futable to his Spirit and greatnesse) there fell most of all the Esquires and Gentlemen of Cheshire, to the number of two hundred, and about five thousand common souldiers. This battell was stricken neere to Shrewsbury upon a Saturday, the one and twentieth of July, and the Eve of Saint Mary Magdalen.

(38) The Earle of Worcester (the seducer and destroyer of his noble Nephew Hotspur, and therefore if but for that, very worthy to have died) Sir Richard Vernon Knight, and the Baron of Kindlaton had their heads cut off upon the Monday following. Hotspurs body had beene buried by permission, but upon other advise, the King caused it to be drawne out of the grave, beheaded, quartered, and the parts sent into divers Cities of the Kingdome. The Earle of Northumberland (pretending to come with forces to the Kings ayde) was empeached by the Earle of Westmorland, and Robert Waterton who had raised a great hoast. Northumberland taking neither of them for friends, wheeles about, and returnes to his Castle of Warkworth. But what can be secure to a subject against the victorious armie of a martiall King? The Earle knew as much, manifestly feeling the irrecoverable maimes of his House in losse of his sonne and brother, and therefore shaped his course accordingly. The King therefore being altogether as prudent as fortunate, having setled the state of things in the Marches about Shrewsbury, sets forward to the Citie of Yorke, from thence to take order for such perils as he foresaw might happen. Hee settled himselfe the more seriously and entirely to this needfull worke; for that his Ambassadors had effected an abstinence from warre with France, till the first of March, which pausing space though it might seeme little, was not a little welcome to the King, the Realme of England being then so full of dangerous perturbations. While he was yet at Yorke, hee commands the Earle of Northumberland to come thither in person, which he accordingly did upon the morrow after the day of Saint * Laurence, and that also with a small traine in the nature of an humble tutor. He could not in reason hope for the wonted familiar favour of the King, neither had he yet, for it was accounted matter of grace, that his life was pardoned though his meanes and libertie was abridged, the King allowing onely necessary maintenances. The life of Princes is like a perpetuall motion. The Northerne Countries are now setled, but hath the King therefore any the more rest? Nothing lesse; for Wales and the troubles thereof call him thither. What should he doe? Money, the Cement and soldure of all such actions, (for Armies cannot otherwise bee held together) utterly failes. The Archbishop of Canterbury sees the needs and uses of his Soveraigne, and like a Father supplies him with a Tenth, which the Clergie at their Metropolitans motion, consent to give: upon the strength whereof, the King knowes how farre hee may proceed against the Welsh in his good time.

(39) Toward the relieefe of these his necessities, the valiant exployts of William de Wilford an Esquire, who was in the meane time abroad for the king upon the narrow Seas, brought some assistance, certainely store of contention; for he tooke fortie lawfull prizes laden with yron, oyle, sope and Rochell wine, to the number in all of a thousand tunne, upon the Coasts of Britaine, and in his returne set fortie faile on fire; and to make the Britaines know that he was not onely a man of his hands at Sea, hee comes on shore at Penarch, burnes Townes and houses about sixe leagues into the Countrey, and afterward did as much for them as the Towne of Saint Mathewes, which he consumed with flames, and wasted the land for three miles about. The French, not to seeme slow to like mischiefes, land at the Wight; but were compelled with losse to betake themselves againe unto their Fleet, with farre worse successe then the Britons under the conduct of the Lord of Castell had not long before, who landing at Plymmouth invaded, tooke and burnt it.

(40) The King having humbled the Earle of Northumberland in such sort as you heard, lookes againe upon him with an eye of compassion and favour, not without a secret respect to his owne safetie; and he had little appetite to augment enmities, but to allay them rather, whereas by this gracious usage of that Earle, (for he restored him fully to all) he now thinkes those North-parts sufficiently secured. This restitution was made to the Earle in the Parliament holden at London, about the middest of Ianuary, where the King obtained an un-usuall Taxe or Subsidie, of which (that it might not be drawne into example) no Record, nor writing was suffered to remaine. Some part of the gold which the King thus drew into the Exchequer, he had occasion to bestow at this time. For, there presented themselves unto him, a boistrous troupe of plaine Western-men, who brought to the Kings view three Lords, and twentie Knights of note; These were prisoners, whom the Countrey people about Dartmouth in Devonshire, had gotten in plaine fight. The King was therefore given to understand, that the Lord of Castell the Briton, who had formerly burnt Plymmouth, thinking to doe the like at Dartmouth, came on shore with his forces; where these and the like people fiercely encountred him; at which time their Women (like Amazons) by hurling of flints and pebles, and by such other Artillery, did greatly advance their Husbands and Kinsfolkes victory. The Lord of Castel himselfe, and many besides, were slaine, these other were saved as more of them might have beene but that the ignorance of language alike confounded the cries of indignation and pittie. They therefore in reward of this hazard and service, doe pray they might reape some commodity by their Captives. It was but reason; wherefore the King, who tooke pleasure to talke with the lusty Western-men himselfe, causeth their purses to be stuft with golden Coyne, reserving the prisoners to repay himselfe with advantage out of their ransomes. The like good fortune against Owen Glendowr and the Welsh would have gladded him indeed; but they burne and destroy the Marches, they kill and captivate the people, and partly by force, partly by fraud, get many Castles, some of which they raze, and fortifie others, others. Neither came these evils single, for the Flemmings and Britons tooke certaine Merchants ships of England, and either slew or hung the Sailers.

(41) It is more strange that King Richard was not suffered to be dead, after he had so long a time beene buried. Serlo, who had beene a Gentleman of his Chamber having heard that King Richard (his royall and gracious Master) was secretly abiding in Scotland, left the favour of the French Court to see him, but it was not worth his so much love and labour; for hee that bare the name, was but an Impostor. Loath yet to let the opinion die, because it might do King Henrie harme; Serlo affirmes, that Richard was alive. What cunning madnesse is so great which hath not some great fooles or other to support it? The old Countesse of Oxford (mother to the late Duke of Ireland) will needes perswade her selfe and others in Essex, that Richard was alive: certaine it is, that she desired it might be true. To make others more firmely beleeve the same, thee secretly gave silver and gilt Harts (the badges which King Richard used to bestow upon his followers) as tokens. Hitherto the devise held out, for it had no great danger in it; but Serlo seeing the necessitie of greater friends, which appeared not, grew weary, and knowing that Sir William Clifford Knight, Captaine of Berwicke, had received sundry favours from King Richard, hopes by him to be furnished with mony, to beare his charges out of Scotland into France. Clifford farre otherwise minded, feizeth upon Serlo, as a fit meanes to reconcile himselfe with the King, in whose high displeasure he stood, (for that hee had continued his charge in Berwicke contrary to expresse commandement) and carrieth him to the King, who was then come to the Castle of Pomfret; being weakned with these rumors, and suspecting that the chiefe nest of danger lay in the North; whither the Earle of Northumberland brought his grand-children (as pledges) to assure the King of his loyalty: thither also Sir William Clifford brings poore Serlo, who both confesseth the practise, as also that he had a guilty hand in the murther of the Duke of Glocester, which made him farre more odious then the other forgery. The crimes being manifest, Serlo is drawne from Pomfret beginning his paine, where he had his doome, and at London knits up the Tragedy in a halter. The Countesse of Oxford for this fallhood lost all her goods, being moreover committed to close prison. To make this imposture the more probable and passable, Serlo had caused King Richards signet to be counterfeited, wherewith he sealed sundry consolatory and exhortatory letters to his friends, indited in King Richards name; whereupon many in Essex gave credit to the Countesse, and among the rest some Abbots of that County. Into this smoke did all the devise evaporate.

(42) And no lesse smokie was both the devise and successe of certaine in the Parliament (held this yeare at Coventry, and called the * lacke learning Parliament, either for the unlearnednesse of the persons, or for their malice to learned men) where, to supply the kings wants, a bill was exhibited against the Temporalties of the Clergy; but by the courage of the Archbishop of Canterbury, (who told them, it was the enriching of themselves, not of the King, which they respected in their sacrilegious petitions) and by the gracious care of the King, (who vowed to leave the Church in better state then he found it, rather then in worse,) their motion vanished to nothing, but the infamous memory of the attempters. It is observed that * a Knight the chiefe speaker in this bill against the Clergie, had beene himselfe a Deacon, and so himselfe first advanced by the Clergy. With great reason therefore did our fore-fathers distinguish the people into the learned and lewd, inferring truely that such commonly were lewd, who were not learned, and that lewd and wicked were but two words of one signification, as in this Parliament well appeared, whose Commons might enter Common with their cattel for any vertue which they had more then brute Creatures.

(43) Twise after this, betweene Christmas and Palme-Sunday, the King assembled the States againe, once at London, and then at Saint Albans, for the cause of money, but with much distaste, the Peeres of the Land rising from the last Session thereof meanely contented, as it well appeared not long after, though to the enterprisers ruine. Thomas Mowbray Earle Marshall, one of the chiefe men which disliked the carriage of publike matters, drawes Richard le Scrope Archbishop of Yorke into a conspiracy, in full hope that Henry Piercie Earle of Northumberland, the Lord Bardolf, the Citizens of Yorke, and the common people would assist their cause, which was gloſed with the specious pretence of redressing publique abuses, happing through the Kings default. The Earle of Westmerland hearing of this attempt, wherein the Earle Marshall and the Archbishop were leaders of the people, gathers a force to encounter them, but perceiving himselfe too feeble, he betakes himselfe to fraud, and by faining to like the quarrell, got them both into his power, and presented them as an acceptable oblation to the King, who about Whitsantide comes to Yorke, where (albeit the Earle of Westmerland had promised them their lives) as well the Archbishop, as the Earle Marshall were beheaded. But the next yeare the Pope excommunicated all such as had a hand in putting the Archbishop to death. It was said of Tiberius * Cæsar in a Satyricall libell, -regnabit sanguine multo, Ad regnum qui quis venit ab exilio.

Who, first Exil'de, is after crown'd,
His raigne with blood will much abound.

(44) This the King verified in his person, who comming out of banishment, could not support his Title and estate, but by shedding much blood of subjects. For, not contented with those two lives, he pursueth the Earle of Northumberland and Lord Bardolf, with an invincible Armie of seaven and thirty thousand men: but they unable to make head against so mightie a force, take Berwicke for refuge. Thither the King marcheth, at the sound whereof, they both distrustfull of their safetie, flie into Scotland, where the Lord Flemming entertains them. Berwicke upon hope of succours out of Scotland, (which gladly nourished the English miseries, and the English theirs) refused to render, whereupon the King plants a battering-piece against a Tower in the wall; which as it threw downe the halfe thereof with one shot, so did it quite overthrow all the defendants courages, who presently yeelded the place upon hard and desperate termes, for they were partly hanged, and partly emprisoned. After * Berwicke was thus recovered, the King takes Alnwicke, and all other Castles belonging to the Earle, and thinking the like happinesse would shine upon him in Wales, he crosseth over thither, where it fell out farre otherwise, not by the manhood of the Welsh but by the sodaine rage of waters which destroied his carriages and about fifty wains (as was said) laden with much treasure: therefore hereturnes to Worcester. Owen Glendowr the chief captaine of the Welsh Nation, expecting and fearing a revenge, had before this time confederated himselfe with the French, who in 140. ships arrived at Milford Haven to the aide of Owen, having well-neere first lost all their horses in the passage for want of fresh water. The Lord Berkley and Henry de Pay (by what means appeares not) burnt fifteene of that number in the harbour. They made the entrance of their warre by laying siege to the Towne of Carmarden in South-Wales, which, the Garrison being permitted to depart with bagge and baggage, was yeelded.

(45) The King being againe in needs of money, after long unwillingnesse and delay, the Parliament furnished him, rather overcome with wearinesse in contradiction, then for any great good-will. Some of his treasure was employed, as it seemes, upon secret practises with the Scots, that the Earle of Northumberland, and the Lord Bardolfe might be delivered into his hands, in exchange for some Scots; where whereupon they fled into Wales, and the Scots missing their purpose, slew David Lord Flemming, for discovering their intention to his distressed guests, (as by the lawes of honour and hospitality he was obliged) which filled Scotland with civill discords. To avoyde the dangers whereof, and to better his education, the King of Scots sent his sonne and heire by Sea into France, whom, together with the Bishop of Orkney, certaine Mariners of Cley in Northfolke surprized at Sea, and presented to the King, who committed him prisoner to the Tower of London. Meane-while the French prosecuting their affaires in Wales, sent thither eight and thirtie Ships full of Souldiers, of which number the English tooke eight (the rest escaping in great feare to Wales,) and not long after other fifteene sayle laden with Waxe and Wine. This fortune, though good, was nothing in regard of the service, which Henry Pey, with certaine Ships of the Cinque Ports, and about fifteene other, exployted upon a great Fleete, contayning sixscore Sayle, whose ladings were Yron, Salt, Oyle, and Rochel Wine. The same times was a Felon put to death, for having in many places of London dared secretly to set up Bils, contayning newes that King Richard was alive. The fearefull plague of pestilence slew multitudes of people through the Realme, chiefly in London, where, within a short space it destroyed thirtie thousand. That most renowned Captaine Sir Robert Knolles, who had led so many living men to their honourable deaths in battell, was now captived himselfe by death upon the fifteenth day of August. His fame grew principally by martiall deedes in the great Warres of France, under Edward the third, but spred and setled it selfe by good workes, among which the goodly Stone-bridge at Rochester in Kent was one.

(46) In the meane space, the wars of Wales were managed by Prince Henry, who tooke the Castle of Aberistwith; but Owen Glendowr soone after got it againe by faire fraud, and thrust into it a Garrison of his owne. Thus Owen prospered for a time; but the Earle of Northumberland, and Lord Bardolf, forsaking Wales, and seeking to raise a force in the North, were encountred by the Sheriffe of Yorkeshire, who after a sharpe conflict slew the Earle in the Field, and so wounded the Lord Bardolf, that he dyed thereof. The Earles head was cut off, which being first ignominiously cartyed through London, was fixed upon the Bridge. The King having thus vanquished his chiefe enemies, went to Yorke, where inquiries were made for the Earles adherents, of which he condemned, ransomed, and empriſoned many. The Abbot of Hales, because he was taken fighting on the Earles behalfe, had sentence to die, which was executed upon him by hanging. In forraine and transmarine parts, the Kings affaires had mixt successe; for Edmund Earle of Kent, at the siege of Briant in Britaine, was stricken with a quarrel into the head, whereof he died; but yet after hee had first taken the said Castle, and leveld it with the ground.

(47) The peace of Christendome having beene long tempestuously troubled by a Schisme, rayſed by ambition of oppoſite Popes, whereof the one was chosen at Rome, the other at Avinion, by contrary factions of the Cardinals; A generall Councell was summoned to be held at Pisa in Italie, whither the King of England sent his Ambassadors, and the Clergie elected Robert Alum * Chancellour of Oxford, and Bishop of Sarum, to signifie, * that unlesse both the Popes would give over their Papacy, neither of them should thence-forward be acknowledged for Pope. The King in his letter then sent to Pope Gregory chargeth him (as Platina likewise doth) with Perjurie, and that this Papall emulation had beene the cause of the murther of * more then two hundreth and thirtie thousand Christians slaine in warres. There assembled a great number of Cardinals, Archbishops, Bishops, and mitred Prelates, who elected a new Pope, Alexander 5. (a man * trained up at Oxford, where he tooke degree in Theologie) rejecting the two others, who long and bitterly had contended for the place. The King also cals his Parliament to find out meanes for more money, to the custody and charge whereof he ordaine d Sir Henry Scrope, creating him Treasurer, as Thomas Beaufort the Kings halfe-brother Lord Chancellour. In which Parliament was revived the sacrilegious Petition, of spoyling the Church of England of her goodly patrimonies, which the pietie and wisdome of so many former ages had congested. But the King (who was bound by oath and reason to preserve the flourishing estate of the Church) detested their wicked proposition, and for that cause denied all other their requests. The Duke of Burgundies provisions which he had made to reduce Calis to the French dominions, and stored at Saint Omars, were consumed with casuall fire to ashes.

Book 9.

S. Thos. Orosius faith Gascoigne M. S.

(48) About these times the great and bloudie factions betweene the Dukes of Burgundy and Orleance brake forth. The cause was for a murther committed upon Lewis (brother to he French King, and father of the saide Duke of Orleance) as he came late one night from the Queenes lodging, who at that time lay in of a childe. The murtherers * to prevent pursuit, strewed galthrops behinde them. The Duke of Burgundie justified the fact, for that Lewis had (as he said) laboured with the Pope to put the King from his State, upon pretence that he was as unfit to governe, as ever Childericke was, whom Pope Zacharie pronounced against. This prepared the way for that scourge wherewith God meant to chastice the pride and sinnes of France. Each partie sought to fortifie it selfe with friends, as well at home as abroad. The Duke of Burgundie had the King and the Dolphin on his side; the other had the Kings of Navar and Arragon, the Dukes of Berrie and Britaine, with many of the mightiest Earles and Lords. The Duke of Burgunder, (who together with the King and the face of governement, kept in Paris) perceiving his adversaries strengths to be more then his owne, offers to the King of England, a daughter of France in marriage with the Prince, and many great promises, so as he would joyne in defence of the King, and send over competent forces; whereunto he is said to have answered: Our advice is, that you should not in this case adventure battell with your enemie, who seemes to prosecute a just revenge for the death of his Father; but labour to aswage the displeasure and anger of the exasperated yong man, by all the good means which are possible. If that cannot be, then stand upon your guard, and draw into place of most safetie, with such force of men as may best serve for your defence. After all this, if hee will not be appeased, you may with the better conscience encounter him, and in such case wee will not fayle (more fully) to assist, according as you request. For the present he sent over the Earles of Arundel and Kyme, and many men of Armes, with plentie of English Bow-men, who came safe to Paris, where they in nothing diminished the ancient glorie of their Nation, but behaved themselves valiantly.

(49) The Duke of Orleance, and the Peeres of his faction, seeing their successe, consult how to draw the King of England from their enemie, and thereupon send over one Falconet with others, with solemne lers- "ters of credence, whom they made their irrevocable "Procurators, to entreat, agree, and conclude, (on their "behalfes) with the most excellent Prince, Henry, by "the grace of God King of England, and his most noble "sonnes, &c. for the restitution and reall re-delivery "of the Dutchie of Aquitain, with all the rights and "appurtenances, which (as is affirmed) are the inheri- "tance of the said most excellent Lord the King of Eng- "land, by them to bee made and done, &c. The Ambassadors having shewed forth this Proxie, exhibited the poynts of their negotiation in these Articles, by which wee may see how farre the desire of revenge will transport great mindes. 1 They offer their bodies to be employed against all men for the service of the King

King of England, saving their faith to their owne Soveraigne, as knowing the King of England would not otherwise desire them. 2. Their sonnes, daughters, nephewes, Nieces, and all their Cosens to bestow in marriage at the King of Englands pleasure. 3. Their Castles, Townes, treasure, and all their goods to be at the service of the said King. 4. Their friends, the Gentlemen of France, the Clergie and wealthy Burgers; who are all of their side; as by proofe (they said) shall well appeare. 5. They finally offer to him the Dutchy of Aquitaine entire, and in as full a manner as ever his Predecessors enjoyed the same, without excepting any thing; so as they themselves will hold, and acknowledge to hold their lands in those parts, directly of the said King, and deliver as much of them as they can into his possession, and will doe their utmost to conquer the rest for him. Vpon condition on the other side. 1. That the King of England, and his Successors, should assist the said Lords, against the Duke of Burgundy, for the murther committed upon the person of the late Duke of Orleance. 2. That he should assist against the said Duke of Burgundy and his favourers, till they had repaired all the losses which they, their friends and tenants had susteined through that occasion. 3. That hee should helpe to settle the quiet of the Realme, &c.

Their demands

(50) These Offers being put into the ballance with the Articles, upon which the Duke of Burgundy had obtained succours, ouer-weighed them so farre, that about the midst of August, before all those which had beene sent with the Earle of Arundel to the contrary part, were returned into England, aids were decreed to the Duke of Orleance, to the wonder of all men, who understood not the secret, so that Thomas Duke of Clarence, Edward Duke of Yorke, the Earle of Dorset, and very many other principall men, with a competent puissance, were sent over to ayde the Duke of Orleance, the Earle of Angolesme remaining hostage in England, for the sure paiment of one hundred and nine thousand Crownes for performance of * the other Articles: They came on shore in Normandy; but, whether the confederates mooved with the perill into which their Countrey and Nation should by these meanes be precipitated, or for some other causes, (though none indeed so just, as the sorrow and shame for their so disloyall a combination with the capitall enemies of France) the Duke of Orleance, (contrary to agreement) came not at the appointed time and place, whereupon the English burnt, spoiled and tooke much riches in the Castles, Countrey and good Townes, wherewith to satisfie themselves, till the Duke of Orleance should see them paid. At last yet the Dukes of Clarence and Orleance came to a treaty, after which the English campe rose peaceably and marcht into Aquitaine there to Winter it selfe, the Duke of Orleance returning to his owne. While these matters were in hand, the Lord of Heyle Marshall of France, with many other Lords, and about foure thousand * men of armes, laid siege to a certaine strong place in Gascoigne; which Sir Iohn Blunt Knight, with three hundred souldiers, not only defended, but drave them also from the siege, taking prisoners twelve of the principal, and about sixscore other Gentlemen. * The King lived not to see the carriage and fortune of these warres, for falling sicke at Eltham in the Christmas time (at which our ancient authors begin to draw the circles of their yeares) but recovering himselfe a little, he repaired to London about Candlemas, there to hold a Parliament, the end whereof he lived not to see, but upon the twentieth day of March finished his short but politique and victorious raigne, in peace and honour, had not the injustice of his first entrance left a dishonourable staine upon his worthiest actions.

Tho. Walsingh. Hist. Anglic.

(51) The vulgar Chronicles tell us a strange Story, the truth whereof must rest upon the reporters. The King, say they, lying dangerously sicke, caused his Crowne to be set on a Pillow at his beds head, when suddainely the pangs of his Apoplexie seizing on him so vehemently that all supposed him dead, the Prince comming in, took away the Crown; which, his father revining, soone missed; and calling for his sonne, demanded, what he meant, to bereave him of that, whereto hee had yet no right? The Prince boldly replyed; Long may you live Soveraigne Father to weare it your selfe; but all men deeming you were departed to inherite another Crowne, this being my right, I tooke as mine owne; but now doe acknowledge for none of mine; and thereupon he set the Crowne againe where he found it. Oh sonne, (quoth he) with what right I got it, God onely knoweth, who forgive me the sin. Howsoever it was got, said the Prince, I meane to keepe and defend it, (when it shall bee mine) with my Sword, as you by Sword have obtained it. Which the King hearing, hee entred discourse of advise, shewing him that hee feared some discord would arise betwixt him and his brother Thomas Duke of Clarence, who with better respect had borne forth his youth then Prince Henry had done, and whose distemper was like to breed great troubles, if it were not in time stayed. If my Brethren (quoth Henry) will be true subjects, I will honour them as my Brethren, but if otherwise, I shall affoone execute justice upon them, as on the meaneſt of bireh in my Kingdome. The King rejoycing at this unexpected answer; both prudently and Christianly charged him "before God, to minister the law indifferently, to "ease the oppressed, to beware of flatterers, not to "deserve justice, nor yet to be sparing of mercy. Pu- "nish (quoth he) the oppressors of thy people, "so shalt thou obtaine favour of God, and love "and feare of thy Subjects, who whiles they have "wealth, so long shalt thou have their obedience, "but made poore, by oppressions, will be ready to "make insurrections. Rejoyce not so much in the "glory of the Crowne, as meditate on the burthe- "nous care which accompanieth it; mingle love "with feare, so thou, as the heart, shalt be defended "in the midst of the body: but know, that neither "the heare without the members, nor a King with- "out his Subjects helpe is of any force. Lastly, "my sonne love and feare God, ascribe all thy victo- "ries, ſtrength, friends, obedience, riches, honour, "and all, unto him, and with the Psalmist say with all "thanks, Not unto us Lord, not unto us, but to thy holy "name be given the laud and praise.

(52) Vpon what soyle these most Christian, true and excellent Councels fell, the following life will shew, being nothing else, but a full representation in act, of such things as are here in precept only, shewing to the World how divine a beautie Christian goodnesse hath.

His Wives.

(53) The first wife of King Henry the fourth, was Mary one of the daughters and heires of Humfrey de Bohun, Earle of Hereford, Essex, and Northampton, Constable of England, &c. She died An. Dom. 1394. before he came to the Crowne.

(54) His second wife was Ioane, Queene, daughter to Charles the first, King of Navarre, she being the Widow of Iohn de Montfort, Sir-named Streani, Duke of Britaine; and died without any Children by King Henry, at Havering in the Bower in the county of Essex, 1437. the tenth day of Iuly, in the fifteenth yeare of Henry the sixt, and was buried by her husband at Canterbury.

His Children.

(55) Henry, the Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornewall, Earle of Chester, and afterward King of England, whose glorious life and acts next insue.

(56) Thomas, Duke of Clarence, President of the Councell to King Henry the fourth, and Steward of England, was slaine at Beaufort in Anjou, without any issue. Hee married Margaret daughter to

Thomas

Thomas Holland Earle of Kent, the widow of Iohn Beaufort Earle of Somerset.

(57) Iohn, Duke of Bedfort, Regent of France in the time of King Henry the fixt, Duke also of Anjou and Alanson, Earle of Cenomannia, Harecourt, of Kendall and Dreux, Viscount Beaumont. Hee married first with Anne, daughter to Iohn Duke of Burgundy. Secondly with Iacoba, daughter to Peter de Luxemburgh, Earle of Saint Paul. And died without any issue.

(58) Humfrey, was by his brother King Henry the fift created Duke of Glocester, was Protector of the Kingdome of England for 25. yeares, in the time of King Henry the fixt, in whose first yeare he stiled himselfe in his Charters thus: Humfrey, by the grace of God, sonne, brother, and uncle to Kings, Duke of Glocester, Earle of Henault, Holland, Zeland, and Pembroke, Lord of Friesland, Great Chamberlaine of the Kingdome of England, Protector and Defendor of the same Kingdome, and Church of England. He was a man, who nobly deserved of the Common-wealth, and of learning, as being himselfe very learned, and a magnificent Patron and Benefactor of the Universitie of Oxford, where he had beene educated; and was generally called, the Good Duke. He married first Iacoba, heire to William Duke of Bavaria Earle of Holland, who (as after was knowne) had first beene lawfully troth-plighted to Iohn Duke of Brabant, and therefore was afterward divorced from the said Humfrey. His second Wife was Elianor daughter to Reginald, Baron Cobham de Scarborough. Queene Margaret, Wife to King Henry the fixt, repining at his great power in swaying the King and State, secretly wrought his ruine, he being murthered in his bed at Bury, dying without any issue, 1446. His body was buried at Saint Albans, yet the vulgar errour is that he lies buried in Saint Pauls.

(59) Blaunch, married to Lewis Barbatus, Palatine of the Rhine, Prince Elector.

(60) Philip, married to Iohn King of Denmarke and Norway.

HENRY

Henry V.

HENRY THE FIFTH, KING OF ENGLAND, AND FRANCE, LORD OF IRELAND: THE TWO AND FIFTIETH MONARCH OF ENGLAND, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND ISSVE.

Monarch 52.

CHAPTER. XV.

An. Dom. 1412.

AMongst the many Monarchs of this most famous Empire, none is found more compleat with all heroicall vertues then is this King, of whose life by order and succesſe of Story weeare now to write; which is, Henry of that name the Fifth, the renowne of England, and glory of Wales. Of whom, what was spoken of Titus in the flourishing times of the Romans, may for the time of his raigne be truly verified in him: both of them being the lovely darlings, and delightfull joy of Mankinde. But as Titus is taxed by his Story-Writers, in youth to have beene riotous, profuse, wastfull, and wanton, for which (as he saith) with the dislikes of men he stept into the Throne; so if we will beleeve what others have writ, Henry * was wilde whiles he was a Prince, whose youthfull prankes as they passed with his yeeres, let us have leave here to rehearse, and leave them motives to our owne use, as he made them for his.

(2) His birth was at Monmouth in the marches of Wales, the year of Christs assuming our flesh, 1388. and the eleventh of King Richards reigne, his father then a subject, and Earle of Derby, Leicester, and Lincolne, afterwards created Duke of Hereford, in right of his wife, then of Lancaster, by the death of his father; and lastly, by election made the Soveraigne of England, that unfortunate Richard being deposed the Crown. His mother was Mary, second daughter and co-heire of Humphrey Bohun Earle of Hereford, and Northampton, high Constable of England, * as wee have said.

(3) His young yeares were spent in literature in the Academy of Oxford, where in Queenes-Colledge he was a Student under the tuition of his uncle Henry Beaufort, Chancellor of that Universitie, afterwards Bishop of Lincolne and Winchester, and lastly made Cardinall by the title of Eusebius. But his Father obtaining the Crowne, and himselfe come come to the age of twelve yeares, had the succession thereof entailed on him by Parliament, and accordingly was created Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earle of Chester, and presently had the Title of the Dukedome of Aquitaine conferred upon him, the better to effect the thing then intended, which was to have obtained in marriage young Queene Isabel, late Wife to the murthered King Richard, Daughter of Charles the sixth, King of France.

(4) From Oxford, Prince Henry was called to Court, and the Lord Thomas Percy then Earle of Worcester made his Governour; but being himselfe false to his Father, could give no good example unto the sonne, whose hostile attempts in the field of Shrewsbury cost that disloyall Earle his head, and almost had done Prince Henry his life, who in battell against him was wounded in the face with an arrow. This marke of his manhood, with the overthrow of Hotspur in that bloudy conflict, were hopefull signes of his following successe, which presently were seconded with as fortunate proceedings against Owen Glendowr that scourge of his Country, and Arch-rebell unto Englands peace, whom this Prince so pursued through the vast mountaines of Wales, that from the Dennes of those deserts hee durst not shew his face, but therein perished by famine and natures other wants, though the Prince had then scarcely attained unto sixteene.

(5) But growne from his tutors command, or controll, and come to the yeares for disposé of himselfe, as his youth stood affected, so were his consorts, and those (many times) whose conditions were none of the best; whether led by an inclination of youth (which commonly lets the raine loose unto Will) or, to know that by proofe, which other Princes doe by report, I will not determine: yet unto the latter doe I rather incline, knowing that Salomon the wisest of Kings did so himselfe; and rather by Rosse I am lead, who writeth that Prince Henry in Oxford had in great veneration, such as excelled in vertue or learning, and among many, two he nameth, Thomas Rodban of Merton Colledge a great Astronomer, by him preferred to the Bishopricke of S. Davids in Wales, and John Carpenter of Oriel Colledge, a learned Doctor in Theology, whom hee advanced to the See of Worcester. But let us heare how his wilde oates were sowne, and with what increase the harvest was got. The translater of Livy, who wrote the Story of this worthy Prince, and dedicated his paines to King Henry his sonne, affirmeth for truth, that many actions he did, farre unfitting his greatnesse of birth; and among other, doth taxe him with no better then theft, who in the raigne of his Father, accompanyed with such as spent their wits upon other mens paines, laide waite in the way for his Rents receivers, and robd them of that which indeed was his owne, when sometimes in shusting he nothing was spared, but bare away many knockes, the lenders whereof hee would frankely reward, when they complained unto him of their losses received, which ever were abated in the foot of their accounts.

Eccles. 2.

(6) Our learned Knight Eliot setting his pen to portrait a perfect Governour, recordeth a Story, retaining this Princes great fame, the credit whereof let it lye upon himselfe. It chanced (saith hee) a servant of his to bee arraigned for felony at the Kings Bench-Barre, where standing ready to receive sentence of death, the Prince had intelligence, and posted thither, where finding his servant made sure for sharing, commanded his fetters to be strucke off, and the Fellon arraigned to be freed the Court. All men amazed at this his approach and speech: the Chiefe Justice stood up, and shewed the Prince that his feare was the Kings, that Lawes were the finewes of the Common-wealth, that himselfe was sworne to doe Justice, and must yeeld an account for all that he did, that he honoured him as the eldest sonne of his Soveraigne, and Prince, but to set free the prisoner, hee could not, having so apparantly endangered his life to the Law; and therefore desired the Prince, if he held him in such esteeme, to save him by pardon from the King, and not to infringe the Law, which he told him plainely he should not doe.

Sir Tho. Eliot Governour.

(7) The Prince inraged to have deniall, assayed himselfe to set free the Prisoner, which the Chiefe Justice forbad, commanding him upon his allegiance to cease from such riot, and to keepe the Kings peace: whereat Prince Henry in a fury stept up the Bench, and gave the Iudge a blow on the face, who nothing danted, sate still, and with a bold countenance, spake thus to the Prince: "Sir, I pray you remember your "selfe, this seate of Iudgement which here I possesse, is "not mine, but your Fathers, to whom and to his lawes "you owe double obedience. If his Highnesse bee thus "contemned, and his lawes violated by you, that should "shew your selfe obedient to both, who will obey you "when you are a Soveraigne, or minister execution to "the Lawes that you shall make? Wherefore, for this "attempt, in your Fathers name, I committ you prisoner "unto the Kings Bench, there to remaine untill his "Majesties pleasure be further knowne. With which words the Prince greatly abashed, stood mute by the Iudge, and fixing his eyes upon his reverend face, presently laid from him his weapons, and with humble obeysance done, departed to prison. The King understanding the whole circumstance, greatly rejoyced that hee had a Sonne of such obedience to his lawes, and a Iudge so upright to administer them without either favour or feare of the person; notwithstanding for this, and other like actions of his youth, he removed him from being President of his Privy-Councell, and placed in his stead Thomas Duke of Clarence his second Brother; to Prince Henries no little griefe and discontent.

Deuteron. 16. Exodus. 18.

Rich. Grafton.

(8) Howbeit his followers were nothing diminished, but his Court frequented more then his fathers, which bred some suspition in the crazy Kings head, left among his other wilde parts, he would attempt to play with his Crowne; which was encreased by his domesticall flatterers, who daily buzzed new jealousies into his eares. This made Prince Henry (as Otterborne noteth) to strengthen himselfe with his chiefest friends and well-willers, and with such a troupe repaired to his fathers Court, as a greater in those dayes had not beene seene. The translator of Livy reports the manner of his approach, even from him that was an eye-witnesse, and the same no lesse then the Earle Ormond of Ireland, whose relation is this.

The Otterborne.

(9) The King somewhat crasie, and keeping his Chamber, hearing newes daily of his sonnes loose exercises, too meane for a Prince, and their constructions ever made to ayme at his Crowne, hee both began to withdraw his fatherly affection, and to feare some violence against his owne person, which when Prince Henry heard of, by some that favoured him of the Kings Councell, in a strange disguise hee repaired to his Court, accompanyed with many Lords and Noble-mens sonnes. His Garment was a Gowne of blew Satten, wrought full of Eylet-holes, and at every Eylet the Needle left hanging by the silke it was wrought with: about his arme hee ware a dogs-collar set full of S.S. of Gold, the Tirrets thereof being most fine Gold. Thus comming to Westminster, and the Court of his Father, having commanded his followers to advance no further then the fire in the Hall, himselfe accompanied with some of the Kings Houshold, passed on to his presence, and after his duty and obeysance done, offered to make knowne the cause of his comming. The King weake then with sickneſſe, and supposing the worst, commanded himselfe to bee borne into a with-drawing Chamber, some of his Lords attending upon him, before whose feete Prince Henry fell, and with all reverence observances, spake to him as followeth.

"(10) Most gracious Soveraigne, and renowned "father,

"father, the suspition of disloyalty, and divulged re-"ports of my dangerous intendments towards your "royall Person and Crowne, hath enforced at this "time, and in this manner, to present my selfe and lite "at your Majesties disposé. Some faults and mis-spent "time (with blushes I may speake it) my youth hath "committed, yet those made much more by such, flee-"ring pick-thanks, that blow them stronger into your "unwilling and distastive eare. The name of Sove-"raigne ties allegiance to all, but of a Father, to a fur-"ther feeling of natures obedience; so that my sinnes "were double, if such suggestions possessed my heart: "for the Law of God ordaineth, that he which doth "presumptuously against the Ruler of his people "shall not live, and the childe that smiteth his father "shall die the death: so farre therefore am I from any "disloyall attempt, against the person of you my Fa-"ther, and the Lords annointed; that if I knew any "of whom you stood in the least danger or feare, my "hand according to duty should be the first to free "your suspition; yea, I will most gladly suffer death "to ease your perplexed heart; and to that end I have "this day prepared my selfe, both by confession of my "offences past, and receiving the blessed Sacrament. "Wherefore I humbly beseech your Grace to free "your suspition from all feares conceived against me, "with this Dagger, the stabbe whereof I will willing-"ly receive here at your Majesties hand, & so doing in "the presence of these Lords, and before God at the "day of judgement, I clearely forgive my death. But the King melting into teares, cast downe the naked Dagger (which the Prince delivered him) and raising his prostrate sonne, embraced and kissed him, confessing his ears to have beene over-credulous that way, and promising never to open them againe against him. But the Prince unsatisfied, instantly desired, that at least his accusers might bee produced, and if convicted, to receive punishment, though not to the full of their demerits; to which request the King replyed, that as the offence was capitall, so should it be examined by the Peeres, and therefore willed him to rest contented untill the next Parliament. Thus by his great wisdome he satisfied his father from further suspition, and recovered his love that nearely was lost. Hitherto of Henry as hee was Prince (some other of whose youthly actions we also touched in his fathers raigne) and now to his Acts after he was King.

(11) Henry ordained successour and over-seer of his dying Fathers Testament, had in his entrance so fortunate proceedings, as hee seemeth to exceed all his Predecessors; his Nobles proffering the oath of their Allegiance, before himselfe had made his, for the just government of the Common-weale, which so farre was from acceptation, that he desired God never to admit him to the Crowne, unlesse he should to his glory raigne, and rule the Scepter to the good of the Subiects. The day of his entrance and of his Fathers death, being the twentieth of March, and yeare of Christs Incarnation, according to our account, 1412. on the ninth of Aprill following hee was solemnely crowned at Westminster, Thomas Arundell Archbishop of Canterbury performing the royall Ceremonies: which no sooner was ended, but to begin a good government, he began with himselfe, banishing from his presence and Court the unbridled youths which had beene his consorts, commanding them either to change their manners, or never to approach within tenne miles where he lay. Then chose he worthy and prudent men for his Councell of Estate, and advanced his Clergy with dignity and power: being himselfe as zealous in devotion, as liberall in building, and indowing of places for devotion of others. His Justice was found of all that sought it; for every day after dinner, for the space of an houre, his custome was to leane on a Cushion set by his cupbord, and there himselfe received petitions of the oppressed, which with great equity hee did redresse. And for a further testimony of his tender and compassionate heart, the slaughtered body of King Richard, over-meanely entered at Langley, in great estate he removed into Saint Peters Church at Westminster, and there laid him enshrined by Queene Anne his first wife (as himselfe had defined and prepared) founding a weekly memoriall to be celebrated, and sixe shillings eight pence thereon distributed unto the poore, and yearely twentie pounds given upon his anniuersary day, besides foure tapers to burne before his monument, day and night for ever. And so neerely did his death touch this innocent King, that he sent to Rome to be assoyled from that guilt of his fathers Act, by the Popes Holinesse, then accounted another God; whose penance enjoyned, he willingly performed, and afterwards purposed to have made warre in Palestina against the enemies of Christ; for which end, he sent Sir Hugh de Lavoy of Henault to Ierusalem, to discover the state of things there; but before his returne he was departed to the heavenly Ierusalem himselfe.

(12) The obsequies of his Father being solemnized at Canterbury, and the King in person attending the Corps, sit occasion was given unto Archbishop Arundel to complaine of the Wickliffians, (then termed Lollards) great rubs in the waies of the Clergies pride and proceedings; whereof Sir John Old-Castle was thought a chiefe; who by his marriage contracted with a kinswoman of the Lord Cobhams of Cooling in Kent, obtained the title thereof; he was a man strong and valourous, and in especiall favour with his Prince. This Knight in a Synode assembled at London, immediately after the Kings Coronation, was accused by them to have rent Christs seamelesse coat, in maintaining Wickliffes doctrine to be taught, especially in the Diocesse of London, Rochester, and Hereford: against whom also some choise Inquisitors at Oxford, appointed for Heresies, (though * that whole Vniversity had formerly upheld both Wickliffe and his doctrine,) informed and presented his name with two hundred fortie sixe conclusions, which they had collected to be hereticall.

Tho. Walsingh.

(13) The King incensed (by the Archbishops suggestions) against these discontented discipliners, was further made beleeve that they themselves had set up Bills in divers places, threatning that an hundred thousand persons were ready for armes, against all that withstood their reformation, and among these that Oldcastle his knight was reputed the chiefe. The King graciously inclined, heard the Archbishops complaint, and being at Kennington, promised to conferre with the Lord Cobham himselfe, which accordingly he did, instantly willing him to submit himselfe to the censure of the Church, and obedience of the Archbishop: But Cobham, no turne-coate from his profession, humbly told the King he owed his subjection onely unto his Majestie, whom God had placed in these his Dominions, as his onely Vice-gerent to governe his people and Subjects, and that himselfe forced nothing Romes leaden sword, unsheathed by the Pope (that Antichrist) against the Lords servants, nor would suffer the key of Canterbury to open the closet of his conscience, where the spirit of God was residing, bearing witnesse with his, that he stood in the truth, for whose defence as his Champion, he was ready to live or die.

(14) This answere received, was so delivered unto the Archbishop, with power to cite, examine and punish, as their owne Canons in such cases had decreed. The Lyon thus laide for, whose paw they still feared, was served by processe to appeare in the Archbishops Court, and the same delivered by one Butler a servant of the Kings Privy-Chamber, for that the bold Summer durst not doe it himselfe, and the Archbishop (diligent lest hee should forget the day) caused his letters citatorie to bee set upon the gates of the Cathedrall Church of Rochester, which were prefently torne downe, and others againe set up, were again pulled off, to the great offence of the Clergies eye, and the rather, for that the Actor could not be knowne. of contumacie, and afterwards in a Synode at Rochester, was by the Archbishop pronounced an heretike, where himselfe then enacted that hereticall decree, that the holy scriptures should not bee translated into the English tongue. But marke the judgement that fell upon his owne tongue, whose roots and blade shortly after (as is recorded) grew so big in his mouth and throat, that he could neither speake nor swallow downe meat, but in horror lay languishing, till lastly he so died, starved by famine.

Archbishop Arundells death.

(15) In the meane time the Lord Cobham wrote his * Beliefe, which was very Christian-like, and presented it himselfe to the King, who (being much prepossessed) in no wise would receive it, but suffered him to bee summoned in his presence, and privie Chamber, when the Knight for his purgationoffered an hundred Knights and Esquires, which would not be accepted; then, according to his degree of Order, and law of Armes, he required the single combat to fight for life or death, with either Christian or Heathen in the quarrell of his faith, the King and Councell onely excepted. This notwithstanding could not bee suffered, but needes must he appeare before the Archbishop his judge: where, after divers examinations (in all which hee most religiously justified himselfe and his profession) hee was condemned of Heresie, and committed Prisoner unto the Tower of London, whence shortly he escaped, and got into Wales. Vpon which escape great feares were conceived, especially of the Clergy, the causers of his troubles, and mortall enemies to him & his wel-willers; for the king was confidently (but as it seemeth malitiously) informed; that Oldcastle with his adherents laid for his life, and that in S. Giles Fields neere unto Holborne twenty thousand were to assemble in hostile manner, with an intent to destroy the Monasteries of Westminster, S. Albans, all the religious houses in London, and the Cathedrall Church of Saint Pauls. The King therefore in person himselfe, after mid-night, with a great Army came into these Fields, where (if we will believe their professed enemies) foure-score of that faction were apprehended, who said they came to seeke the Lord Cobham. But as the answerer of Copus, from more ancient times hath observed, that in daies of persecution, such assemblies often had been made to heare the Gospell preached, which otherwise they could not enjoy: so in this place * then over-growne with bushes, and unfit for battell, those few were in likelyhood assembled unto John Beverley, a godly man their Preacher, without any intent of treason, having for their Chiefetaines no greater persons then Sir Roger Acton a Knight of no great account, a Minister, and a malt-man. But their Apologies we leave to * others; onely the Lord Cobham could not be found, though the King by Proclamation had promised a thousand markes to his taker, besides many liberties to the City or Towne that would disclose him; whereby (saith Walsingham) it may bee ghessed, that the whole Kingdome, well neere, embraced his opinions, which that Fryar calls his madnesse. Thirty seaven of that assembly were condemned, whereof seaven were consumed with fire, and strangled, Acton, Beverley, and Murley, were likewise executed.

(16) As the zeale of this King is much commended for his favours towards his Clergy, so is his Princely pittie in the commiseration of young Percies distresse, whose father Hotspur slaine at Shrewsbury (as we have saide) and he by his Grand-father sent into Scotland for security, was there notwithstanding detained a Prisoner, for that Iames their King was forcibly kept in England by Henry, and as they tooke it against all Iustice. But sit occasion being offered for young Percies release, and exchange made betweene him and Alrede sonne of Robert Duke of Albany, (who had beene taken prisoner at the battell of Halidon) the King restored him not onely in bloud, and to grace in his Court, but also invested his person with the Title and State of his Grand-father, to his owne no little honour, and faithfull service attained of that honourable Family.

(17) Vpon Archbishop Arundels death, starved by famine, as wee have said, * Henry Chicheley, a stout Champion also against Wiclisses doctrine, was with the Kings consent, by the Monkes of Canterbury elected their Archbishop, which the politicke Elect neither accepted nor refused, but left it to the will and pleasure of the Pope: who first tooke snuffe that it so farre proceeded without his direction, yet was soone pacified by Chicheleys submission, and (as saith mine Author) with other Gratulations besides. The man, though not so rich by birth, as Arundel was, yet as strong for the Clergy, and more gratious with his Prince, as the sequele prooved.

* Henry Chicheley made Archbishop of Canterbury.

(18) The first assayes of both was made knowne in a Parliament holden at Leicester, where in a Bill exhibited, complaint was made, that the temporall Lands given to Religious Houses and spirituall persons for devotion sake, were either superfluous, or disorderly spent; whose revenues (if better imployed) would suffice for the defence of the Land, and honor of the King; fifteene Earles, fifteen hundred Knights, sixe thousand two hundred Esquires, and one hnndred Almes-houses, for the relieife of impotent and diseased persons, and unto the Kings coffers twenty thousand pounds by yeare. Which Bill (saith Hall) made the fat Abbots to sweate, the proud Priors to frowne, the poore Fryers to curse, the silly Nunnes to weepe, and all her Merchants to feare, that Babel would downe: and indeed heere it began to fall, when by the authority of this Parliament, one hundred and tenne Priories aliant were suppressed, and their possessions given to the King, and to his heires for ever.

A complaint against the Clergies excesse.

(19) But to stop the breach of this searching Spring, no better meanes could be found, then to divert the Parliament with other businesses, and to drive other projects into the Kings minde; "whose "head (as this new Archbishop there told him) "had the best right to the Crowne of France: for "not onely the Dutchies of Normandy, Aquitaine, "and Anjou, the Counties of Gascoigne, Maine, "and the rest, were his lawfull (though unlawfully "detained) inheritance; but therewithall the whole "Realme of France, as true heire unto his great "Grand-father King Edward the third, and unto "Philip the faire, in right of his mother Queene I-"sabell, the onely daughter and Child living of the "said French King. As for the law Salique, alleaged "against the English claime, he affirmed, that Texe "touched onely those parts in Germany which lay betwixt the Rivers Elbe and Sala, conquered by "King Charles the Great, who placing the French "there to inhabite, for the dishonest lives of those "Germaine women made this Law. In terram Sali-"cam Mulieres ne succedant, which the Glosse did "falsly expound for the whole Kingdome of France; "Whose practise notwithstanding hee shewed to bee "the contrary, by many experiences both in King "Pepin, which deposed Childericke by the claime of "heire Generall (as descended of Blithild daughter "to Clotheir the first,) and by Hugh Capet, who, usur-"ping the Crowne upon Charles Duke of Loraine "(the sole heire male of that line, from Charles the "great) to make his claime good (which indeed was "starke naught) derived himselfe as heire to the "Lady Lingard, daughter to Charlemaine, sonne to "Lewis the Emperour, that was sonne to Charles the "Great. King Lewis also called the Saint, (who was "the heire to the usurper Hugh Capet) could not bee "satisfied in conscience, how hee might justly keepe "and possesse the Crowne of France, till he was ful-"ly instructed that Isabell his Grand-mother was "lineally descended of the Lady Ermengard, daugh-"ter and heire to the above-named Charles Duke of "Loraine, by the which marriage the bloud and "line of Charles the Great was againe united, and re-"stored to the Crowne of France. Whereby (said "the Archbishop) it most manifestly appeared, that "the

"the title of Pepin, the claime of Capet, the posses-"sion of Lewis, yea of the French Kings themselves "to this day, derive their onely rights from the "heires female, and that this pretended Law Salique "was but a shifting device to debarre the English "Kings from the claime of the French Crowne. "Which excluston howsoever they pretend to bee "right, yet the law of God (said hee) hath made it "meere wrong, which with better regard of the Sex, "alloweth the woman to inherite her Fathers pos-"session, as we see in the practise of that state, where-"of Christ himselfe is called King, where the five "daughters of Zelophehad, for want of heires males, "were admitted to succeed in their Fathers inheri-"tance, allotted them in the Tribe of Manasses; and "a law made by the Lord himselfe, that if a man di-"ed and had no sonnes, then his inheritance should "be transferred upon his daughters. Neither is it to "be doubted, but that the daughter of Shesham was "the sole heire unto her Fathers patrimony, he dying "without issue male; though she married an Egyp-"tian, whose posterity had their possessions among "the Tribe of Iudah, even to the Captivity of Baby-"lon: so that if such a law were, as in truth there "was no such, better were the breach, by the warrant "of divine direction, then the continuance by colour "of such prescription, seeing God hath ordained as-"well for the daughter as for the sonne.

(20) The Archbishops unexpected, but not unpremeditated Oration thus ended, so stirred the bloud of the young couragious King, that his heart was all on a flame; and so tickled the eares of his Auditory, as they presently conceived that France was their owne; the Title whereof descending from Isabel, the mother of the famous third Edward, and shee the daughter and surviving heire unto Philip the faire: his right was lineally derived thence as followeth. First, Philip by Ioane his first wife intituled Queene of Navarre, had three sons and one daughter, namely Lewis, Philip, and Charles, all three successively Kings, and this Lady Isabell, by whom the English claime. His second wife was Constance the daughter of the King of Sicile; who bare him a sonne after his owne decease, which lived not many dayes after his Father. Lewis his eldest sonne, and tenth of that name, succeeded Philip in the Kingdome of France, and by Margaret his wife the daughter of Burgundy, had his daughter Ione, intituled Queene of Navarre, who made claime also unto the French Crowne, but never attained it; so that her Title fell with her death. Lewis by his second wife Clemence of Sicil, had a sonne named John borne unto him, but presently both Father and sonne departing this life, left the Scepter to his second brother; who by the name of Philip the fift, a while wore the Emperiall Crowne of France: his wife was Ione the daughter of Burgonne, who bare unto him onely foure daughters, but none of them had issue, saith Hall.

(21) Vnto King Philip succeeded his Brother Charles the faire, the fourth of that name, whose first Wife was Blanch, detected of incontinency, and brought him no fruit. His second wife was Mary daughter to Henry Luxembourg the Emperour, who bare him a sonne that dyed soone after his birth, and the mother likewise shortly came to her grave. Margaret the daughter to the Earle of Eureux was his third and last Wife, who at his death hee left with-Child, and thus the three sonnes of Philip were branched, raigned, and dyed, whom Queene Isabell their sister survived, and in that right her sonne King Edward the third, by his royall consanguinity, whileft the Crowne stood thus at suspence, till a Prince should be borne, claimed to bee Regent in the Interregnum, and in the non-age of the looked for issue, against which, Philip de Valois, sonne of Charles the hardy, who was brother to Philip the faire, being a second branch from Hugh Capet, and first Prince of the bloud of France, maintained that the Regency of the male (if so he were borne) as also of the Realme (if a daughter, or the sonne dyed) belonged onely unto him as the next in bloud. The state thus standing, and a daughter borne, Philip was saluted and proclaimed King, no other right alleaged then this foysted and falsely termed fundamentall law Salique, for no otherwise doth Ottoman the French famous Lawyer esteeme of that ungodly and unjust Ordinance, if any such had beene ordained.

(22) The Kings right thus made apparant, and sufficient possessions to be had in France: the Bill of complaint against the Clergies excesse was quite dasht, and all mindes addicted for the affaires that way; thinking it unreasonable to pull the Provisions from their natives and brethren, when as the circuit of their inheritance extended more large in compasse: and therefore with the Danites they determined no longer to sit so pent with increase, seeing God had given them another Kingdome, but would free their owne straightnesse by dint of sword, and spread their Tents wider in the continent of France: Neither was there any motive more forceable in conference, then was the successe of those intruding Princes, who assayed the Crowne by that unjust claime of law Salique.

Iudges 18.1

(23) For, did not the sword of God (rather then man) in the hand of King Edward the claimer, cut downe the flower of France in the Battell of Cressy, with the slaughter of Lewis King of Bohemia, of Charles the French Kings Brother, of Iames Dolphin of Viennois, the Dukes of Loraine, and Burbon, the Earles of Aumarle, Savoy, Montbilliard, Flanders, Nivers, and Harecourt, the Grand prior of France, the Archbishop and Bishop of Zanxinus and Noyone, of Lords, Barons, and Gentlemen to the number of 1500. with 30. thousand of the French Souldiers, and Philip not able of himselfe to defend himselfe, inciting David of Scotland to invade and weaken England, therein did but onely vexe his owne spirit, for in that attempt the Scottish King was taken prisoner, and brought to London, leaving Philip to struggle with his hard fortunes in France, which with bad successe hee did to the day of his death.

Jos. Serres.

(24) John his sonne, by the same title and claime felt the same stroke of justice from the hand of that thunderbolt in warre, Edward surnamed the blacke Prince, the sonne of Englands Mars, who farre inferiour to the French in number, farre exceeded them in marshall power, when at the battell of Poytiers, the French royall Standard was stroke downe, an hundred Ensignes wonne by the English, the Constable, Marshall and great Chamberlaine of France, with fifty two Lords, and seventeene hundred Gentlemen slaine in the field. King John himselfe, his sonne Philip, two Bishops, thirteene Earles, and one and thirty Lords taken prisoners by the Prince, to his great praise, and confirmation of his just cause.

(25) Nor was the punishment of the Father any whit lessened in King Charles the sonne then raigning, who besides the intestine warres in his owne dominions, was by Gods just judgement strucke into a Lunacy, being unable to governe himselfe, much lesse his Kingdome, upon which advantage (as the French would have it) King Henry now played; though it bee most certaine hee fought his right farre otherwise, for so it standeth upon record, dated the ninth of February, and first of Henry the fift his raigne, that he sent his Ambassadors unto the French King, who could not bee admitted to his presence, and him whom they imployed to procure accesse, was by the French committed to Prison: whereat King Henry most justly conceived a grudge. Paulus Æmilius their owne Story-writer saith, that Henry King of England, sent honourable Ambassadours to demand in marriage the Lady Katherine Daughter unto the French King: which (as hee saith) was neglected with this answer, that the King had no leasure to thinke on that businesse: whom Franciscus Rosenius doth further inlarge, saying: The King scornefully smiling, answered, that France was neither destitute of Dukes, nor bee at leasure to thinke of the Proposition; and being jealous left Burgoine would match his daughter with Henry, sent him a command to the contrary, and againe at their conclusion of peace, expressely enjoyned the said Duke, and all other Princes of the bloud, not to make any alliance of marriage with England, whereby King Henry was further exasperated against France. And lastly, by his councell and conference upon the Archbishops Oration, sent a Summons and demand of the Dutchies of Normandy, Aquitaine, Guyen, and Anjou; in derision whereof, as Caxton recordeth, the Dolphin of France sent him a Tun of Tennis-Balls, as Bullets most fit for his tender hands, who had spent his youth (as he thought) more among Rackets, then regard of his person or matters of State so forward is man to be an Actor in common miseries, when the Fates have made the Subject of the Scene Tragicall, that he drawes the hand of Destiny sooner to strike, and heavier to fall upon that project decreed to be cast downe: for by these disdaines and unprincely dealings, the Crowne of France was grasped by the English hard hand, and that faire soile stained with her Natives owne bloud: for the Present received as it was sent, had promise to be repayed with bals of more force, whose stroke should be such as the strongest gates of Paris should not bee rackets sufficient to bandy the rebound.

(26) Grudges thus growne, and warres in preparing, the French thought it fitteth to make Scotland their friend, whom they incited to molest the English Marches, which accordingly was done, and that with such violence, as it was a question decideable, whether of the kingdomes was first to be dealt with. Westmorland thought it fateth to checke the Scots, as the neerer and continuall backe-friends. But Exceter held it better policy to begin with France the stronger, especially now disquieted through the factions of Burgundy, and Orleance, and unto this the most voyces give way, whose forwardnesse was such, that the Clergy granted a Tenth, and the temporall Lords their aydes to the King, as followeth.

The Earles {Northumberland, Westmorland.} 40 men at Armes, & 120. Archers a peece.

The Earles, {Warwicke, Stafford.} 20. men at Armes, and 40. Archers a peece.

The Earle of Suffolke, a ship, 20. men at Armes, and 40. Archers.

The Earle of Abergaveny, 20. men at Armes, and 20. Archers.

The Lords {Lovell. Barkley. Powis. Camois. S. John. Burrell.} A ship, 20. men at Armes, and 40. Archers a peece.

The Lords {Fitzwalter. Darcy. Seymour. Rosse. Willoughby.} Halfe a ship, 20. men at Armes, and 40. Archers a peece.

The Lord Morley, 6. men at Armes, and 12. Archers.

The Lords {Scales. Randolph.} Proffered to attend the King in their persons without entertainment.

The whole number thus granted and appointed, amounted to, of Men at Armes. 346, Archers. 552, Ships. 9½

To put backe the Scots, Sr. Robert Umfreville was sent, who in a skirmish upon Mary Magdalens day, tooke 360. of them prisoners, and with great spoyle returned to Rocksburough Castle, whereof he had charge; the newes whereof King Charles understanding, and the great preparation made against France, being better advised, upon the dangerous event, sent his Ambassadors into England, whereof the Archbishop of Bourges was principall, who at Winchester made offer of money, and some other Territories (but none of the best) with the Princesse Lady Katherine to bee given in marriage unto King Henry, so that he would dissolve his Army, and conclude a peace. To this Oration the Archbishop of Canterbury made answer, that his King demanded the Dutchies of Aquitaine and Anjou, with the other Seigniories anciently appertaining to his Progenitors the Kings of England, which as they were his most rightfull and lawfull inheritance, so would he with all possible diligence endeavor (if not otherwise) by fire and sword to recover, which his assertion the King himselfe in presence confirmed.

(27) But Bourges the Archbishop, presuming more upon his Prelacy, then respective unto whom hee spake, with an unreverend boldnesse (liberty obtained) seconded his Ambassage with the termes of an Herald, and with bended browes thus spake to the King: "Thinkest thou, O King, wrongfully to put downe "and destroy the most Christian, the most renowned, and "the most excellent King of all Europe, both in bloud "and prehominence, or thinkest thou that our mighty "Sovereigne Charles hath offered thee lands, summes "of money, and possessions, with his most beautifull "daughter, either in feare of thee, of thy English Na- "tion, or of all thy well-willers whomsoever? I tell "thee no, but mooved in pity, as a lover of peace, and "to save the shedding of Christian bloud, hath made thee "these offers: and his cause being supported by equity "and truth, God and his good Subjects hee trusteth will "set a period soone to thy quarrell. Wee therefore his "Ambassadors demand thy safe conduct to passe out of "thy Realme, and that thou wilt write thine answer, and "send it under thy seale.

(28) Henry, no whit daunted with his big lookes and words, answers the Archbishop with milder and better set tearmes; "My Lord (said hee) I littlee-"steeme of your Gallant bravadoes, and lesse weigh "your imagined power or French brags. I know "my owne right to your Region, and so doe your "selves, unlesse you will deny a most apparant truth: "the strength of your Master you daily see, but mine "as yet you have not tasted: he (you say) hath many "loving subjects and friends, and (God be thanked) "I have both as well affected to mee, with which, ere "long I hope to make the highest Crowne in your "Country to stoope, and the proudest Mitre to kneele "downe: And say to the Usurper your Master, that "within this three Moneths I will enter France, not "as into his Land, but as into mine owne lawfull pa-"trimony, entending to conquer it, not with brag-"ging words, nor flattering Orations, but by power "& dint of sword, through Gods assistance, in whom "I trust: and I assure you, I will not speake the word, "the which I will not write and subscribe, nor will "I subscribe to that to which I willingly will not set "my seale. Therefore your safe conduct shall be dis-"patched, and mine answer in writing delivered, "which once received, you may depart into your "Countrey, where I trust sooner to visite you, then "that you shall have cause to bid me welcome.

(29) The Statute enacted, the first of his raigne hee now put in execution, and commanded the French out of his Land, according to that made the 13. of Richard 2. which disabled the Alien Religious to enjoy any Benefices within England, and now fearing to nourish a snake in his bosome, King Henry forbad the French from all preferments Ecclesiasticall, and those Priors Aliens conventuall, who had institution and induction, to put in security, not to disclose, or cause to be disclosed, the counsell nor secrets of the Realme: and that the French might hold hold his dealings honourable, and open, he sent Antelap his Pursevant at Armes unto King Charles with letters of defiances: next making Queene Ioan his Mother in law the Regent of the Land, he drew his forces unto Southampton, commanding his followers there to attend him in readinesse by the feast of Saint Iohn Baptist ensuing.

(30) Charles the French King expecting present invasion, sent his Ambassadours unto John the sixt Duke of Britain, who had married his daughter, with an hundred thousand Crownes, to levie forces for his aide, and a Iewell worth five thousand Crownes more to himselfe, which the Duke promised to come in person to performe. And as it is reported, King Charles sent to Scroope, Grey, and Cambridge (all three in speciall favour with the King) a million of gold to betray Henry into his hands, or to murther him before he should arrive in Normandy. These to make their faction stronger, though Scroope was Lord Treasurer, Grey a Privie Councellour, and Cambridge, the sonne of Edmund Duke of Torke, yet meant to draw in Edmund Earle of March the sonne of Roger Mortimer, and lineally the heire unto Lionell Duke of Clarence, the next in succession for the house of Torke; and revealing their intended purpose, forced him to sweare to their secrecie, which if hee refused, they threatned his death; whereupon he required but an houres respite, which hardly granted, he went to the King and revealed the conspiracy, even the night before the day that he meant to put to sea.

(31) The parties apprehended and brought before him in presence of many Nobles, King Henry thus "spake; With what horror, O Lord, may any true "English heart consider, that you for pleasing of a "forreine enemy, should imbrue your hands in our "bloud, as also in the bloud of our brethren, to the "ruine of your owne Native soyle: revenge herein "touching my person though I seeke not; yet for the "safegard of you my deare friends, and for due pre-"servation of the Realme, I am by place and office to "minister remedy against these Offenders; Get you "hence therefore, you miserable wretches, to receive "the just reward of your deserts, wherein God give "you repentance for your so foule sinnes.

(32) Notwithstanding this their offence, their indictement, as it standeth in the Record, includes matter of other quality; that, Richard Earle of Cambridge of Conesburgh in the County of Torke, and Thomas Grey of Heton in the County of Northumberland Knight, for that they in the twentieth of July, and third of King Henry the fifts raigne, at Southampton had conspired together with a power of men, to have led away the Lord Edmund Earle of March into Wales, and to have procured him to take the Government of the Realme, in case that King Richard the second were dead; with a purpose to have put forth a Proclamation in the name of the said Earle as heire to the Crowne, against King Henry, by the name of Lancaster usurper, and further, to have conveyed a Banner of the Armes of England, and a certaine Crowne of Spaine set upon a Pallet (layde in gage to the said Earle of Cambridge) into Wales; as also, that the said conspirators had appointed certaine into Scotland, to bring thence one Trumpington, and another resembling in shape, favour, and countenance, King Richard. And Henry Scroope of Masham in the County of Torke was likewise indited as consenting, to the Premisses. Thus well appeared their purpole, though Richard Earle of Cambridge, confidering the poffibillity of his own iffue had fecretely carried that bufineffe: whofe forrowfull letter of his owne hand-writing, as it came to ours, we thinke not amiffe here to infert.

Moft dreadfull and Soveraigne Liege-Lord, I Richard Torke your humble fubject, and very Liegeman, befeech you of grace, of all manner of offences which I have done or affented unto, in any kinde by ftirring of other folke, egging me unto, wherein I was well I have highly offended to your Highneffe, befeeching you at the reverence of God that you like to take me into the hands of your mercifull and piteous grace, thinking yee will of your great goodnes my Liege-Lord: my full truft is, that you will have conſideration (though that my perſon be of none value) your high goodneſſe (where God hath ſet you in ſo high eſtate) to every Liegeman, that you longeth plentiouſly to give; that you like to accept this my ſimple requeſt for the love of our Lady, and the bleſſed holy Ghoſt, to whom I pray that they move your heart ever to all pittie and grace for their high goodnes. Notwithſtanding this his humble petition, upon the ſixt of Auguſt following, hee, with Scroope, and Grey, were beheaded, and his body with head interred in the Chappel of Gods-houſe in Southampton; whoſe apprehenſions, arraignments, and deaths, were ſo followed each after others, as the French knew not, but that the treaſon had ſucceſſe, and their returned Ambaſſadors told it for certaine, that King Henry had either dimiſſed his Army, or (which was thought more true) himſelfe was ſlain by the Conſpirators; ſoeaſie an entrance hath babling report into the wide eares of credulous deſire.

(33) But King Henrie now ready to embarke his men upon Wedneſday the ſeaventh of Auguſt, with fifteene hundred Saile tooke to Seas, attended with fixe thouſand ſpeares, and twenty foure thouſand footmen beſides Gunners, Enginers, Artificers, and Labourers a great number, and the fifteenth of the ſame month caſt Anchor in the mouth of Seyne, at a place called Kideaux, about three miles from Harflew; where hee landed his men; and falling devoutly upon his knees, deſired Gods aſſiſtance to recover his right, making Proclamation upon paine of death, that Churches ſhould be ſpared from all violence of ſpoyle, that churchmen, women and Children, ſhould not be hurt, abuſed or wronged: then giving the order of Knighthood to many of his followers, he affigned his Standards to men of moſt ſtrength and courage, which done, he tooke the hill neere adjoyning, and thence ſent his ſpiall to the Towne of Harflew, making that the firſt aſſay of his fortunes in France. But before wee enter any further diſcourſe in the affaires of that Kingdome, it ſhall not be amiſſe to ſpeake of things commenced in England before that King Henry tooke to the Seas.

(34) The Churches throughout Chriſtendome, having beene diſquieted the ſpace of twenty nine yeares, and now growne intollerable, through the ſchiſmaticall ambitions, maintained by three Papall Monarchs, mounted into Saint Peters ſeat, each of them graſping the Chaire with ſo faſt a fiſt, that the joynts thereof were forced aſunder; and the triple Crowne ſo battered with their thunderbolts of their curſes that it was flatted and made unfit for any of their heads. The perſons arreared were Benedict 13. by the Spaniard elected; the ſecond was Gregory 12. whom the French had ſet up; and the third was Iohn 24. preferred to the place by the Italians. Theſe ſtriving for the Helme, the ſhip was ſo ſteered, that her wracke was apparant upon theſe raging and unquiet Seas. To prevent which the Chriſtian Princes put their helping hands, and by a Generall conſent, ordained a Generall Councell to be held at Conſtance in Germany, which began in February, 1414. and continued above the ſpace of three yeares; whereunto were aſſembled beſides the Emperour, the Pope, and the Palſegrave of Rheine, foure Patriarks, twenty ſeaven Cardinals, forty ſeaven Archbiſhops, one hundred and ſixty Biſhops, Princes, Barons and Gentlemen with their attendants above thirty thouſand.

honour, Richard Earle of Warwicke was sent, themselves and attendants amounting to eight hundred horse: so as it stood in suspence whether their honorable presence more graced the assembly, or their learning or judgement bettered the whole body of the Councell: insomuch that two of these Bishops were there made Cardinals, and of the 30. in best esteeme appointed to assist the Cardinals in their Election of a new Pope, London, Couentree, Bath and Wels were chosen, wherein Robert Bishop of London was first nominated for Pope, and he first nominated him that succeeded, which was Otho Collonna by the name of Martin the fifth. Whose Coronation with great magnificence was celebrated of the five Nations assembled, and this honour given to the English, that the Prior of Saint Johns was a supporter of the triple Crowne. Touching the decrees that this Councell enacted, let it suffice us to know that Wicliffes bookes were condemned for hereticall, that John Hus (notwithstanding the Emperours safe conduct) and Ierome of Prage, were both of them burned, the holy maide Bridget canonized a Saint, and that England was made a Nation in rancke before Spaine.

(36) The deaths of these two Divines many lamented, especially the Bohemians, who had reaped much fruit from the seed they had sowen, for whose doctrine they sent a defence unto the same Councell, and often became humble Petitioners for their lives, as largely appeareth in their letters written on their behalfe; in whom may truly be verified, that the bloud of the Martyrs is the seed of the Church, which so increased in the parts of Bohemia, that Pope Martin fearing all would be mard (Zisca the scourge of the Papacy then in Armes to defend them) sent for aid out of England, to represse the Lollards (as he termed them) and publisht his Buls against those Hussites, with as terrible roarings as vsually were his Croysadoes against the Turkes.

(37) His Legate for these holy warres hee made Henry Beaufort, the rich Cardinall of Winchester, who with foure thousand English, assisted with a fubstitie of the Clergies Grant, did there very valiantly for certaine months together, untill he was re-called by the Pope: wherein Country Zisca (though ever a victor) lost both his eyes, and being blind, led forth his army with such terror to his foes, as his name became fearefull, and oft times was sufficient to attaine victory without any stroke, insomuch as he commanded his owne skinne to bee flead off after his death, and to be made the head of their Drum, affirming that the very sound thereof would drive the enemy out of the field. But from these Church-matters and Prelates proceedings, let us returne from whence wee have stept, and continue the affaires of our famous King Henry, having now set footing in France.

(38) His followers and fellowes in these new begun wars were his two brethren the Dukes of Clarence, and Glocester, as also his Vncles the Duke of Yorke, and Earle of Dorset, accompanied with the Earles of Kent, Cornwall, and Huntington, besides a most noble fellowship of the other Lords, Barons and men at armes: with these from Kideaux hee marched towards Harflew, affecting that Towne the first, being a port commodiously seated upon the mouth of the River Seyne, and a safe entrance unto his intended Conquest, aswell for the landing of his men, as to hinder the passage unto Roane and Paris, both which received trassique by the same River.

(39) The Towne being seated betwixt two hils, that next the Sea the King tooke, at the foot whereof, he caused a deepe trench to be cast, bringing in water to impeach the bottome, and raising the rampier to a great thicknes, whereon he erected many sconces of earth, like unto Castles, set thicke together: for betwixt them there was not above a cubite wide, for the Souldiers to sally as occasion served: the trench thus finished, from the rocke to the Sea, his horses, munition, and victuals all brought a shore, with his whole army, the King marched up the hill, and from the height presented himselfe before Harflew. His brother Clarence hee sent with certaine Regiments of horse and foot, to lodge upon the other hill, which before hee could approach, (by reason of the nature of the ground and way) he was forced to march fully nine miles: which hill attained, hee commanded his ships to cast anchor as neere the Towne as with safety they might, whereby the place became besieged both by land and Sea; then mounted he his Artillery, began his mines, brought his workes close to the Counter-scarfe of the ditch, prepared faggots to fill it, and presently wanne the base Towne.

Le Sieur de Gaucourt de France.

(40) Within the Towne it selfe Mounsieur Gracourt was Generall, accompanyed with Gwylony de Stontevile, Chastellaine de Beauvais, Lionet de Bricquemount, and others, to the number of an hundred Knights and Squires, who with the Townesmen issued out of the Bastile, upon that quarter where Huntington and Cornwall lay, by whom with losse on either side, they were beaten backe, the gates fired, some breaches made, and fire workes throwne into the streetes, to no little annoyance of the besieged; but nothing dismayed them more, then did the Mines made under the wals: against which, though they within countermined, and came to fight hand to hand with the besiegers, yet they saw it little prevailed, the wals being ready to fall, and such batteries therein already made, as they well perceived King Henry was resolved to carry the towne by assault: whereupon Mounsieur de Gracourt fore-seeing the eminent danger, demanded a Parley, promising to render the Towne if it were not relieved by a certaine day assigned.

(42) Harflew thus surrendred in so short a siege continuance, the King sent Thomas Earle of Dorset with sufficient troupes to possesse the Gates, who then erected the Kings Standard, and S. Georges Banner upon the principall Ports, and assured the Towne with guards competent. Moreover, he sent the said Mounsieur de Gracourt, and with him Gwyen King at Armes unto the Dolphin to let him know, that hee would stay eight dayes in Harflew, to expect his comming, where they might treat of an accord, whereunto himselfe was well inclined, if hee were not obstinate, for his purpose was not to demand more then his right, and if they could not accord, for the sparing of Christian bloud, hee was pleased to decide the quarrell by single combate betweene them two.

dangers, he made proclamation, that whosoever of his English Artificers would transport themselves unto Harflew, houses there should be given to them and their heires; whereby in short time the Towne was re-peopled with English Artisans. Here King Henry abode the space of twelve or fifteene daies, expecting an answer of his message sent to the Dolphin; but the time prefixed (and more dayes expired) hee commanded his souldiers to furnish themselves with victuals for eight dayes; leaving his Vncle Thomas, Beaufort Earle of Dorset, Governour of Harflew, himselfe with two thousand horse, and thirteene thousand foot, marched towards Callis, through the Counties of Caux and Eu.

(44) The French Court notwithstanding it swarmed with factions (whilest under a weake and braine-sicke King the great-ones fought to make themselves greater, and the common enemy endangering all) King Charles, the Dolphin, his brother of Pontbieu, the King of Sicil, the Dukes of Berry and of Britaine, with the whole force of France assembled at Roan, and in Councell concluded, that the English should be fought with, before they got Callis, and forthwith decreed to endammage King Henry on his way, which presently was attempted. For besides their continuall skirmishes upon his marching Army, they brake down the Bridges, plashed the woods, intrenched the wayes, strucke stakes in the Foords, and in places of advantage, layd store of souldiers to and in places of advantage, and convayed all victuals our of the Countries, through which hee should goe, whereby they well hoped, as a Decree taken in the toyle, so both he and his hoast should have beene infnared, who now was approached to Virron, with purpose to have passed the river Soame at Blanchetague: but there the French had fortified against him, so as hee well saw that was not the way; and thereupon changing his Counsell, hee marched by Wormes, and lodged at Baillew, with an intent to have passed the river at Port le Remy, but that also guarded, he kept along the River to Hargest, the French Army marching upon the other banke, under the leading of Charles de Albert Constable of France.

(46) The day they spent with great toile and long march, the night were cold and wet, and no where good lodging, alwaies standing upon their own guard, and the French alwayes swarming about them without intermission. These things moved Henry, as the French. Writers report, to proffer the restitution of Harflew, with other holds in Normandy, and to make satisfaction for the harmes done in France, to suffer him free passage unto his Towne of Callis. But certaine it is, that great reliefe hee got by the justice and piety that he used in those parts: for albeit he was in the middest of his enemies, and his souldiers pinched with penury and want, yet made hee Proclamation upon paine of death, that none of his Army should rob any Church: wherein a souldier offending, hee caused restitution to be made, and commanded the fealer to be put to death: the fame of which piety moved the people (albeit they were forbid by the French King) plentifull to supply the fainting English with their owne provisions.

True it is, that Henrie was not desirous of fight, his impediments being such as we have said, and therefore returned answere, that he meant to keepe on his march unto Callis, and would not seeke them: but if they would disturbe him, he committed the issue thereof to God, assuring himselfe that it would be to their owne great danger and perill, and so passing forward to Forceuil, to Boniers-Lesfaillon, to Bangy upon Thursday the 24. of October, he came to Azincourt, where the French in a field of advantage (purposely chosen) in the County of S. Paul (and neere unto Azincourt) had pitched their Banner-royall, with an infinite hoast, whereof the Constable of France had the conduct.

Whereunto the Constable and Marshall were willing, but the other young Princes despising the small number of their adversaries, refused all conditions of peace, and were not onely negligent in the duties of Commanders, but with an assurance of victory divided the prey, dispofed of prisoners, and prepared a Chariot to carry the captive King in triumph; commanding the Cities and Townes adjoyning to ring their Bels, and to render thankes unto God, who had delivered their enemies into such place of advantage, as an assured victory must presently follow: and so confident were they thereof, that they sent to King Henry to know what ransome he would give. The English discerned what was done in the French army. Paulus Æmil.

(51) The morning approached, the French tooke the field, thronging forward, who should be first to this most easie and certaine victory (as they tooke it) their greatest strength consisting in horse. Against whose violence King Henry commanded two hundred strong Bow-men to lodge in a low meadow, where a deepe ditch full of water might secure them from the Horse, and the bushes cover them from sight. These having stakes prepared and shod with Iron at both ends, were appoynted to sticke them slope-wise in the ground, yet so that they might bee removed as occasion was ministred, to guard them from the danger of the horse: which policy accomplished, King Henry (whose hope was in God, and the goodnes of his cause) about ten of the clocke ranged his English against the French then in field: hee disposed his hoast into three battels, placing his Bow-men on both sides of the maine.

(52) The vantgard, consisting of Archers, was led by the Lord Edward (his cosen) the Duke of Yorke, and with him the Lords Beaumont, Willoughby, and Fanhope. In the maine Battell all in compleate and bright shining armour, the King rode himselfe, his shield quartered with the royal atchievements of England and France; upon his helmet he wore a Coronet, the circle whereof glittered with Pearle, and stones of an unestimable price: his horse of a fierce courage carreerd as hee went, the bridle and furniture of Goldsmiths worke, and the Caparisons most richly embroidered with the victorious Ensignes of the English Monarchy: Before him in gold and glorious colours the Royal Standard was borne, and many other banners in warlike order waved with the winde.

(53) The French had framed their Battels into two sharpe fronts, as intending with their poynts to have runne through the English squadrons; altogether relying upon their horsemen, and shining in bravery with an incredible excesse. And surely the beauty and honourable horrour of both the Armies, no heart can judge of, unlesse the eye had seene it, the Banners, Ensignes, and Penons, streaming in the aire, the glistering of armours, the variety of colours, the motion of Plumes, the Forrests of Lances, and the thickets of shorter weapons, made so great and goodly a shew; but the silent expectation of the bloudy blast was as the bullet ramd into the Canon, whose roaring voice is not so soone heard, as the stroake of death felt by the aimed-at marke.

Titus Livius.

(54) The Battels thus raunged, a while stood still, and faced each other even in the face: The French (whether upon errour, like to that of Pompeis at the battel of Pharsalia, where Cæsar was victorious, or to draw the English farther from their advantage of ground, is altogether unknowne) but certaine it is, that King Henry was resolved to open his way for Calis over the enemies bosome, or else to dye: and thereupon with a cheerefull countenance and words full of courage, he comforted his followers, and said. "My most faithfull Companions and worthy soul-"diers, we now goe into the field of honour, and to "the worke of man-hood, which your great valours "so long have expected and prayed for; loe the day "is now come, and your worke the noblest in the "world, poure forth therefore your utmost forces, "that ages may know what the Lance, the Axe, the "Sword and the Bow can doe in the hand of the va-"liant: Whosoever therefore desires riches, honour, "and rewards here he shall finde them. Nimirum hoc "medio posuit Deus omnia Campo. When he had thus said, his army fell prostrate on the ground, and committed themselves unto God, every man taking into his mouth a peece of earth, in remembrance of his owne mortality, (being thereof made) or of the holy Communion, whereof he was incorporated to be a partaker; and so resolved, arising, the King with cheerefull countenance commanded his Standard to advance forward, saying, because our injurious enemies doe attempt to shut up our way, let us upon them in the name of the most glorious Trinity, and in the best houre of the whole yeare.

(55) The ranging of the Battell King Henry committed to an old experienced Knight called Sir Thomas Erpingham: who with a warder in his hand led the way, which when he saw time, he threw up into the aire, whereat the whole army gave a great shout; which done, he alighted from his horse, and came to the King, who was in his place on foot. The French beholding this Offer, kept still their owne standing, which the English perceiving, made forward and came on, giving another shoute, when immediately the Archers, layd in the meadow, darkened the aire with a showre of sharpe arrowes, most fearefull to the sight, but more deadly to be felt; and withall, the English charged their Battell with an admirable courage; the most of them for nimblenesse being but halfe cloathed, without hat, and bare-legged. And such was their courage notwithstanding their wants, at he that ere-while could scarcely bend his Bow, is able now to draw his yard-long-arrow to the very head, whose roaving marke was the flancke of the French, so rightly aimed at, and so strongly stucke on, that their sides were altogether larded with arrowes, whereby the vantgard was instantly distrest, and disordered into such a confused presse, as they were not able to use their weapons at any advantage. Their wings likewise assayd to charge the English; but Mounsieur de Lignie in the one not well seconded by his troopes was forced backe; and Guillaum de Surrerer charging home, in the other, was slaine. The Battallions now broken, for safety fled to the Maine, where they bred both feare and confusion by the unrulinesse of their wounded horses, so galled with arrowes as they could not be governed.

The tempests of arrowes stil whissling in the aire sparkled fire in their fals from the helmets of the French, and with their steeled heads, rang many thousands their knels that dolefull day, who like to corne cut downe with the sithe, fel by whole plumps in that fatall field; the English still following the advantage: against whom Anthony Duke of Brabant, hoping by his example to encourage others (followed with a few) turned head, and brake into the English Battell, wherein manfully fighting he was slaine.

(58) The French Reregard surprised with feare, at the disaster of the Vantgard, & the maine battell, fled, not striking one stroke (except some principall Leaders, and they not many) the English horsemen fetched a compasse, and wheeled about upon their backes, which no sooner was perceived, but that the taxe of fighting was ended, and the worke of killing began; as by the words of Walsingham doth manifestly appeare: The way (saith he) is at length made by fine force; the French did not so much give place, as fall dead to the earth: for when they saw those beaten indeed under-foot, whom they reputed invincible, their minds forthwith grew amazed, and such an icie feare slid through their marrow, that they stood still like senselesse Images, while our men wrested weapons out of their hands, and slew them therewith as beasts. Slaughter then had lost the stay of it selfe, and fight did follow no longer, but all the warre was made at throats, which (as it were) offered themselves to be cut, neither can the English kill so many of the enemies, as may be killed. Thus therefore the whole glory of the French name is almost perished by the hands of those few, whom immediately before they held in most extreame contempt. But the sword now made weary and drunke with bloud, all danger past, and humanity retired, prisoners were taken, and lives spared, which hitherto was neglected, left mercy might have proved the destruction of themselves.

(59) Whilst the King was thus busied, and the successe of the battell in dispute, his carriages (but slenderly guarded) by the French were assailed, and all made spoile of that was to be had. The Captaines of this cowardly enterprize were Robinet de Bourneville, Rifflant de Clamasse, and Ifambert de Azincourt, with six hundred Peasants, who had turned their faces at the first brunt of battell, as men of better practise to pilfer, then to purchase by manhood the spoyles of the field. Where among other things they found a rich Crowne and Sword, which they bare away in triumph-wise, faining that K. Henry was taken, and as a prisoner followed their troupes, the sight of certain English prisoners, by them taken and led away, confirming the report more strongly in the beholders conceit. But King Henry breathlesse, and in heat of bloud, seeing certaine new troupes of the King of Sicile appeare in the field, & the same strong enough to encounter with his weary men, fearing (as he had cause) that the Bourbon Batallian upon sight of fresh succours, would gather into a body, and againe make head, considering with all how his men were overcharged with multitude of prisoners, who in number surmounted their Conquerours: that the charge would be double at once to guard and to fight, and that the prisoners would be ready upon every advantage to take armes, and free themselves from their takers: these and other necessities constraining, King Henry, contrary to his wonted generous nature, gave present commandement that every man should kill his prisoner, which was immediately performed, certaine principall men excepted. Which done, and falling againe in order, he sent his Herauldes unto these troupes assembled, commanding them forthwith to come unto battell, or else to depart the field, either of which if they delayed, he threatned to revenge with their deaths, without any redemption or mercy; at which severe sentence, their hearts were so daunted, that with shame and dishonour they departed the field. The base surprisall of the Kings Carriages (the onely cause, as some alleage, of the French prisoners death) was so ill-digested by the French themselves, that the Duke of Burgundy imprisoned the actors thereof, and was minded to put them to death, had not his Sonne the Count of Charolois mediated for them, unto whom they presented King Henries rich Sword, the guards whereof was gold, set with stones of great price.

(60) The day almost spent in spending French bloud, and evening approaching, neere the set of the Sunne, the field cleared, and no enemy seene, the retreat was founded, and all were assembled to give thankes unto God; which done, while his souldiers pillaged the dead, King Henry (sent for Montioy, Herauld at armes in France, and for other Heraulds both English and French: unto whom he said, we have not of our selves made this great slaughter, which the sword in our weake hands hath laid at our feet, but the as one of God for the offences (no doubt) of the French hath done it, whose bloud let now rest upon their owne heads, and we guiltlesse in following our right: and then demanding name of the place, was answered, it was Azincourt then said he, to all posterities following, this Battell shall be called the Battell of Azincourt. Thus dismissing the Heraulds, he returned to Maisoncelles, where he lodged the night before. The spoyle was great, and the prey rich in armours, jewels and apparell, for which by the Countrey Peasants many (left as dead) were stripped starke naked, who afterward crept from the place, but most of them mortally wounded without reliefe, lay in great dolor, and died in the ditches: so certaine is the calamitie of war, and uncertaine the sword till it be quietly sheathed.

To be short, Iehan Tillet saith, that there were ten thousand slaine, and almost as many more taken: and most of their owne Writers account the successe of this battel to be with the slaughter of foure thousand Princes, Nobles, Knights, and Esquires: but the history of Normandy accounted eight thousand to bee slaine of that ranke, whereof an hundred and twenty bare Banners: among whom dyed foure Dukes, nine Earles, one * Archbishop, and tenne thousand

(27) Prisoners of account taken in this field, were Charles the Duke of Orleance, and John Duke of Bourbon, Arthur Earle of Richmond, extreamely wounded and left for dead, as he lay gasping among the slaine, was by the English recovered and reteined their prisoner. Lovis de Bourbon Comt de Vendosme, was there taken Captive, so was Charles Earle of Eu, being carried into England, where hee remained prisoner twenty three yeares. Others of great account were likewise taken & put to ransome, as Edward de Roven, Oliver de la Field, and Iohan Giffart, with these and many more the next day King Henry marched to Calis, leaving the French to search for their wounded, that in ditches & bushes had made their heavy beds: In commiseration whereof, the Counte Charolois extreame pensive for the losse of his Vncles, and other his friends, in charity came to the field, and caused the dead to be buried, the charge whereof hee committed to the Abbot of Rousseauville and the Bailiffe of Ayre, who inclosed a piece of ground with a deepe ditch of two hundred and fifty yards square, fensing it with an hedge of thornes against the Ravenings of Dogs and Wolves. Wherein were interred five thousand and eight hundred Christian carkasses, in regard whereof it was sanctified by the Bishop of Esguines, and made a Church-yard.

(28) The Duke of Britaine with his forces was come to Amiens within two dayes march of Azincourt to aide King Charles, but the French upon a conceived assurance of victory, would not stay his comming: who now hearing of the glorious day obtained by the English, dismissed his troupes, and retired to his owne Countrey, not meaning any more to intermeddle in the warre betweene England and France. Now King Henry upon Saturday the 26 of October, being the next day after battell, tooke his march towards Calis, but in passing the field wherein they had fought, he caused search for all the English, which he caused to be interred according to their estates. But the bodies of his slaine cosen the Duke of Yorke, and of Michael de la Poole Earle of Suffolke, hee tooke away thence, carrying them both into England, and so passing to Guisnes with his prisoners, he entred Calis, whither, those left at Harflew resorted to pay their ransomes to them assigned.

(29) His hoast now refreshed and courage augmented, it was disputable in Counsell, whether the King should returne againe into France, to pursue his enterprize already begun, or els to embarke for England. But the time of yeare spent, the Winter wet, and the field Campes very much subject to fluxes, wherewith many of his souldiers were as yet infected, and more unhealed of their wounds; it was thought fittest to make for England, and the sooner, for that victuals became somewhat scarce in Calis. These things premised, King Henry upon the sixteenth day of November spread sayles for England, and in the passage was met with such stormes, that his French prisoners were in as great feare, as they had beene in danger at the battell at Azincourt: but arrived at Dover, and all dangers past, upon the three and twentie of November in triumph-wise he made his entrance into Loudon, foure hundred Citizens riding before him in red and white hoods, the gates and streets were garnished with Pageants, and the Conduits plenteously powring forth sweet Wines. The Religious men met him with Procession, and foureteene Mitred Bishops attended his approach unto Saint Pauls, where, out of the Censers the sweet Odours filled the Church, and the Quier chanted Anthems cunningly set by note: in all which the honour was ascribed onely unto God, the King so commanding it. And so farre was he from the vaine ostentation of men, that he would not admit his broken Crowne, nor bruised armour to be borne before him in shew, which are the usuall Ensignes of warlike triumphes. The City presented him a thousand pound in gold, two golden Basons worth five hundred pounds more, which were received with all Princely thankes.

(31) The calamities of these times by the stirred schismes of the Church, and these bloody warres among Christian Princes, Sigismund the Emperour a man of great wisedome and integrity, much lamented at the Councell of Constance, and as another Constantine sollicited the three stiffe stirring Popes unto unity, but failing of that purpose, from those farre parts he travelled into France, and thence into England: seeking to make peace betwixt these two Westerne Monarchs, the better to withstand the common knowne enemie of Christendome the Turke. King Charles he sollicited, finding him in words very forward, with many faire shewes to imbrace the motion, whereupon taking with him the Archbishop of Rheims as Ambassadour from the French King, came unto Callis, where he was most honorably entertained by the Earle of Warwicke, Deputy of the Towne, and divers other Lords, sent thither by King Henry to attend him, as also thirty of his tallest ships to waft him to Dover, gallantly rigged and manned with a noble traine. The Duke of Gloucester accompanied with many of the Nobility, was appointed to receive him at Dover, where they attended his comming.

Which rough demand being most mildely answered by Sigismund, he had present accesse, and by them was attended towards London.

(33) This worthy Emperour, King Henrie greatly respected, as well for his owne worthes, and the amity held ever with the house of Beame; as also for that hee had married * Barbara the daughter of the Earle of Zilie the Kings Cosen-Germane removed. His entertainment was Princely, and * charges altogether borne by King Henry, who the more to honor him at Windsore, solemnly enstalled him Knight of the Order of Saint George or Garter, with a most sumptuous feast purposely prepared, at which the Emperour sate in his Collar and Robes; but not foreslowing the cause for which he came, hee instantly urged the peace for France, wherein hee was gently heard by the English King, but upon new displeasures for some losse of men in the Territories of Roane, the motion at that time was dasht, and would not proceed, left (as King Henry alledged) the French should suppose that a small losse had weakened his spirits: yet the Emperour continuing his intercession for peace, had brought it to that passe by his pithy perswasions, as had not the French at that very instant besieged Harflew (both by Sea and Land) it had beene effected.

King Henry hearing of these newes, called home his Ambassadors, which were the Bishop of Norwich, and Sir Thomas Erpingham in commission then at Beauvois, and in conference for a Peace; and the Emperour well perceiving that the French plaid upon advantage, and that King Henry was not of temper to turne edge at their strokes, saw it vaine to prosecute the peace for France further, and therfore fought to enter league with the English himselfe, unto the which King Henry was so willing, as he confirmed the same upon these Articles following.

(37) That neither themselves, their heires nor successours, should be present in Counsell or other place, where either of them, their heires or successors might sustaine dammage in lands, goods, honours, states or persons: and that if any of them should understand of losse or hinderance to be like to fall or happen to the others, they should impeach the same, or if that lay not in their powers, they should advertise the others thereof with all convenient speed. That either of them, their heires and successours should advance the others honour and commodity without any fraud or deceit. That neither of them, nor their heires or successours should permit their Subjects to leavy warres against the others. That it should be lawfull and free for each of their Subjects to passe into the others Countrey, and there to remaine and make Merchandise either by Sea or Land, paying the Customes, Gables, and duties due and accustomed according to the Lawes and Ordinances of the places, and Countries where they should traffique. That neither of the faide Princes, nor their heires, nor successours should receive any rebell, banished man, or traitour of the others willingly, but should cause every such person to avoyde out of their Countries, Realmes, Dominions, and Iurisdictions. That neyther of the said Princes, their Heires nor Successors, should begin any other warres against any other person, other then such as they had warres with at that present, without the consent of the other his Confederate, except in defence of themselves, their Countries and subjects, in case of invasion made upon them. That it should be lawfull for the King of England to prosecute his warres against France for the recovery of his right, as should seeme to him expedient, and for the Emperor, for the recovery of any part of his right reteined by the French. Lastly, that either of them should assist other in recovery and Conquest of their rights, lands, and dominions, with-held and kept from them, by him that calleth himselfe King of France, and others, the Princes and Barons of France. These conclusions and agreements bare date the 19. of October, in Anno 1416. In the meane while the French that had felt the hard hand of the English, and seene that Henry had with-drawne his Commissioners for peace, King Charles made a league with the States of Genoua, requiring their ayde against this dangerous enemy, who supplyde him with five hundred Crossebowes, and eight tall ships of warre, and as many Gallies with munition and victuals. These wafting the Seas with many bravadoes, King Henry in person meant to have met with himselfe, but the Emperour diswading his purpose, the charge of that Enterprise was committed to Iohn Duke of Bedford, accompanied with the Earles of March, Marshall, Oxford, Warwicke, Huntington, Arundell, Devonshire, and Salisbury; these falling upon the Viscount de Narbon, a fierce encounter was begun, and long fought, till at length the victory fell to the English, so that the French Navy was most of them battered, suncke and taken; amongst others, three great carricks of the Genoaes were sent to England, with whom the bastard of Burbon was brought away Prisoner; and the Viscount de Narbon, Le Sire de Montaine, and Le Sire de Berrar chased into Britaine. This victory obtained, the Duke past forward to the towne of Harflew, and refreshed it with victuals; without any impeachment; for Armagnac the Constable hearing how his Consorts had kept tune on the Seas, thought it not best to set to their note, lest his meane would not be heard, the base of this musicke sounding too deepe, and therefore he put up his pipes, and got him to Paris. This service performed, was so commended by the Emperour, as he openly said, that Realme was happy that had such a King, but the King more happy that had such Subjects, and ever after held Bedford in a most speciall account.

The Emperour applaudeth the felicity of England.

(38) His affaires now finished, and Princely entertainements thankefully received, he prepares for his returne toward Germany, and King Henry to doe him the more honour would needs accompany him to his towne of Calis, whither after their arrivals, the Duke of Burgogne repaired to doe his homage unto the Emperor, which Burgogne some moneths before, had concluded a peace with the Earle of Warwicke in the behalfe of King Henry, for the Countries of Flaunders and Arthois. Henry therefore in hope of a further friendship with him, sent his brother the Duke of Glocester, and the Earle of March unto St. Omers to lye hostages with the Count Charolois, for Burgognes passage and safe returne, with whom he sent Warwicke to conduct him to Callis.

Denis Sauage. Chron. de Flan.

(39) His entertainement was honourable both by the Emperour and King, which as acceptably he received, and unto Sigismund performed his homage, and with Henry renewed the truce for the time of two yeres, both which were so distastive to the French stomackes, that the Emperour is taxed, he came not with an intent to worke the good of France, but rather to augment her miseries by animating Burgundy to bandy against Orleance: and that King Henry was puft with an humor of pride, his affaires so prosperous against a weake King. But this businesse ended, Burgundy returned to Graveling, Henry into England, and the Emperour toward Germany: at whose departure from England towards Calis, being attended by the Duke of Bery, and many other Noblemen; Sigismund the Emperour is said to have taken his leave, with this speech: Farewell, thou happy and blessed Iland, which as thou art in nature Angelicall, so may thou ever rejoyce in glory and victorie, thou true adorer of Iesus: Hanc tibi do laudem quam rectio jure mereris. And from Calis (where all his expences had beene defrayed by King Henry) passed to Durdraughe, Sir Iohn Tiptofe and many other Knights attending him for his better guard: where in larges he gave unto them a thousand crownes in Gold: and to their King sent a Vnicornes horne above five foot long, with many other choyce and precious guifts as pledges of his love and thankfulnesse. During all the time of this Emperours journey, stay, and returne, the Seas for the security of his person and people, were guarded with a Navy of Ships, and three thousand English Souldiers under the the conduct and truft of the Baron of Carew of Devonſhire.

(39) At Callis King Henry had made great proffers unto Burgundy to enter with him into the warres againſt France, promiſing him part of his Conqueſts, and to ſpare and favour all his vaſſals, allyes, and friends, but Burgundy refuſing the offers, remayned his enemy for France, howbeit he ſent Embaſſadors into England to treat a continuance of the Truce, which was granted to his Commiſſioners to indure from the next Michaels-tide unto Eaſter euſuing, which was confirmed at Portcheſter the 23. of July and yeare of Chriſt 1417. For the ſigning whereof King Henry ſent the Keeper of his Privy Seale to Amiens, where the Duke of Burgundy delivered the ſame ſigned, which began in this ſort: Iohannes Dux Burg. Comes Flandriæ, Arthuſius & Burgundiæ, Palatinus, Dominus de Salinia & Muchlinia, univerſis preſents literas inſpicien: ſalutem, &c. datum in villa Ambianenſis 17. die Menſis Aug. 1417. This notwithſtanding, the ſaid Duke reverted, and in November following made a league (whereunto he was ſworne) with the King and Daulphin of France againſt England, which his doings King Henrie tooke nothing well. But his proceeding proſpering in France he called a Parliament at London, where the Lord Chancellor, Henry Beaufort, Biſhop of Wincheſter and Cardinall, in the Kings behalfe made an eloquent Oration, declaring the great deſire his Maſter had to make Peace with the French, which the King notwithſtanding reſiſted, and againſt the law of Armes denied, upon ranſome, to render his priſoners taken at Azincourt, ſo that the peace which was to be expected muſt be with the ſword, concluding with this ſaying; Let us make warre that we may have peace, becauſe the end of war is peace. Whereunto the whole body conſented, and granted to the King a Subſidie and a Tenth, which was graciouſly accepted, but was farre too ſhort to defray the great Charge, ſo that he was forced to pawne his Crowne unto the ſaid Biſhop Beaufort his Vncle, for a great ſum of money, as he did certaine Iewels to the Lord Major of London for ten thouſand Markes.

(40) Money thus got and the Seas made ſafe, King Henry purpoſed further to follow his fortunes in France, his advantages many (as the French would enforce) through the weake-braind King, not able to correct the Factions of the Burgundian and Orleance, which troubled all France; and the death of Lewis the Daulphin, whoſe funerall might have beene ſolemnized by the mourners for Azincourt, his death (as was thought) happening immediately upon that diſaſter; and to heape more diſtractions upon the miſerable French, Iohn the Kings ſecond ſonne, and new made Daulphin, ſhortly left both his title and life, who together were entombed at Campeigne. Theſe, ſay the French, were the bane of the State, and the baits that made King Henry to bite; Notwithſtanding we ſhall finde them but curtaines to ſhadow the light, if we looke into the proiect with an indifferent eye, for the Kings weakenes was ſupported by Burgogne Armagnac and other potent eſtates; Burgundy, by Oath, made a mortall enemy againſt King Henry. Orleance in England a priſoner, and without racket in hand could not bandy the ball to marre the French plea: & as touching the deaths of the two Daulphins their raked-up-aſhes kept in the ſpark that after ward was the only light of France, for theſe (though crowned) were not the pillars of ſtrength able to ſuſtaine the great weight of that Empire: The firſt a Prince of little valour, & great toyle, preſuming to know much, and unwilling to learn the leaſt, buſying himſelf with his ſelfe, and by his inſufficiency rather troubled, then managed the eſtate. The other, none of the wiſeſt, and of nature ſo remiſſe, that he was ever ready (as waxe) to take the ſtampe of any impreſſe, but as the proverbe is, Let the looſers have leave to ſpeake, and us to relate our Engliſh-French buſineſſes.

(41) All now in a readineſſe, King Henry, with a puiſſant army, prepared his ſecond expedition into France, his Fleet conſiſting of fifteene hundred ſaile, many Lords and men at armes, the muſter-roll ingroſſed with twenty five thouſand five hundred twentie ſeaven ſouldiers, every fourth being a horſeman, beſides a thouſand Carpenters, Artificers, and Labourers: But before his departure he ordained his brother John Duke of Bedford to be the Protector of England in his abſence, which done, upon the 28. of July he tooke to Seas, the ſailes of his owne ſhip, being of purple ſilke moſt richly embroydered with gold: and the firſt of Auguſt arrived in Normandy, to ſuch terrour of the inhabitants, that they fled further into the maine, leaving the Country bare of men and beſtiall: Inſomuch that twenty five thouſand families of them repaired into Britain, ſo dreadfull was the approach of the Engliſh.

(42) No ſooner King Henries foot had touched the ſhoare, but to the incouragements of his Marſhall followers, he dubbed forty eight Knights, and then ſending to view Harflew, laide his ſiege againſt Conqueſt, the ſtrongeſt Caſtle in Normandy, which he tooke the 16. of Auguſt, and gave both it and the whole demaines belonging, unto his brother Thomas Duke of Clarence: And unto Salisbury the Leader of his ſecond Battell, he gave the Caſtle Aumbelliers, which at the ſame time he had won, as alſo that of Lovers unto the Earle Marſhall, and theſe were the firſt that were inveſted with any revenew in France.

(43) Cane to withſtand the enemy was ſtrongly fortified, well mand, and victualled, ſo that nothing was wanting needfull for defence: yet the King fate downe before it, and his battery not working the expected effect, he atteempted it by mine, and ruinated ſome parts of the Wall: Notwithſtanding the defendants made ſtiffe defence, and manfully put backe the entrance or ſcale. Neverthelesſe Henry ſeeing that they could not long ſubſiſt, unwilling to carry it in fury, which muſt be the deſtruction of the Inhabitants, whom he ſought to ſave, and to make his true ſubjects, ſummoned them by an Herault, and promiſed them mercy; which they in hope of reliefe utterly deſpiſed: hereupon his entry was forced, and great ſlaughter made, till the King ſtayed his ſouldiers furies, and cauſed the Citizens to diſarme themſelves, ſetting a ſtrong guard, aſwell to keep the ſpoilers from pillaging, as the townesmen from all hoſtile attempt; and they that did, were either put to death or ranſome, which was freely diſtributed among his Captaines and ſouldiers, by which regular action King Henry got him the eſtimation of a great Captaine, and an upright Prince.

(44) But whether by the working of the French, or by inſtigation of the diſcontented reformaliſts (as Walſingham hath it) The Scots would worke wonders in reviving a dead King Richard, that ſhould indammage the Lancaſtrians cauſe, and diſpoſſeſſe King Henry of his Crowne: who now abſent and forward of Conqueſt in France, at home was endangered by theſe his emulating neighbours, and his confines in hoſtile manner entred upon, by the Duke of Albany, together with the Earle Douglas the Scottiſh Leaders: Theſe bringing with them their ſtage-like King Richard, laid ſtrait ſiege againſt Roxborough, and Barwicke, where all affaires were attempted, by undermining the wals, and turrets, all extremities uſed and nothing left unattempted, that might annoy, either by Sea or by Land.

(45) But Beaufort Duke of Exceſter being at Bridlington in doing his devotions, had preſent newes of this preſent neceſſitie, and therefore ſcarſe come to the end of his Orizons, he layd by his Beads and tooke to his Armour, which was not ruſty with lying, ſo lately put off; neither did Iohn Duke of Bedford the Protector, fore-ſlow any time, but with ſixe thouſand ſtrong, repayred into the North, where, with the Earles of Weſtmorland and Northumberland, his power was increaſed, unto whom alſo the Archbiſhop of Yorke Henry Bewet ſided, with age ſo decrepit, pit, that he was borne in the Field in his Chaire, the fame of whoſe comming, and the feare of their worthy Generals, ſo daunted the Scots, that leaving their ladders and other engines of warre, in the night they broke up their ſiege, and well was he that could firſt ateaine Scotland.

(46) The Kings affaires thus effected in the North, the Clergies eye-ſore was alſo ſomewhat eaſed by the apprehenſion of Sir John Ouldcaſtle their diſturber in the South; who not contented to ſet the God of Rome at nought, but likewiſe defaced the faces of his Saints, trimly limmed in their Letanies and other like maſſe-bookes; a matter indeed of ſuch moment, that the Abbot of Saint Albanes (in whoſe precinct they were taken) ſent theſe poore miſuſed and ſcratched-faced pictures, to complaine of their injuries unto the King, but his peace not broken, (for no bloud was drawne) he remitted the offence and puniſhment thereof unto Chicheley Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who ſent them to Pauls-Croſſe to ſhew their Countenances unto the people, the Preacher that day being their mouth, inſinuating the offence to bee done unto the triumphant Saints in heaven.

(47) A Parliament aſſembled by the Regents authoritie for the ſupply of money to maintaine the warres in France; a matter of as great importance was therein handled, and that was the apprehenſion and judgement of the Lord Cobham, with a conſideration of reward for his taker, the Lord Powyſſe in Wales, from whence ſore wounded he was brought to Weſtminſter before the Lords, and having heard his convictions, would not thereunto anſwere in his excuſe, upon which record & proceſſe, it was adjudged that he ſhould be taken as a Traitor to the King and the Realme, that he ſhould be carried to the Tower of London, and from thence drawne through the ſtreets unto St. Giles-fields, and there to be hanged, and burned hanging, which accordingly was done. That N. D. author of the three Converſions, hath made Ouldcaſtle Ruffian, a Robber, and a Rebell, and his authority taken from the Stage-players, is more befitting the pen of his ſlanderous report, then the credit of the judicious, being onely grounded from this Papiſt and his Poet, of like conſcience for lies, the one ever fayning, and the other ever falſifying the truth: that Copus hath made the Lord Cobham a Traitour: and Stow, from Otterborn, alledgeth indentures drawn betwixt him and the Scots, to bring in a counterfeit Richard, and to invade the Land with forraine power, that he acknowledged no King but the ſame counterfeit in Scotland, and made himſelfe a falſe Chriſt in riſing againe the third day (as Walſingham will have it) I am not ignorant: but his attainture of Treaſons, I leave it to the anſwere of Maſter Fox, who largely handled it: and for his combination with the Scots, unto the letter of King Henries owne hand, who having intelligence of the Scots intent, and the meanes by which they meane to worke, ſignifieth unto his brother and Vncle in theſe words, as from the Originall is taken.

Part of a Letter written with King Henry the fift his owne hand to the Duke of Exceſter.

*Furthermore, I will that yee commune with my * brother, with the * Chancellour, with my Coſen of Northumberland, and my Coſen of Weſtmorland, and that yee ſet a good Order and Ordinance for my North-Marches, and eſpecially for the Duke of Orleance, and for all the Remnant of my Priſoners of France. And alſo for the King of Scotland, for as I am ſecretly informed by a man of right notable eſtate in this Land, that there hath beene a man of the Duke of Orleance in Scotland, and accorded with the Duke of Albany that this next ſummer he ſhall bring in the manuel of Scotland to ſtarre what hee may. Alſo that there ſhould bee founden wayes to the having away ſpecially of the Duke of Orleance; and alſo of the Knights, as well as of the remnant of my foreſaid Priſoners, that GOD defend. Wherefore I will that the Duke of Orleance bee kept ſtill within the Caſtle of Pomfret, without going to Roberts place, or to any other diſport, for it is better hee lacke his diſport, then we were deceived; of all the Remnant doth as he thinketh.*

(48) Wherein we ſee the Complot, but heare not a word that it ſhould be of Cobhams compoſing. But as I affect not to juſtifie the wicked, nor to make crooked things ſtraite, ſo am I farre from diſcrediting authorities; onely the eye of thoſe times looking through the thicke foggy Cloudes, made the Sunne (which is bright in it ſelfe) to ſeeme in their ſights all bloudy and darke.

(49) The like troubles (though not for the like cauſe) happened unto Queene Ioane in the Kings abſence, and time of Bedfords Regency, whoſe offence was Capitall, if the accuſation were true; that ſhee ſhould by ſorcery ſeeke the death of the King; ſhee therefore was committed to ſafe keeping in the Caſtle of Leedes in Kent, and from thence to Pemſey, attended only with nine of her ſervants: her Confeſſor, Frier Randolph a Doctor of divinity, was likewiſe apprehended as her Counſellour and worker in this diveliliſh art, for which he was committed to the Tower, where falling at words with the Parſon of Saint Peters (the Church of that place) he was wounded to death; and Queene Ioane thereupon, preſently delivered.

(50) King Henry proceeding in his Conqueſt of Normandie, about Hollantide, laid ſiege to the ſtrong Towne and Caſtle of Fallais, continuing the ſame unto the twentieth of December, when the defendants not able longer to reſiſt, demanded and had Parley, with whom Thomas Earle of Salisbury, Henry Lord Fitz-hugh, Sir Iohn Cornwall, and Sir William Harrington Knights, were by the King appointed Commiſſioners, who after ſome conference, laſtly accorded upon theſe conditions. 1. That if the King of France, the Dolphin, or Conſtable, did not by force raiſe the ſiege before the ſecond of Ianuary enſuing, that the Towne ſhould be rendred to Henry. 2. That all the ſtrangers that were not properly Inhabitants of Fallais, & had formerly fought againſt King Henry in any place, beſieged and taken within Normandie, ſhould be left to his mercy. 3. That all Engliſh Priſoners which were in the Towne ſhould be ſet at liberty, ranſome free and acquitted of their Oathes made unto them whoſe priſoners they were. 4. That all natives of England, Wales, or Ireland, that had ſerved againſt the King, ſhould be left to his Iuſtice. 5. That neither Captaine, Burgeſſe, nor Townesman of Fallais ſhould give any reliefe to the Caſtle, or victuall, or munition, during the Truce accorded. 6. That no perſon within Fallais ſhould receive the perſons or goods of any within the Caſtle, whereby they or their goods might be protected. 7. That the Captaines and ſouldiers ſhould receive no prejudice in their Horſes, Armes, or Goods; great Artillery, Shot, Powder and Croſſe-bowes excepted: but the ſtrangers formerly ſpoken of in the ſecond Article were exempted from that favour. 8. That the Artillery, Powder, Shot, and Croſſebowes afore-mentioned, ſhould not, during the truce, be embezelled, wilfully broken, or made away. 9. That during the Truce, the ruines made ſhould not be repaired, and no new workes of defence erected. 10. That no oppreſſion bee uſed by the ſaid ſouldier upon the Burgeſſe, and if any were found faulty, and not preſently baniſhed for the ſame, they ſhould loſe the benefit which otherwiſe they ſhould have by the accord. 11. That no Captaine, Souldier, or Townesman ſhould under-hand convey away any priſoner, Ornaments, Iewels, or Church-Reliques, either belonging to Fallais, or to any other Church or Religious Houſe, that were brought thither for ſafetie. 12. That no goods ſhould be purloined or carried out of the Towne during the treaty. 13. That none of the Captaines nor Souldiers, nor any Burgeſſe ſhould forſake the Towne, untill the ſecond second of Ianuary next: and his Majestie of his grace and mercy, was pleased that all such as would remain in Fallais, should remaine there in safety both in body and goods, so as they would be true Subjects unto him. 14. That none of the defendants of the Castle should be received into the Towne, nor their goods secretly kept by the Inhabitants under any pretence or colour whatsoever. 15. That during the Treaty, no assault or offence should be offered by the Kings Army to the Towne, or to the Inhabitants, so as they doe not aide, assist, or relieve, the defendants in the Castles. 16. That for the true performance of the Articles, twelve Knights and Squires should be delivered hostage to the King, and to be set at liberty when the covenants above mentioned were fulfilled. These things concluded and subscribed with their names and seales, the 20 of December; upon the second of Ianuary no succours appearing, the towne of Fallais was accordingly delivered, but the Castle standing obstinate, the King was as diligent, til the defendants failing in their spirits, the first day of February demanded a Parley. Whereunto Henry consented, making Clarence his brother his sole Commissioner. The Articles accorded for the most part were as the former, whereto were added these which ensue.

(51) That upon the 16. of the said moneth of Februry, if the King in person, the Dolphin his sonne, or the Earle of Armignac Constable of France, did not with force raise the siege, then Sir Oliver de Mauny Knight, governour of the said Castle, should render the same unto King Henry. 2. That the said Governour and all other within the Castell should at the day assigned, submit themselves to the King, and remaine his prisoners, trusting to his Majesties royall promise not to receive offence either in life or goods: (Geoffrey Chasteaux only excepted) who was left simply to the Kings mercy. 3. That after the rendring of the said Castle, Sir Oliver de Mauny the Governour, should at his owne charges repaire all the breaches and ruines made in the wals during the siege, and leave it in the same sort as it was before the same was besieged. 4. That for the performance of these Articles, eight Gentlemen should remaine Hostages with the King. 5. That when the Castle was repayred, Sir Oliver Mauny, and all his Company should be set at liberty, and untill then to remaine the Kings prisoners, Geoffrey de Chasteaux above mentioned only excepted. These agreements concluded, the Indenture subscribed, and King Henries seale of Armes thereunto fixed, at the * prefixed day, according to these Articles, the Castle of Fallais was rendred unto him: which done, he divided his army into many parts, under the severall conducts of the Dukes of Clarence and Glouceſter, and the Earle of Warwick: who wan divers Castles, himself the while marching to besiege Roane, where he set downe his siege, and began the assault in a furious manner: the defendants as obstinately bent to hold him out: so that to win the Towne by force, Henry found it very difficult, as well for the strength of Bulwarkes and Ramparts, as for the number of hands within it, to make resistance, and therefore to reduce them by famine, was his onely designe.

(52) For Burgoine, from King Charles, had sent many worthy Captaines, with a thousand selected Souldiers to defend the City, and within it besides were fifteene thousand Citizens wel trained and furnished: and the Towne stored with victuals for tenne moneths continuance; notwithstanding King Henry quartered about the Towne, and for his safety cast up a Trench betwixt the wals and his men: Himselfe lodged upon the East of the City, the Duke of Clarence on the West, and the Duke of Excester on the North: betwixt whom, the Marshall lay quartered, and with whom, joyned the Earle of Ormond, the Lords Harrington, and Talbot. Before the Port of S. Hilary, the Lords Ros, Willoughby, Fitz-Hugh, and Sir William Porter, set downe their Battalions. The Earles of Mortaine, and Salisbury, lodged about the Abbey of Saint Katherines; Sir John Gray about the Chappell-Mount Saint Michael: and Sir Phillip Leech upon the Hill adjoyning. The River Seine was blocked up with three Iron chaines, one of them laid two foot above water, another with the levell, and the third, two foot under water, to impeach all relife into the Citie by Boats; the charge whereof was committed unto Thomas, Baron of Carew, who nothing failed in the trust reposed. On the other side of the River, were encamped the Earles of Warren, and Huntington, the Lords Nevill and Ferrers, and Sir Gilbert Vmfreville, directly before the Gate Port de Pont; and for intercourse the one unto the other, a Bridge was foreed over the said River Seine, sufficient for carriages, as occasions should be minisired.

(53) With the English, sixteene hundred Irish Kernes were enrolled, from the Prior of Kilmainham, able men, but almost naked; their armes, were targets, darts, and swords, their horses little, and bare no saddle, yet very nimble, on which upon every advantage they played with the French, in spoyling the Country, rifeling the houses, and carrying away children, with their baggage, upon their Cowes backes. Thus from Iune unto December, the siege had continued, and now Victuals fayling, and the Towne in distresse, the Rovennois sent foure Gentlemen, and as many Burgesses, unto King Charles, and the Burgoigne (then at Beauvois) to signifie their miseries; fifty thousand already famished with hunger, and twelve thousand starvelings put out of the towne, but not suffered to passe, by the English, dyed by multitudes in the ditches (whose unburied carkasses did infect the Towne with contagious diseases, so that without present relieſe they must be inforced to render.

(54) Ayde was promised and earnestly expected, but in stead of supplies, the Bishop of Beauvois accompanied with others, and the Cardinall of Vrsins, sent from Pope Martin, were dispatched to King Henry, to entreate a peace; for the better accomplishing thereof, they brought with them the picture of the Lady Katherine, according to life, which King Henry well liked, yea, and (as Serres saith, fell in love with: but demaunding a hundred thousand crownes, with the Dutchies of Normandy, Aquitaine, Anjou, and other Seignories, for her dowry, nothing was concluded or done.

(55) And now the Rovennois helpeleſſe of succor, and despairing of peace, resolved to make a brave sally upon the kings quarter: to performe which resolution, ten thousand chosen men, with their Leaders issued out of the Towne: The Vant-gard (which was 2000) being past & in fight, by misfortune the drawbridge with over-weight of men brake, many were drowned, slaine, and hurt: neither was there any more passage that way, to relieve their followers engaged in fight with the English; whereupon they made haste to the other Gates: but before they could come to give ayde, the Vant-gard was broken, and most of them slaine, and taken Prisoners. Vpon this disaster the Souldiers within mutined against Guy de Boutellier their Generall, murmuring that he had contrived the breaking of the bridge.

(56) In these disasters King Charles returning towards Paris, sent the besieged word to make what shift they could for themselves, which unexpected message stroke a sad feare into the miserable defendants hearts, who now weake in men and victuals, knew no way to subsist, and thereupon in Counsell concluded to send unto Henry, which presently they did. For whose entertainment, he caused two Tents to be set vp at Port S. Hillarie. Their Commissioners were two Gentlemen, two Clergy-men, & two Burgesses of the Towne. Commissioners for the King were the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Earle of Warwicke: the demaunds of the Rovennois were many, but their answers were short; that no conditions would be accepted, but simply yeelding to the Kings mercy; whereupon the conference brake up, and these returned into the Towne, bred sundry distractions, (58) Charles, Isabel, Buagogne, and Katherine, the Count S^t. Paul, with a thousand horse garding them thither, came first. King Henry with his brothers of Claurence and Glouceſter, attended upon with a thousand hose, held the appointment; and now met, the two Kings embraced each other; Henry kiſſed Isabel and Katherine, who indeed became a precious pearle in his eye: Burgogne a little bending his knee, did his reverence to Henry, who tooke him in his armes: and the two Nations, though mortall enemies, demeaned themselves so civilly, as no cause of quarrell was offered on either side, much conference passed, but nothing concluded; Henries demands seeming to the French to be so unreasonable. The Treaty thus dissolved, and all ready to depart, King Henry not well pleased, spake thus unto Burgogne, "Cosen, I may not well digest this refusall, but bee you "assured, that either I will have your Kinges daugh- "ter, and all my demaunds, or else I will banish both "you and them out of France, You speake your pleasure, "said the Duke, but before you shall thrust the King, "them and me, out of the Realme, you will be weary of "the enterprize.

(59) The Treaty thus broke, and danger nothing leſſe, the Burgundian altogether French, and in heart no friend to the English, reconciled himselfe unto the Dolphin, which deed was soon after the cause of his owne death; and Henry displeased with this combination, quickened his thoughts (full of revenge) to prosecute the warre more sharply then heretofore: the first enterprize he made, was upon Ponthois, unto which Towne the last day of July hee sent three thousand foote, which before the breake of day, and not discovered by the Centinels, set their Ladders to the Wals, mounted up, crying, Saint George, and so opening a Port let in their companions. The Signeur de L'Isle-Adam, Marshall of France, and Governour of the Towne, affrighted at the surprize, fled out at another Port towards Paris, after whose example about tenne thousand inhabitants did the like, so as the English, without resistance, were Masters of the Towne, wherein great riches fell to the Souldiers shares. When King Charles at Paris heard of the losse of Ponthois, in great feare, with his wife, daughter, Burgundy, and many Noble-men, to be further from the fire fo neere at hand, went unto Troyes en-Champagne, leaving Paris under the government of the Count Saint Paul, and Eustach de Laitre Chancellor of France, whilst Henry went forward with his intended enterprizes.

(60) For his brother of Clarence by three weekes siege wanne the Castle Gisors by composition, the Earle of Huntington sacked Preaux, burnt Bretuiell, Clermont, and the Castle of Vendueil, and Henry himselfe besieged the Castle of Guillart, and Rochguien, two of the strongest holds in Normandy; which upon compositions were surrendred, and further prevailed more then the French wished. For the Dolphin, the only man that stood for the publike defence of France, was miserably poore, and for want of pay could make no great shew of followers in the Field, whose chiefe Councellor was the Constable Armagnac an old crafty Foxe, that had ever sided with Orleance against the Burgundian. And now fearing least his owne esteeme should be lessened, or that Burgundy should be the Archite to crosse him the wise Achitophel, or rather indeed thrust forward by destiny to be the scourge and fall of France, he counselled the young Dolphin to seize upon his Mothers money, jewels, and plate, for his further supply to the publike use, (which immediately he did) to advance the estate: but Queene Isabel impatient of these wrongs received, in a womanish splene studies the revenge; wholly neglecting the common cause, which gave the English surer footing in France: but the Dolphin to make good what he had done, leades the King in jealousie that the Queenes designes were dangerous, and altogether set for the alienation of the Crowne, which he, weake man, no sooner heard then believed,

(61) These sparkes of sedition thus blowne in the Court, suspitions increasing, and maligners still working, Queene Isabel, with her sister in law the Dutchesse of Bavier, were sent prisoners to Blois, and from thence to Eours, where they were kept with strait guard, three Gentlemen in Commission to take care of their safeties: till then her favours had gone with Orleance,, and with him had contested ever against Burgogne, but now to quit her imprisonment, she reconciled her selfe unto him, and sollicited his assistance for her deliverance. Burgogne well perceiving how much it would advance his part, to draw the Queene to be of his faction, brake up his siege then laid before Corbeill, and with certaine choyse troupes repaired towards Trours, from whence immediately he sent the Queene word of his comming. She faining devotion to the Abbey of Marmoustier, seated somewhat without the towne, made it known to her Keepers, and they not daring to contradict so great a Princesse, mistrusting no danger, attended her thitherward with a competent guard as they supposed, where Fossieux and Vergie, two speciall men in the Dukes trust, were laid in the Ambush neere unto the Abbey, and having notice the Queene was come to Church, came to salute her, and to signifie that the Burgogne was in person to attend her service. Her Keepers conceiuing their seconds were not far off, as men dismayed, told the Queen of some feare, and that an enemy was neere at hand; whereunto she answered, I am not ignorant who they are, and thereupon commanded to apprehend those her keepers: Her liberty thus got, she became wholly for Burgogne, and by his meanes was made the Regent of France, and her picture stamped upon the Seale of that State.

Eccles 2.19.

(64) Peter Craon a Courtier, his minion, and an inward Favourite of the Duke of Orleance the Kings brother, blabbed out some secrecy of the said Dukes amorous passions upon a wanton Lady, unto his Duchesse Valentine; who but lately married, and so soon deceived of bed, tooke the wrong no lesse then it was, nor letted she (as who can let a women to speake) to tell him his faults on both sides of his head, the Duke could not hide what she too-well knew, and therefore sought to satisfie her with complements of kinde words, but the Curtaine-sermons nightly enlarged upon the same Text, made him many times to lye awake with little devotion (God wot) to heare, and often to rise when he would faine have slept, which caused him lastly to complaine to the King that Craon had, and would, betray their over-much trust. The cause no more, but yet too much against a Prince,* Craon with all disgrace was discharged the Court, who not able to brooke such an open indignity, assaulted Clifton the Constable in a murthering manner, as the only man (as he thought) that wrought his disgrace, and escaping Paris, fled into Britaine, whose Duke was his kinsman, and an enemy to the Constable.

The occasion of King Charles distemper.

Orleance newly married, is in love with another.

 Craon dismisst the Court, for telling the Duchess of the inconstancy of her husband.*

(65) King Charles transported with choller of this double offence, mindes to draw Craon by force out of Britaine to justifie himselfe, whom the Councell had declared guilty of high-Treason, and enemy to the Crowne of France, and resolves in person to enter into Britain: forthwith the expedition formen, and manner of proceeding, made Charles to loose both meate and sleepe, so as the vexation of minde, and distemperature of body, carried apparant shewes in his face: insomuch that the Dukes of Berry and Burgogne mistrusting the worst, counselled that his journey might be staid; his Physitians diswade him in regard of his health, the summer extreame hot, and his bloud as then over-subject to dangerous Fevers. New devises were wrought to stay him at home, giving it forth that Craon was fled Britaine, and in Arragon was imprisoned by the Queene. All this notwithstanding, needes would be forward, so forward is man when his fate will so have it.

King Charles purposeth crosse into Britaine.

(66) He departed Meaux in July: the yeare very hot, his head covered with a great Cap of Scarlet, his body wrapped in a thick Velvet Ierkin, warme enough for winter, his mind distempered with choller, griefe, and despite, and his body wearied with watching, distasture, and want of rest. Thus entring the Forrest of Meaux above noone-tide, a man bare-headed, and bare-legged, attired in a coat of white rugge, stepped suddenly forth from betwixt two trees, and caught hold of his bridle, staid his horse, saying; King ride no further, but returne backe, for thou art betrayed. Charles, whose spirits were otherwise dulled, and his bloud greatly distempered, was amazed at the voyce: which seene, his servants ranne to this man, and with blowes forced him to leave the reines of the horse: and so without any further search the man vanished away.

Notwithstanding his sickenesse continueth his journey.

(67) The troupes of his Nobles, divided because of the dust, King Charles was followed by the Pages of his Chamber, who overcharged with heat and distemperature, tooke no great paines to guide their horse, so that thronging together, he which bore the Kings Lance, let it fall upon him, who had on his head the Kings helmet, and in the falling made a clattering noise. The King much musing upon the words spoken, and now withall hearing this unexpected noyse, was from a pensive melancholy, suddenly strucke into a raging Lunacy, supposing himselfe to be betrayed indeed: and transported with this frensie he drawes his sword, and made towards his Pages with a maine cry: his brother Orleance not knowing the cause, hasted among them, whom Charles likewise pursued, and with the like rage ranne at his Vncle of Burgogne; thus spending himselfe and his horse out of breath, all incompassed the still raging man, tooke from him his sword, dis-robed him for heate, and cheared him with flatterings and faire spoken words; his brother and Vncles falured him, but hee knowes them not, sits mute, sighing and panting, and with troubled amazement moves both body and head, so that all signes of Phrensie appeared in this poore Prince, and the eminent misery that was to fall upon France, very apparant to the in-seeing Statists: but now to proceed.

He is slaine by Tanneguy de Duchel, and others.

Queene Isabel incites her sonne, to revenge it, and moves Charles to disinherite the Dolphin, and adopt King Henry.

Charles in the Forrest, at noonetide saith an appakion.

(68) John Duke of Burgogne ill-digesting the threats that King Henry had given, and joyned in league with the Dolphin, as we have said: was notwithstanding suspected to be a great enemy to the State, and as the Giants are faind, to heape mountaine upon mountaine, for steps of assent to pull Iupiter out of his Throne, so by sinister Counsellours Burgogne was accused of some intended stratageme, as meaning to mount the Chaire where the Dolphin should sit: Charles therefore from Monstreau-Surfault-

The Pope flouts for the Dolphin.

Charles the Dolphin indicteth his remorall.

Surfault-yonne, a Towne in Brie, sent for the Duke unto Troyes in Champagne, to conferre further upon the effecting of their affected accord, as also to imploy their united forces upon the common enemy the English, a third cause likewise was alledged, and that was to have him his meanes for a reconciliation to his mother the Regent, whose wrath, besides him, no man could pacifie.

(69) The Duke mistrusting no Snake in the grasse, thought all things as sure as they are faire in shew: and accompanied with many Noble men, five hundred horse, and two hundred Archers, hee repaired to Monstreau, at whose Gate the Dolphin had built two Barricadoes, and himselfe in armes stood there to receive the Duke. Burgogne approched, kneeled downe upon one knee, and with an honourable reverence saluted him most humbly, the Dolphin neglecting all courtesies to him-ward, charged him with breach of promise, for that the civill warres and his Garrisons were not surceasit and with-drawne, the Dukes sword hanging too-farre backe, and somewhat troubling his kneeling, he put his hand upon the hilt, to put it more forward, whereat Robert de Loire standing by, said, Doe you draw your sword against the Lord Dolphin? at which words, Tanneguy de Castell with a Battle-axe stroke him on the face, and cut off his Chin, and others with other wounds made an end of his life, before he could arise from his knee, or get out his sword.

(70) Queene Isabel, another cruell Medea, and unnaturall mother, having a double offence done her, re-doubled her wrath, and continued her tragicke passions against her sonne the young Dolphin, who not onely incites Philip now the new Duke of Burgogn to revenge his murthered fathers death, but torments her poore husbands spirits, in perswading him to disherite Charles their sonne, and to give in marriage Lady Katherine unto King Henry, who now had set his foote farre into France. Duke Philip for his part ready for revenge, sent the Bishop of Arras with other his Ambassadours unto Roane to King Henry to entreat a peace, and againe not many dayes after their returne sent backe the said Bishop, whose message was so pleasing, that Henry sent the Bishop of Rochester, the Earle of Warwicke and Guien unto Arras, who were as welcome unto Duke Philip; so that betwixt Roane and Arras messengers continually passed till a peace was concluded; which was proclaimed to continue from that day (then about the Feast of the Epiphanie) unto mid-March ensuing, betwixt King Henry, King Charles, and Philip Duke of Burgundy.

(71) King Henry thus farre gone in his affaires for that Crowne, sent his Ambassadors unto the new made Pope Martin the first, such was the fate of Romes Apostolicall fathers in those faire Sun-shine and Golden dayes, that the greatest Monarch was but a vassal to attend upon their stirrop, & their Crowns subject to be spurned off, with their feete. Henrie therefore minding to stop the violence of these narrow Seas, and to make the streame milde betwixt his two Realmes, had now none to let, but onely him that was all in all, and bare an Oare in every mans boat: and therefore from King Charles, Burgogne, and himselfe, his Ambassadour sollicited his fatherly consent, to admit him his most Christian sonne of France, and to give his holy blessing for the confirmation of the marriage, and peace concluded betwixt those two famous Princes. King Henries right to the French Crowne they plainely laide foorth, what calamities France had felt in their resistance, Azincourt, Normandy, and Aquitaine (as they shewed him) were most lamentable witnesses, and the hold that the Lyon had got (at that day) of the Flower de Lnce, was not to be wrested out of his fast grasped pawes. But his dull eare was deafe hereunto, answering that this peace was prejudiciall to the right of Charles the Dolphin, and therefore he denied to confirme it.

(72) But with what quill these wines were vented from the setled Lees for the Dolphin, unlesse it was the golden vice, (a powerfull key indeed to unlocke the Popes silent lips, (I know not; most true it is, the conditions went forward, and the place for the confirmation of covenants was Troyes in Champagne, where King Charles, and his Queene then lay, and whither Burgogne, Guien, the Lord Rosse, and others, attended with five hundred horse, were sent Ambassadors from Henry. In their way they besieged (and after fifteene dayes wan) the Towne of Cressie, razed the wals, and departed upon composition.

Ambassadours from K. Henry.

These comming to Troyes were honourably received, and lovingly concluded on a finall peace, where Lady Katherine was attended as the English Queene, and some left to guard her by King Henries commaund. His Ambassadours returned, and affection enflamed, himselfe attended with the Dukes of Clarence, and *Glouceste*r, his brethren, the Duke of Excester, the Earles of Warwicke, Huntington, Salisbury, Guienne, and many other Nobles, (his Guard consisting of 1600. Launces and Archers) departed from Roane to Pomhoit, to Saint Denis, and from thence into Province, where he was met neere unto Troyes by the Duke of Burgundy, and many other French Lords; and with all Princely attendance was conducted into the Towne. The joy was great with which hee was received, especially of the King, the Queen, and Lady Katherine, whom he found in S*t. Peters* Church expecting his comming, where forthwith he and the Lady was affianced; and falling efrsoones into conference of the conditions of amity, these were consented unto by the French and King Henry.

History of Normandy.

1. That K. Henry should take Lady Katherine to wife.

The Articles agreed upon betwixt the two Kinges.

2. That Charles and Isabel should retaine the name of King and Queene, and should hold all their dignities, rents, and possessions belonging to the Crowne of France, during their naturall lives.

3. That the Lady Katherine should have her Dowry in England, as Queens heretofore were wont to have, that is to say, the summe of forty thousand Sceures, that is, two to a Noble.

Queene Katherines Dowry.

4. That the same summe of forty thousand sceurs yearely, shall be confirmed unto Queene Katherine by our Lawes, according to our usuall rights, at the time of our death.

5. That the said Lady Katherine so over-living us, from the time of our death, shall have for her Dowry in the Kingdome of France, the summe of twenty thousand Francks yearely, out of the Lands, Places, and Lordships, that Blanch sometime wife to Philip Beauvisall held and enjoyed.

The Crown of France intailed to England.

6. That after the death of Charles our said father, the Crowne and Realme of France shall with all rights and appurtenances remaine unto us, and to our heires for evermore.

7. And for as much as our said father is infirme by reason of sicknesse, and may not entend in his own person to dispose of the affaires of the Realme, therefore during the life of our said father, the faculties and exercise of the governement, and disposition of the publique utility of the Realme of France shall be, and abide to us, so that thence forth we may governe the Realme, and admit to our Councell and assistance to the Councell of France, such of the English Nobility as we shall thinke meete.

The government of France affigned to King Henry.

8. That also we of our owne power shall cause the Court of France to be kept and observed in as full authority, and in all manner of places, that now or in time comming, is, or shall be subject to our said father.

9. Also that we to our powers shall defend and helpe all, and every of the Peeres, Nobles, Cities, Townes, Cominalties and singular persons, now or in time to come, subjects to our father, in their rights, Customes, priviledges, freedomes, franchises, belonging, or due unto them, in all manner of places, now or in time comming subject to our father.

10. Also that we shall to our power travell truly and diligently, to see that Iustice be administred in the same Realme of France according to their Lawes, Customes, and Rights of the same Realme, without personall acception; and that we shall keepe and hold the Subiects of the said Realme in tranquility and peace to our power, and shall defend them against all manner of violence and oppression.

11. Also that we to our power shall provide that able and profitable persons shall execute the offices aswell of Iustices and other offices belonging to the governance of the demaines of the realme of France, for the good and peaceable Iustice of the same, and for the administration that shall be committed unto them.

12. Also that we of our power, so soone as it may commodiously be done, shall travaile to put into obedience of our said father, all manner of Cities, Townes, Castles, Places, Countries, and persons within the Realme of France, disobedient and Rebels to our said father, syding with them that be called the Dolphin, or Armagnac.

13. And that wee may the more commodiously and freely exercise and fulfill those things aforesaid, it is accorded, that all worthy Nobles and estates of the same Realme of France, aswell spirituals as temporals, and also the Nobles, Citizens, Burgesses, and Cominalties of France, in obedience at this day to our said father shall make these oathes unto us.

The subiects of France sworn to King Henry.

14. First to us having the faculty, exercise, disposition, and governance of the foresaid common profit at our hests and commandements, these shall meekely and obediently obey in all manner of things concerning the exercise of Government in the same Realme.

15. Also that the worthy, great, and Noble Estates of the said Realme as well Spirituals as Temporals, Citizens, Burgesses, and Cominalties of the same Realme, in all manner of things, well and truely shall keepe, and to their power shall doe to be kept in asmuch as to them belongeth, or to any of them, all those things that be appointed and accorded betweene our foresaid father, our mother, and us.

The veue of the Oath.

10. And that continually from the death, and after the death of our said father Charles, they shall be our true Liege-men, and our heires, and they shall receive and admit us for their Liege, and Soveraigne, and very King of France, and for such to obey us without opposition, contradiction or difficulty, as they be to our father during his life. And never after, this Realme of France shall obey no man as King and Regent of France, but to us, and to our heires. Also they shall not be in Counsell, helpe, or assent, that we loose life or limme, or be taken with evill taking, or that we suffer harme or diminution in person, estate, worship, or goods, but if they know any such thing to be contrived or imagined against us, they shall let it to their powers, and shall doe us to witten thereof, as hastily as they may by themselves, by message, or by letters.

17. That all manner of Conquests that shall bee made by us in France upon the disobedient in the Dutches of Normandy, shall be done to the profit of our said father, and that to our power, all manner of Lands and Lordships, that be in places to be conquered, belonging to persons, obeying to our forefather, which shall sweare to this present accord, shall be restored to the same persons, to whom they belonged.

18. That all manner of persons of the holy Church beneficed in the Dutchie of Normandie, or any other places in the Realme of France, subject to our father, and favouring of the parts of the Dukes of Burgundy, which shall sweare to keepe this present accord, shal peaceably injoy their Benefices of holy Church in the Dutchie of Normandy, or in other places next aforesaid.

19. Likewise that all manner of persons of holy Church, obedient to us, and beneficed in the Realme of France, and places subject to our father, that shall sweare to keepe this present accord, shall enjoy peaceably their Benefices of holy Church, as is aforesaide.

Churches, Vniversities, and Colledges to enjoy their liberties.

20. Also that all manner of Churches, Vniversities and Studies-generall, all Colledges of Students, & other Colledges of holy Church, being in places now, or in time comming, subject to our father, or in the dutchy of Normandy, or other places in the Realm of France subject to us, shall enjoy their rights, possessions, rents, prerogatives, liberties, and franchises, belonging, or due to them in any manner of wise, in the said Realme of France, saving the right of the Crowne of France, and of every other person.

21. Also by Gods helpe, when it happeneth us to come to the Crowne of France, the Dutchy of Normandy, and all other places conquered by us in the said Realme, shall bow under the Commandement, obeysance, and Monarchy of the Crowne of France.

Normandy to be under the Crowne of France.

22. Also that we to our power shall see recompence to be made by our said father, without diminution of the Crowne of France, to persons obeying him, and favouring the party of Burgundy, to whom Lands, Lordships, Rents, and possessions belongeth in the said Dutchie of Normandy, or other places in the Realme of France conquered by us hitherto, given by us in places, lands, gotten, or to bee gotten in the name of our said father upon Rebels and inobedients to him; and if so be that such manner of recompence bee not made to the said persons in the life-time of our said father, we shal make that recompence in such manner and places of goods, when it happeneth by Gods grace to the Crowne of France, and if so be that the Lands, Lordships, Rents, or possessions belonging to such manner of persons in the said Durchie and other places, be not given by us, the same persons shall be referred to them without any delay.

23. And during the life of our father in all places, now, and in time to come, subject to him, letters of common justice, grants of offices, gifts, pardons, remissions, and priviledges, shall be written and proceed under the Name and Seale of our said Father. And forasmuch as some singular case may fall that may not be fore-seene by mans wit, in the which it may be necessary and behovefull, that we write our letters; in such case if any hap, for the good and surety of our father, and for the government that belongeth to us, as is aforesaid, and to avoide perils which otherwise might fall, to the prejudice of our said father, to write our letters, by the which we shall command, charge, and defend, after the nature and quality of the need in our fathers behalfe, and ours, as Regent of France.

Letters, Grants Gifts, &c. signed by King Charles.

24. Also that during our fathers life, we shall not call, nor write us King of France, but shall verily abstaine from that name, so long as our saide Father liveth.

And by King Henry.

25. Also that our said father during his life, shall name, call, and write us in French in this manner. Nostre treschier Filz Henry Roy d'Engleterre heretere de France: and in Latin in this manner, Praclarissimus filius noster, Henricus Rex Anglie, & Hares Francie.

King Henries Stile during King Charles his life.

26. That wee shall put no impositions or exactions to charge the Subjects of our said father, without cause reasonable and necessary. No otherwise then for common good of the Realme of France, and according to the Lawes and Custome provided for the same Realme.

The punishment of the peace-breakers.

27. Also that we shall travell to our power, to effect that by the assent of the three States of the Realmes of England and France, all manner of obstacles may be done away, and this chiefly, that it be ordained and provided, that from the time that wee, or any of our heires come to the Crowne of France, both the Crownes, that is to say, of France and England, perpetually be together in one, and in the same person, that is to say, from our fathers life to us, and from the terme of our life thence forward, in the persons of our heires, that shall be one after another, and and that both Realmes shall be governed from the time that we, or our heires, come to the same, not severally under divers Kings in one time, but under the same person, which for the time shall be King of both Realmes, and our Soveraigne Lord, as is aforesaid, keeping nevertheless in all manner of things, to either of the said Realmes, their rights, liberties, customes, usages and lawes, not making subject in any manner of wise, one of the same Realmes to the rights, lawes or usages of that other.

The union of the Subjects.

28. That thenceforth perpetually shall be still rest, and that in all manner of wise dissentions, hates, rancours, envies, and warres, betweene the same Realmes of France and England, and the people of the same Realmes drawing to accord of the same peace may cease and be broken.

29. That from henceforth for evermore, peace and tranquility, good accord and affection, and stable friendship shall be betwixt the said Realmes and the Subjects of the same, and shall keepe themselves with their Counsels, helpes, and common assistance against all men that inforce them to doe, or to imagine wrongs, harmes, displeasures, or grievances to them or either of them, and that they shall be conversant in marchandizing freely and surely together, paying the Customes due and accustomed, and that all the confederates and allies of our said Father, and the Realme of France, as also our confederates of the Realme of England, shall in eight moneth space from the time of this accord of peace, as it is notified to them, declare by their letters, that they will draw to this accord, and will be comprehended under the treaties and accord of this peace, saving nevertheless their obedience to either of the same Crownes, and to all manner of actions, rights, and revenues, that belong to our said Father and his Subjects, and to us, and our Subjects against all manner of such Allies and Confederates.

Noyance with the dolphin.

30. That our Father, neither our Brother the Duke of Burgundy, shall begin nor make with Charles, calling himselfe the Dolphin of Viennes, any treaty, peace, or accord, but by Counsell and assent of each of us three, or of other the three estates of either the said Realmes above-named.

Aid by King Henry.

31. Also that we, with the assent of our brother of Burgundy, and other of the Nobles of the Realme of France, which ought thereunto to be called, shall ordaine for the Governance of our said Father, surely, lovingly and honestly, after the degree of his royall estate and dignity, in such wise, as shall be to the worship of God, of our said Father, and of the Realm of France.

32. Also that all manner of persons, that shall be our Fathers, to doe him personall service, nor onely in office, but in all other attendances, aswell the Nobles and Gentlemen, as others, shall be such as have beene borne in the Realme of France, or in places belonging to France, good, wise, true, and able to doe him service, and our said Father; shall dwell in places under his obedience, and no where else, wherefore we charge and command our said Liege-subjects, and other being under our obedience, that they keepe, and doe to be kept, in all that belongeth to them, this accord and peace, and after the forme and manner as it is accorded, and that they attempt in no manner wise, any thing that may be prejudiciall, or contrary to the same accord, and peace, upon paine of life and limme, and all that they may forfeit unto us.

33. Also, that we for the things aforesaid, and every one of them, shall give our assent by our letters Patents, sealed with our seale unto our said Father, without all approbation, and confirmation of us, and all other of our bloud-royall, and of the Cities & Townes to us obedient, sealed with our great Seale, shall make or cause to be made letters approbatory, and confirmed of the Peeres of his Realme, & of the Lords, Citizens, and Burgesses of the same under his obedience, all which Articles we have sworne to keepe, upon the holy Evangelists. Yeven at Troyes the 30. of May, Anno 1420. And the same were proclaimed in London the 20. of Iune following; for the Copies of this treaty, the French king sent to every towne in France, as King Henry did likewise into England, there to be published by Proclamation. These Articles were concluded betwixt the two Kings, in the presence of Queene Isabell, the Duke of Burgundy, and the Kings Councell, the Prince of Orange, Seigneur Chastellaux Marshall of France, with many others the prime Nobility, both of England and France, both the Kings with the Queene, taking their solemne oath there, upon the holy Evangelists. as did likewise the Duke of Burgundy, and the rest, Burgundy * being the first man that layd his hand on the booke, and * sware homage to King Henry; who thereupon was stiled and proclaimed Regent of France.

(35) These affaires thus accomplished at Troyes, the Kings, the Queenes, and the rest of the Peeres, in great estate rode unto Paris, where all faire countenances were shewed, and great entertainment given to the English. But the Dolphin and his followers neither feared nor fainted, though the present courses pleased not their palats. Their first Counsell therefore was how to preserve themselves in so eminent danger; to sit still and doe nothing, they knew it was but to increase and advance the successes of the English; and to rise without strength, was to fall into into further misfortunes, having no meanes to hold warre with so potent an Enemy. In this distraction their voice was best hard, that spake most for the safety of the Dolphin, (whose onely life gave breath unto the after-hopes of France) and for the strengthening of those places which might be of most advantage to themselves, and offence to the Enemie. This then past by decree in that Counsell of warre, that the Dolphin should at no time hazard his person in field, and that a levy of Souldiers should be had, to lie in Garrison in places convenient; for Time, which never stands still, they well hoped might yet turne the rice for them, fortune being (said they) as subject to fawne, as to frowne; in which resolution each man tooke to his charge, and all to withstand the doings of Henry.

Denis Sauage in Chron. de Eland.

(56) As these consulted for the state of the French, so in Paris a Parliament of the three estates was assembled, wherein such as were guilty of the death of Burgundy, were iustified, the ditherizing of the Dolphin confirmed, and wars prepared against those Townes which held for him. Against Sens the two Kings with their Queenes, Clarence, and Burgundy, marched, which after 12. dayes was rendered upon composition of life, those excepted as were guilty of the Duke of Burgundies death. Monstreau was the next, which by force was entred, where the body of the Duke of Burgundy, undecently buried by the Dolphinois, was taken up, and by his sonne Philip sent in great pompe to Dijon in his Dutchy, and there honourably interred. The Towne being taken, the Castle held out: unto whose Captaine twenty Captive Gentlemen were sent, whose lives from King Henries mouth (say the French) were sentenced to death, unlesse they could perswade the Castelan to surrender; but those men (say our English, to mollifie that severe doome) were all especiall friends of that Captaine, and such as had given opprobrious words to the Kings Herauld, being sent unto them in the siege of Monstreau. Howsoever, in this extremity they sollicited Guily unto their knees, urging their owne deaths, and his great danger if he held out; but Guily a true Frenchman, and friend to the Dolphin, withstood the assault, and thereupon these Gentlemen Petitioners were presently hanged in the sight of the defendants: so bloudy is Mars to maintaine his owne Lawes, and so eager was Henry of his full conquest of France, whose thirsting sword had heretofore beene somewhat over-lavish in bloud, but never more (perhaps) then in this bloudy act; which I wish might be obliterated from the number of his other glorious actions. Yet at length was that Castle enforced to surrender upon composition of life, excepting the guilties of Burgundies death.

(57) Then was the siege removed to Melun, a Towne of great strength, and made more strong by the valours of her Commanders, who were Signieur Barbason an absolute souldier, Pierre de Bourbon a Prince of the bloud, Preaux, and Burgeois, whose Garrison was seven hundred Dolphinois: and indeed no default in defence could anywise be imputed, but the Cannon opening a breach, the English and Burgundians made an entry into the Bulwarke, and over the River Seine built a Bridge with Boates; so that from either quarter they had passage one to the other without impediments, and encamped themselves for their best advantage; upon whom the enemy nevertheless made divers sallies, with the losse of either parties. King Henry inforced his siege to the utmost, and made a myne underneath the wals, which being perceived, the defendants countermined against him; where the King (too forward) as the very first man entring his myne, and Barbason likewise his within the Towne, met each other at point of sword, where they performed nobly the parts of private souldiers, (nobly indeed, if private souldiers they had been, but Princes should remember they are not such) till lastly they agreed to discover themselves, and first Barbason made knowne his name, then King Henry did his, whereupon the French Lord suddainely getting backe, caused the Barriers to be closed, and Henry returned to his Campe.

(58) This enterprize failing, King Charles himselfe came into the Campe, to induce the defendants to render, at the presence of their naturall Lord; which nevertheless was little respected; for answer was made, that if their King were at liberty, and free from King Henries power, they would doe him the duty of naturall subjects, and yeeld him their charge as their Liege-Lord: but being as he was, they desired to be excused, for to the mortall enemy of France they would not yeeld.

(59) Whilest King Henry lay at the siege of Melun, the Duke of Bauier (who was Palsegrave of Rhyne, Elector) came to King Henry, having married his sister, and thence sent a defiance unto the Dolphin, his kinsman by Queene Isabell his mother; the Prince of Orange likewise came thither unto Henry, but because he required an Oath of him, as a subject of France, he went away displeased, saying, he was a free Prince, and ought neither obedience to England nor France. At which time the Parisians, with more respect of their owne safety, committed their Citie unto King Henries devotion, who deputed his brother Clarence (though Count Saint Paul with his French displeased) Governour thereof, and put Garrisons into the Bastile of S. Anthony, the Loure, and the Hostill de Nesle. During this siege, mandatory * letters were sent by King Charles into Picardy, to put all places that held for him in those quarters into Henries possession, and to take the Oath of their obedience unto him as to the only heire, Successor, Regent, and Governour of France; the execution whereof was committed to the Count of Saint Paul, the Bishops of Therovenne and Arras, the Vidame of Amiens, the Lord of Vendueill, the Governour of Lisle, Pierre Marigny Advocate of the Parliament, and George Ostend the Kings Secretary, beginning thus; Charles par le Grace de Dieu, &c.

(60) The distresse of Melun was wonderfull great, as well upon the siegers, as defendants; the one afflicted, and their troupes fore weakened with mortality, the other oppressed with famine, and other defects incident to a long endured siege. In this state eighteene weekes were spent, and more had been, but that the English were supplied with souldiers out of Picardy, whose colours displayed a farre off put the Towne in hope of relief as sent from the Dolphin, but upon their neerer approach, Melun was rendred by these capitulations. 1. That the Towne and Castle should be delivered to the King. 2. That as well the men of warre, as the Burgesses, should submit themselves to King Henry, to be dealt with as pleased the King. 3. That all such as should be found guiltie of the Duke of Burgundies murther should suffer death. 4. That all the rest of the souldiers should be received to mercy, but to be prisoners untill they put in good caution for their true obedience in after times. 5. That the Natives of France should bee sent home to their owne Countryes. 6. That all the moveable and Armes in the Towne should be carried into the Castle. 7. That all the Prisoners they had taken either before or during the siege, should be enlarged ransome-free, and acquitted of their promises. 8. That for the performance of these Articles, 12. of the principall Captaines, and 6. of the wealthiest Burgesses should deliver themselves in hostage. 9. That all the English and Scots, should be delivered to Henry, and left at his disposition.

These things accorded, an English Garrison was put into Melun, commanded by Pierre Varrols, Pierre de Barbon, Signieur de Preaux, and valiant Barbason, when sixe hundred Prisoners of qualitie, were sent with a strong guard unto Paris. The guilties of Burgundies murther were all of them put to death, amongst whom were two Monkes, and Bertrand de Charmont a Gascoigne, (a man in great favour with King King Henry) for that he at King Henries entry into Melun, had convayed thence one Amenion de Lau, who was prooved guilty of Burgundies death. The Duke of Burgundy himselfe, as also Clarence earnestly laboured with King Henry for Bertrands pardon, but the King, though much grieved, and protesting that he had rather have lost 50000 Nobles, yet was resolved he should die, for example to all such as should dare to offend, upon presumption of their neerenesse and grace with their Princes.

(61) Melun being rendred, and these things thus disposed, the two Kings with their Queenes most honourably attended, returned to Paris, before whose entrance the Citizens and Students met them in most solemne manner, having beautified the City with flags, streamers, and rich hangings, throughout the streets where they should passe. The two Kings rode together under a rich Canopy, Henry upon the left hand, next unto whom followed the Dukes of Clarence and Bedford, and upon their left hand the Duke of Burgundy clad all in blacke, the Princes and Nobles of either Nation mingled together in their degrees, the Clergy with processions, and their venerable reliques, going before them to Nostre dame Church; and the next day the two Queenes entred the City with as great a shew. King Henries Pallace was prepared in the Loure, which was most rich and magnificent, and Charles his Court in the Hostel of S. Paul, being but homely and meane; for (saith Millet) young Henry commanded all, and his brethren exercised supreame authority, whiles olde Charles stood as a Cypher, and the French Nobility had nothing to doe.

(62) During the two Kings abode here, a great Assembly was called as well of the Spiritualty, as of the secular Nobility, in whose presence, in the great Hall of the Hostell, a State for Iustice was prepared, where the two Kings sitting as supreame Iudges, under one Cloath of estate, the Court was furnished with Princes and Officers in most solemne wise. Before whom, Nicholas Rollin Advocate from the Duke of Burgundy, and the Dutchesse his mother, craved audience (& had it granted) unto an invective and long Oration against Charles Viscount Narbone, Tanneguy, Barbason, and others, for the cruell murther of Iohn Duke of Burgundy; and not only that the murtherers might be accordingly executed, but withall, that a Church might be founded and furnished with sacred Ornaments for twelve Canons, sixe Chaplaines, and sixe Clerkes to pray for his soule for ever, every Canon to have yearely two hundred pound Paris money, every Chaplaine one hundred, and every Clerke fifty, to be levied upon the Lands of the Dolphin, and his associates in the murther: that the same foundation should be engraven upon the Porch thereof, and the like inscription set up publikely in the Cities of Paris, Roane, Graunt, Dijon, Saint Iames of Compostella, and Ierusalem. This motion was seconded by a Doctor of Divinity appointed by the Rector of the Vniversity, who concluded with an humble request to the King and those Princes, that justice might be done. Whereunto the Chancellor of France, in the behalfe of King Charles, promised that no endeavour on his part should be lacking; and thereupon caused his sonne to be solemnely called to the Marble-Table, to answere his accusation, by the name of Charles Duke of Tourraine, and Dolphin de Vienne, which done three severall times, and he not appearing, by arrest of the same Court of Parliament, he was banished the Realme, and judged unworthy to succeed in any of the Signiories, as well present, as to come. But the Dolphin appealed from this sentence, to God and his sword, and still was the same, though his fortunes were changeable. Mounsieur de Barbason was vehemently accused to have his hand in the murther, and therefore King Henrie accordingly gave sentence on him to suffer death; but he in open Court defended himselfe, not to bee guilty of the crime, although he confessed to be a true servant to

A Parliament at Paris. Hollinsh.

(63) This execution of Iustice on those Murtherers, was a great, but not the onely act of King Henry at this great Parliament of three Estates of France in Paris. For therein also was the finall accord betwixt the two Kings openly acknowledged by the French King, as made by his free assent, and with advise of all the Councell of France; whereupon it was there also ratified by the generall states of France, and sworne unto particularly upon the holy Evangelists, by all their Nobles and Magistrates, spirituall and secular, who also set their seales to the Instruments thereof, which were sent into England to be kept in the Kings * Exchequer at Westminster. King Henries glory thus ascended to the highest verticall in France, his Court was not onely honoured dayly both with Courtly and military shewes and pastimes, but also was still frequented both with forraine Ambassadours, and domesticke Commissioners, whose directions depended only upon his voluntary assigne, himselfe redressing all things at his pleasure, placing and displacing Officers and Governours, causing also a new Coyne to be made, called a Salute, wherein were the Armes of France, and the Armes of England and France, quarterly stamped. King Charles the while in his Pallace, was but for fashions sake visited, and but by some of his olde servants, his Sunne was drawne so neere unto the setting. The great affaires of France thus setled, (as well as that unsetled time would permit,) King Henry minding to Crowne his Queene in England, ordained his brother of Clarence, (a wise, valiant, and a great Captaine) his Lieutenant-generall of France, leaving also the Duke of Excester with 500. men of Armes to keepe Paris; and so attended with great state, he came to Amiens and Callis, where taking to Sea, he arrived at Dover upon the third of February, and was received of his Subjects as an Angell from heaven, or another victorious Cæsar on Earth.

The feast was great, with all Princely services, and the state such as deserveth the report; for the Queene sitting at Table, at the right side of her Chaire kneeled the Earle of March, holding a Scepter in his hand; the Earle Marshall kneeling on the left side, held another; and the Countesse of Kent sate under the Table at her right foote; upon her right hand at Table sate the Bishops of Canterbury and Winchester, and upon the left the King of Scots, the Dutchesse of Yorke, and the Countesse of Huntington; the Nobles giving their attendance, each man according to his office and place.

(65) Presently, after Easter, in the moneth of May, a Parliament was held at Westminster, whose chiefest intent was to have meanes to continue the Kings Conquest in France; but such was the state of those lavish times, that, to stop the current of this melting mint, some, minding more the heapes of their money, then the spreading abroad of Englands faire Monarchy, exhibited their Bils unto the three estates in Parliament, and petitioned unto the King, to commiserate the poverty of the commons, which (as they said) were beggered by these warres. For which which cause, as it seemeth, no subsidy or ayde was demanded, but the King againe pawning his Crowne to his Vncle Beaufort, the rich Cardinall, for twenty thousand pound, before the said month was expired, with foure thousand horse, and foure and twenty thousand foote returned into France to follow those warres.

(66) Neither was his hast more then needed: for Iohn Earle of Bucquhanan, and Archbald Douglas, two valiant leaders of seaven hundred resolute Scots, repaired into France to ayde the Dolphin, and joyning with the French in Anion, meant to have surprized the Duke of Clarence before he had beene aware: in which enterprize, foure stragling Scots, taken and brought to his presence * as he sate at dinner, revealed the intent and strength of the Enemy, whose approach was very neere at hand. This newes no sooner came, but the Duke over-hastily got to horse (saying, they are all ours) leaving his troupes to follow him with as much celerity as they might. His suddaine and unlooked-for approach, caused the Scots to take into the Church of Bargie for their safety, where whilst they were making defence, the rest tooke the Alarme, and the Earle of Bucquhanan manned the Bridge, to whose ayde Hugh Kennedie with an hundred horse presented himselfe.

(67) The Duke of Clarence seeing no possibility to free the passage with his slender troupe of horse, alighted on foot, and gave forth with a furious charge, where the Earle of Bucquhanan came to blowes, being followed by two hundred horse; and either side fighting with equall courage and rancour. Clarence gave singular demonstration of his great valour, untill, as he was re-mounting, one Iohn Swinton a Scot wounded him in the face with his Lance, and threw him to the ground, being the first man of the English that there was slaine, where likewise died the Earle of Kyme, the Lords Gray and Rosse, besides other men of marke, and fifteene hundred common souldiers, the Earles of Huntington and Somerset, with Thomas Beaufort his brother, were taken prisoners. The * cause of this overthrow, is imputed to the Dukes hast in not staying for his Horsemen. Clarence that day upon his Creſt ware a Circlet set with precious stones, which being taken off his Helmet by a Scot, was sold to Iohn Steward of Derby, for a thousand Angels. For this fortunate dayes succesſe (where in yet the Enemy also lost eleaven hundred, and sundry of them men of principal note,) the Dolphin made the Earle of Bucquhanan Constable of France. This losse received, the Earle of Salisbury (who followed with the other forces, but came too late to the encounter,) thought to requite, and bringing forward his troupes, the enemy gave ground, whereby yet hee recovered the dead body of Clarence, and sent it to Roane, from whence it was covayed into England.

(68) After this victory the Dolphinois besieged Alenzon, which the Earle of Salisbury with his best forces sought to relieve; but finding the enemy too strong, retired to the Abbey of Becq; in whose retreat the French charged upon him, and slew 300. of his troupes, but finding no meanes to possesse Alenzon, raised their siege and returned to Anion.

Denis Sauage.

(69) King Henry therefore upon notice of his brothers death, was much perplexed, for besides the naturall affection of a brother, his wisdome, valour, and councell in the warres was highly esteemed by him, and to speake truth, there were very few Princes of that age to be equalled unto him. Wherefore ordaining his other brother Iohn Duke of Bedford his Lieutenant, and leaving his faire Queene most honorably attended, upon the tenth of Iune he landed at Callis, having in his company Iames king of Scotland, in hope either to draw the Scots unto his service, or else to withdraw their ayds from the Dolphin, by the sight of their own king under his royall standard. But the Scots, constantly French, being demanded why they would fight against their Soveraigne, answered directly, that they might not acknowledge any duty unto Iames, who as yet lived under the obedience of another. His desigue thus failing, his confidence was in his right and his sword.

Bucquhanan.

(70) The morrow after his arrivall he dispatched the Earle of Dorset, and the Lord Clifford with twelve hundrid horse and foot unto Paris, to relieve the Duke of Excester, who was straightened of victuals by the Dolphinois, that harrased the Country adjoyning, taking Bonneval, Galandon, and some other forts, and in his fortunate succesſes, and new conceived hope then marched to Chartiers with seaven thousand men at Armes, foure thousand Crosse-bowes, and sixe thousand Archers strong, where he began the siege, whom the Bastard of Thian bravely resisted, and sent to King Henry for aide.

Enguerrant.

(71) Henry, after a few dayes stay in Callis, marched to Monstrelet, and there lodged, quartering his Army in the villages about, where he found the Duke of Burgogne somewhat impaired of health: three daies spent in conference, King Henry marched into Ponthieu, and the Duke to Abbevill upon Some, to facilitate his passage there to be made, whereof some doubt was held by reason of the Inhabitants disposition, altogether unsetled, and as ready to offend, as affect. Henry in his way tooke the Fort called La Ferte, commanded by the Bastard of Bellay, which upon summons rendered, and being committed to the custody of Borsflers a Picard, was betrayed againe by him unto the Dolphin: from hence departing, he passed the river at Abbevill, where hee was royally received, and richly presented, whence he marched to Beauvois, Gisors, and so to Bois-de-Vincennes, where Charles and his Queene resided, and received him with great honour, and lastly to Paris where he was received in triumph.

(72) But more minding a Conquest then the delicate pleasures of Court, after he had consulted upon his affaires, and levied French forces to adde to the English, he marched toward Meaux, intending (in revenge of his brothers death) to fight with the Dolphin, who had now laine before Chartiers the space of three weekes, and given it forth he would come into the field. But hearing of King Henries comming, and that his Army by the accesse of supplies from Paris, and Normandy, was much increased, he brake up his siege and departed: which newes related, Henry marched to Dreaux, and sate downe before it. The Inhabitants and Garrison sensible of the danger, praied parley, and accorded to render the Towne, if the Dolphin did not relieve them by a certaine day, which expired, the Towne was delivered, and eight hundred of the Dolphins souldiers permitted to depart upon their Oathes, not to beare Armes against King Henry, nor his allies, for the space of one yeare: then following the Dolphin (who fled still before him) in his march he tooke Baugency, Rougmont, and other places of defence.

Enguerrant de Monstrel.

(73) Seeing his pursuit of the flying Dolphin to be fruitlesse, hee diverted his Army unto Luigny upon the river of Marne, where * he caused many engines and habiliaments for the warre to be made; having a desigue to besiege Meaux in Brie, and infest the Faulxbourg, sending before him the Duke of Excester with foure thousand strong, to prevent the burning of Meaux, by the Inhabitants, and a * few dayes after followed himselfe. His first worke was to secure his Armie, by entrenching his Quarters, which done and the Artillery mounted, hee beganne to batter the wals, and to make his Mines, wherein neither his industry nor personall labour was spared; and within, the Bastard of Vaurus, with many men of marke, besides the Inhabitants, and a thousand trained Souldiers, were as busie and resolute for the defence. Meane-while Iaques de Harecourt, in service of the Dolphin, with seven hundred souldiers harrased the parts about Vimeu, against whom, some English Garrisons thereabout assembling, slew three hundred of his retinue, himselfe hardly escaping by the swiftnesse of his horse.

(74) Whilst King Henry lay in his siege before Meaux, newes was brought him that his Queene, at the Castle of Windsore, was delivered of a Sonne, named also Henry, whereat he exceedingly rejoyced, though (as some will have it) he liked not well the place of her delivery, having before commanded the contrary, and prophecying, that what Henry of Monmouth should get, Henry of Windsore would loose. At the same time likewise he heard that Auranches in Normandy, was surprized by the Dolphinois; and above three hundred English there in Garrison put to the sword, or taken Prisoners; to remedy which, King Henry sent part of his owne Armie unto the Earle of Salisbury his Lieutenant of Normandy, who within few daies recovered Auranches and revenged the death of the surprized.

(75) But Henries siege lessened through these stirs in Normandy, and his minde busied upon his affaires that way, fitted opportunity to Signieur de Offemont, unto whom the besieged had many times made knowne their desires to have him their Governour; on a night therefore (ladders made ready to put over the wals to receive him) he secretly approached the place, but being discovered by the Centinels, and the alarum taken, he, not able to recover the ladders, fell into the ditch, whence by reason of his heavy armour he could not free himselfe, and in taking was wounded in the face: the King esteeming the taking of so brave and valiant a Captaine, as a prize of much importance. The Defendants now hopelesse of succour and finding themselves not able to hold out, carried all their goods from the Towne into the * Castell: but the affailants discovering their actions, and perceiving their feare, gave a fierce assault, and by force made way into the Towne with their swords: Then Henry planting his Canons, began to batter the Castell, and shortly brought it to that extremity, that besides want of bread, most of their hand-weapons were broken, and all of them in a manner dangerously wounded; yet desisted they not to provoke the English with opprobrious words, which caused such heavy conditions to be laid on them, as the like had not beene of any furrender before.

(78) But though Champagne, Picardy, Brie, and Normandy, with the Ile of France, were in Henries possession, yet was not all reduced to his quiet obeysance, a great and strong part holding out still for the Dolphin, who with 20. thousand strong, besieged La Charity upon Loire, and tooke it, from whence he marched to Cone upon the same River, whose Defendants agreed, that if Burgundy did not raise the siege by the 16. of August, they would surrender; which the said Duke accepted, and thereupon sent proffer of battell to the Dolphin, who was likewise as ready (and by his Herauld gave his faith) to tric his fortune in the field: The day affigned, and preparation made, the Duke of Burgundy sent to king Henry for his assistance; whose answere was, that himselfe and his forces would not faile to be with him that day, and run the same fortunes with him in the field.

King Henries sicknesse.

(79) But great Henries stout minde was crossed with his now crazy body, his health being so impaired with a burning feaver and fluxe, that he was dissuaded from the March; so the command of the Army was committed to his brother Iohn Duke of Bedford, and the Earle of Warwicke, who joyning their forces, for avoyding of contentions, through all their rankes intermingled the English, Burgundians, and Picardes together, and so the night before the desigued day of battell, came to Cone, and encamped neere to the Towne; yet undaunted Henry, who never miscarried in any of his personall enterprises, taking his leave at Senlis of K. Charles, and the two Queenes, in his horse-litter (with a guard for his person) marched (though weake) after them; but at Melun finding this sicknesse to encrease, and himselfe (who erst could endure all things) now unable to endure travel, he returned to Bois de Vincennois.

(80) The English colours displayed in the Dolphins eye, and his power inferiour in shew unto them, howsoever he had vaunted, he thought it not best to adventure the field; and therefore dislodging from Cone, he marched to Barry, both to protract time, and to weary the enemy. Cone thus relieved, the Dukes marched to Troyes in Champagne, and set downe their Army for the siege; but before the cords of their Tents could be sufficiently made fast, the Duke of Bedford had heavie newes of Great Henries encreased sickneſſe, and danger of death: wherefore leaving the Duke of Burgundy with the Army, he posted to Bois de Vincennois, where finding the relation too true, he greatly lamented his dying brothers estate: but the King much rejoycing of his brothers comming, cheerefully comforted his mourning friends and Nobles, and made unto them this grave and his laſt dying ſpeech.

His cheerefulneſſe in his ſickneſſe.

His laſt exhortation.

"(81) I well ſee you lament my death; but I doe "not ſo: for this ſhort life of mine ſhall leave behind "me the witneſſe of my faith, integritie, juſtice, honeſ- "ty and mercy, which ſhal crowne my memory with "glory, and free me from blame and ſlander, which "in long Raignes can hardly be avoided: but you "have juſt cauſe to mourne at my untimely death, "and it cannot be but a generall griefe to my people, "that in ſuch an Ocean of buſineſſe yet depending, I "ſhall leave you and them deſtitute of a Prince able "to governe: but your ſorrow ought to be ſo much "the leſſe, when you call to mind the frailty of world- "ly things, and that evermore there will be ſome what "wanting which we deſire. My firſt requeſt unto you "ſhall be this, that with an unanimous affection to "adviſe, fore-ſee and provide, that the counſel which "I name may be followed. I further earneſtly en- "treat you to love my Infant Henry, to inſtruct him "with your wiſedomes, that by your counſell, care "and love, he may be made able and worthy to weild "ſo great an Empire. Comfort my deare Wife, the "moſt afflicted creature living, extend your loves un- "to her in the ſame proportion as I have ever loved "you. Touching the publique, I admoniſh and ex- "hort you to brotherly concord, and never to breake "league with Philip Duke of Burgundy; and if you "ſhall thinke it good, let my brother Humfrey Duke "of Glocester governe England, and not depart upon "any occaſion whatſoever, untill my Sonne Henry "be of yeares to ſway the eſtate; and my brother "Iohn Duke of Bedford, with the aſſiſtance of Philip "D. of Burgundy, to manage the Realme of France, "Concerning Charles (commonly called the Dol- "phin) either he muſt by your ſwords be made to ſub- "mit himſelfe, or elſe you ſhall never be in quiet, and "it were as good to render him the poſſeſſion of what "you have: wherefore ſleep not, and while you have "meanes and oportunity be induſtrious. Laſtly, I be- "ſeech, charge, and command you, (howſoever time "or occaſion may perſwade, or invite you to the con- "trary) that Normandy, received by my induſtry, and "your ſwords, being the ancient inheritance of the "Crowne of England, be not alienated for any cauſe "whatſoever. Among other things then enjoyned, he willed that the Duke of Orleance, the Earle of Eu, Gnacourt, and Guicchard de Siſay, ſhould not be ranſomed, untill yong Henry were of yeares to governe.

(82) This ſaid, and drawing neere to the period of his ſhort but glorious life; he demanded of his Phyſicians how long (in their judgement) he might live? whereunto when one of them anſwered, Sir, thinke on your ſoule, for your time is not above two houers: he made his confeſſion, and his Chaplaines afterward kneeling in prayer, when one of them out of the Pſalmes made mention of Ieruſalem, the King no ſooner heard the name, but with a loud voice he ſaid; Lord, thou knoweſt that my purpoſe was to conquer Ieruſalem from the Infidels, if it had pleaſed thee to have given me life: and then in a right faith, aſſured hope, perfect charitie, and ſound memory, he * rendred his ſoule to his Creator, after hee had raigned nine yeares, five moneths, and * foureteene dayes, leaving none like unto him amongſt all the Kings and Princes of Chriſtendome, for which cauſe his death was not onely bewailed of the Engliſh, whom he glorioſly had ruled, but alſo of the French, whom he had victorioſly conquered. This was the manner of this triumphant Monarchs end, which moves men juſtly to wonder at Hector Boetius, who ſaith, he was ſtricken by God for ſacriledge, & died miſerably: Hectors friends have occaſion to wiſh that his Readers ſhould not make that miſerable judgement the rule and meaſure of crediting or diſcrediting his other writings, yet lamentable his end was indeed, if he periſhed by poiſon, whereof there was a vehement ſuſpition, as Polydor Virgil hath averred, and the carriage of the French affaires afterward makes it more then probable.

And (which had ſurpaſſed all the reſt) he inrended (ſuch was his love to learning, and to the place where himſelfe was a learner) to have founded in the great Caſtle at Oxford, a magnificent Colledge for Divines, and Students of the ſeaven liberall Sciences,* the plot and ordinations of which foundation he had already drawne, and * reſolved to endow it with all the lands in England, belonging to Priors-Aliens; but his untimely death prevented both that, and many other noble workes. To leave a domeſticke teſtimony of his affection to Armes, he firſt inſtituted Gartar principall King at Armes: beſides other augmentations to the Order of Saint George. In a word, never lived Engliſh King with more true glory, nor ever died any in a more unſeaſonable time, nor more lamented: for he was godly in heart, ſober in ſpeech, ſparing of words, reſolute in deeds, provident in counſell, prudent in judgement, modeſt in countenance, magnanimous in action, conſtant in undertaking, a great Almeſ-giver, devout to Godward, a renowned Souldier, fortunate in field, from whence he never returned without victory. Theſe, with many other (I might almoſt ſay, all other) vertues are attributed to this moſt renowned amongſt Engliſh Kings; the more to be admired in him in ſo ſhort a raigne, and in thoſe yeares, he being but of 36. yeares, when he breathed forth his glorious ſoule.

(84) His bowels were interred in the Church of Saint Mauro de Foſſes, and his embalmed Corps was cloſed in Lead, and attended upon by the Lords of England, France, Normandy, and Picardy, was brought unto Paris (where in the Church of our Lady ſolemne exequies were performed) and thence to Roane, where it reſted till all things were ready to ſet forward for England; though the Cities of Paris and Roane ſtrove, and offered great ſummes of gold to have Henries royall remaines enterred amongſt them. His picture artificially was moulded of boyled hides, and countenance painted according to life, upon whoſe head an imperiall Diademe of gold & precious ſtones was fer, the body clothed with a purple roabe, furred with Ermine, in his right hand it held a ſcepter royall, and in the left a ball of gold; in which manner it was carried in a Chariot of State, covered with red velvet, embroidered with gold, and over it a rich Canopy, borne by men of great place. Thus accompanied by Iames king of Scotland, many Princes, Lords and Knights of England and France, he was convaied from Roane to Abbeville, to Heſdin, to Menſtruill, Bologne, and Callis, the Chariot all the way compaſſed about with men all in white garments, bearing burning Torches in their hands; next unto whom followed his houſhold-ſervants, all in blacke, and after them the Princes, Lords, and Eſtates in veſtures of mourning adorned; then two miles diſtant from the corps followed the ſtill-lamenting Queene, attended with Princely mourners, her tender and pierced heart more inly mourning, then her outward ſad weeds could in any ſort expreſſe.

(85) And thus by Sea and Land the dead King was brought unto London, where through the ſtreets the Chariot was drawne with foure horſes, whoſe Capariſons were richly embroidered, and embroſſed with the royall Armes; the firſt with Englands Armes alone, the ſecond with the Armes of France and

The body with all pompous celebrity was interred in the Church at Weſtminſter (for ſo Henry had by his laſt Will commanded (next beneath King Edward the Confeſſor, upon whoſe Tombe Queene Katherine cauſed a royall picture to be laid, covered all over with ſilver plate guilt, but the head thereof altogether of maſſy-ſilver. All which at that Abbeys ſuppreſſion, (when the battering hammers of deſtruction did ſound almoſt in every Church) were ſacrilegiouſly broken off, and by purloyning transferred to farre prophaner uſes, where, at this day, the headleſſe monument, (worthy to be reſtored by ſome more Princely and ſacred hand) is to be ſeen, and with theſe verſes written upon his Tombe.

HENRIE THE SIXTH, KING OF ENGLAND, AND FRANCE, LORD OF IRELAND: THE THREE AND FIFTIETH MONARCH OF ENGLAND, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND ISSVE.

Monarch 53.

CHAPTER XVI.

HEnry the sixth began his raigne the last day of August, being the day of his Fathers death. An. Dom. 1422.

* Dan. cap. 2. ver. 21.

HEad God Almighty (the * giver and transferrer of Kingdomes) thought good that the English should have setled in the Continent of Europe, and not have beene shut up within their Ilands, he would not so soone have deprived them of their late incomparable Captaine & Soveraigne Henry the fifth. But it seemes that God having humbled the French Nation under Henries victorious hand, meant now againe to restore them to his wonted favour by taking away their terror and triumpher, substituting his son (an Infant) in his place, Henry of that name the 6. born at Windsor, who was crowned about the eighth moneth of his age. The prety hands which could not feed himselfe, were yet made capable to weild a Scepter, and he that was beholding to Nurses for milke, did nevertheless distribute the sustenance of law and justice to so great and warlike Nations. Counsell supplies the defect of age. At his Fathers death he had Vncles, men of approved valour and discretion, to whom the principall care of all publike affaires by the Fathers last provisions was committed. Humfrey Duke of Glocester (the yonger brother of two) had the * government of England entrusted to his fidelity: the Regency of France was assigned for Province to John Duke of Bedford, the eldest living uncle of the King, as to a Prince of much magnanimity, prowesse and felicity in conduct, with whom was * joyned Philip Duke of Burgundy. The guard and custody of the royall Infant was assigned to Thomas * Duke of Excester: the nurture and education to his * mother, the Queen Dowager: upon the two Vncles (as betweene the two Poles of the English Empire) the whole glohe of government moved: whatsoever is done by the Kingly power, is said to be done by the King. We shall behold notwithstanding in the tragicall glasse of this Henries raigne, how farre the imbecillity of the kingly person may may affect the body politique with good or evill. If Histories were ordained to stirre affections, not to teach and instruct, never any Princes raigne since the Conquest did better deserve to be described with a tragicall Stile, and words of horror and sorrow, although the beginning (like the faire morning of a most tempestuous day) promised nothing more then a continuance of passed felicities.

(2) For the State of the English affaires was great and flourishing, England without tumult, the naturall fierce humours of her people consuming or exercising themselves in France, and France her selfe (for the nobler parts, together with the grand City of Paris, head of that Monarchy) was at their devotion. There wanted nothing which might advance the worke begun. Most noble and expert Leaders, as those which had beene fathioned in the Schoole of Warre, under the best Martiall-Master of that Age, the late Henry, armes full of veterane Souldiers, most of which were of skill sufficient to be Commanders themselves: their friends firme, no defect nor breach (by which dissipation might enter to the overthrow of the English greatnesse) as yet disclosing themselves. Wisdome, piety, riches, forwardnesse at home, courage and like forwardnesse abroad. It is a fruitfull speculation to consider how GOD carrieth his part in the workes of men, alwayes justly, sometimes terribly, but never otherwise then to bring all worldly greatnesse and glory into due contempt and loathing, that the Soule may be erected to her Creator, and aspire to a Crowne celestiall. The first disadvantage which happened to the English cause (after the late Kings decease) was the death of Charles the French King, who survived the other but * fifty and three dayes. This we may worthily call the first (as it was a great, as wel as the first) disadvantage, for the imbecillities of that Prince were a strength to the English; On the other side (God observing a talio and parilitie) the infancy of young Henry was an advantage to Charles the Dolphin of France, now by them of his faction called King of France, as the English used in derision to enstyle him King of Berry, because little else was left unto him.

* Pint. Æmil. in cat. 9.

A Parliament at Westminster.

(3) In England (whose condition the order of nature wils us first to describe, because there was the seat of Counsel, by wch all the actions of the generall State were directed) a Parliament was assembled to establish the Crowne upon the Infant, and to provide for the publike uses and necessities of State. Money * (alwaies one of them) was liberally granted. It was a strange sight (and the first time that ever it was seene in England) which in the next yeare happened, an Infant sitting in the Mothers lap, before it could tell what English meant, to exercise the place of Soveraigne direction in open Parliament. Yet so it was, for the Queene to illumine that publique convention of States with her Infants presence, removed from Windsor to London; through which Citie (her selfe royally seated, with her young sonne upon her lap) passed in majesticke manner to Westminster, and there tooke Seat among all his Lords, whom (by the ordinary mouth of that high Court) he saluted and spake to them at large concerning the premises; where, as he uttered the minde of his place by anothers tongue, so he elsewhere prosecuted all affaires by other mens hands and Organs.

* The levie whereof was five Nobles on every sacke of Woolt.

(4) The Duke of Bedford (as the nature of his place exacted) to settle and preserve the State of France for his young Nephew the King, together with Philip Duke of Burgoigne, who as yet continued a stedfast friend to the English Soveraignetie, (knowing the Dolphin busie to recover France) strengthned the confines of their governement with Garrisons, assembled their powers, and laboured to retaine the hearts of their owne party. The Duke of Bedford Regent of France, had * words to them to this effect in open assembly: That they should not violate their plighted and sworne Allegeance, neither by themselves endeavour, nor endure that by others their Soveraigne Lord young Henry should be defrauded of his inheritance, or that the hatreds and enmities which now began to die between the French and English names, should through the practises of most faithlesse men be renued, and re-inflamed: That they would remember how (by Gods speciall favour and goodnesse) the two Kingdomes of France and England were united under one most faire and goodly Monarchie in an eternall league, and lately so established, that no humane force could resist. That albeit they had sustained dammage by the warre, yet the same would be recovered with advantage, if they honoured, loved, and obeyed their lawfull Soveraigne Lord King Henry, and prosecuted his enemies with extremity, according to bounden dutie. This Oration found plausible admission in shew: Henry is proclaimed King of England and of France, and such chiefes as were present did their Homages, taking oath to be true: The like Obligation and Sacrament of alleageance was put upon all the French through the English Dominions in France.

(5) Charles, (who as sonne and heire to the late King, entitled himselfe King of France, by the name of Charles the seaventh) being then about the seaven and twentieth yeare of his age, full of courage and new hopes, gathered what force he could: his chiefe Levies were made in Dolphinois and Italy, from whence (for money) he drew sundry troupes. But the best sinewes of his Army moved in certaine thousands of the Scottish Nation, which served under him. The first step which the Charolines, or forces of Charles made into hostile action was unfortunate, for comming to raise the siege which the English held about * Crepan, they were put to flight, with the losse of about two thousand of their numbers. This was noble in Charles, and his Charolines, that their minds sunke not at the horrour of such an evill Omen. It was, saith Aemylius of them, resolved to encounter adverse fortune with encrease of courage. The Regent on the other side was vigilant upon all occasions: the power of his Regency extended it selfe without contradiction * through Vimew, Ponthieu and Picardy, from Paris to Reines, Chalons and Troyes, up to the water of Loire, and the Sea: A goodly scope of territory, and absolutely the best of France. That late losse and foile of the Charolines was repaired shortly after by an overthrow in skirmish which they gave to the English partie, from whom (with the slaughter of about fifteene hundreth) they recovered a great bootie, specially of Cattell which the English had gotten in the Countries of Nugion and Main, but thus intercepted upon their returne into Normandie. Charles (which Paul. Aemylius omitteth) doubleth that successe: for * Meulan upon Seine is by him taken, where all the English are put to the Sword: but the possession was short, and the revenge speedy: Thomas Montacute Earle of Salisbury (a man (saith Polydor) more like the old Romans, than people of that age, so great was his vertue and chevalry) having with him John of Luxemburg, Generall of the Burgundian horsemen, recovers the place, killing all the French which were found therein.

(6) At the City of * Amiens in Picardy, the three great Dukes of Bedford (Regent of France) Burgoigin and Britaine meet to consult of the whole course and summe of affaires. There they renued the League, adding, that each should be others friend, and that all of them should defend King Henries right with their best forces. For the better assurance of this profitable amitie, the Regent (then a Bachelour) tooke to wife the Lady Anne, sister to Philip Duke of Burgundy: while the Regent was absent from Paris upon these just occasions, the Parisians (who not long before had * sent Ambassadors into England, to acknowledge their obedience to King Henry) practised with Charles to deliver their Citie. The Regent had notice of this dangerous treason, and with his presence retained them in dutie. The chiefe Actors payed their lives for satisfaction of the trespasse. In good time time there arrived out of England ten thousand freſh Souldiers. Over them he ordained Captaines, the famous Earle of Salisbury, William Pole Earle of Suffolke, Robert Willoughby and others. Himſelfe led about with him for the generall ſervice, eighteene hundred horſemen, and eight thouſand foote. With theſe field-forces the maine of the Engliſh eſtate in France was held togeather, though not without difficulty, and divers adventures. (7) The Regents chiefe deſigne was to draw Charles to fight, hoping by his over-throw to conclude many dayes workes in one. For this cauſe he drew into Normandy. Charles was then in * Tourain, where hee muſtereth his people. The Regent proſpers in the meane time, and takes by ſiege a place of good importance, preſuming ſo to dare the French, out to a Battell. John Duke of Alanzon is ſent with an Army and inſtructions to fight, if occaſion ſerved, but Charles himſelfe was not ſuffered to hazard his perſon. Not farre from the Towne * of Vernoil, which the * Engliſh had taken before the * Duke of Alanzon, and his Charolies could ſuccour it, the two Armies embattelled themſelves. The fight began with ſhot, which ſeeming not quicke enough to diſpatch the worke, the Battels came to hand-ſtroakes, where for ſome houres, there was maintayned a conſtant and doubtfull Battell, with great fury on both ſides. The Engliſh enured to the French Warres, having borne the firſt heats of their enemies, (which are in that Nation moſt ragefull:) by perſeverance utterly brake and put them to flight. The Regent * himſelfe with a Battle-axe fought moſt fiercely, winning immortall honour in that bloudy journey. There were ſlaine of the enemies ſide: John * Earle of Boughmban Conſtable of France: Archembald Douglas Duke of Tourain, and Lieutenant of France; Archembald his ſonne Earle of Wigton, with many other of the Scots. Of the French there were ſlaine the Earle of Vantadowr, and ſundry others. In all there died upon that ſide certaine thouſands: None writes of fewer then foure or five thouſand, nor any of above fifteene. The great number of the ſlaine, is not the meaſure of a victiory, but the uſe and effects which it drawes. The Duke of Alanzon himſelfe was taken Priſoner, with about two * hundred others of ſpeciall worth. The Engliſh payed for this noble victory, the bodies of about two thouſand of their Souldiers which loſt life there, for it was fought upon faire tearmes in the open Fields, and carried by meere man-hood. That which followeth till the ſiege of Orleance, Paul * Aemylius comprehendeth in ſome few Lines. *The fierce Conquerour beſiegeth Mauz in Main, and with Ordnance beates downe part of the wals. It yeelds hereupon. The Engliſh Garriſon left therein, after the taking not being ſufficient to containe the Towne in due ſubjection, is compelled to flie to a Tower for their ſafetie, the enemies which were admitted into it by the Burgers enjoying the reſt. The Lord Talbot (the moſt noble Captaine of the Engliſh) preſently arrives to the reſcue, and puts the malefactors to death. The Engliſh Empire extends it ſelfe to the River of Loire. In nine Articles and capitulations drawne and concluded at the yeelding of Mauz, this was one, as perhaps it was in every like occaſion. *That if any perſons were found within the City, which had beene conſenting to the murther of John Duke of Burgoine, father to Philip Duke of Burgoine, in full revenge whereof, he had hitherto adhered to the Engliſh, that * they ſhould ſimply be at the Regents mercy.*

(8) The chiefe things which paſſed in England, during theſe happy proceedings in France, were briefly theſe:

Iames Steward the young King of Scots, having beene caſually taken upon the Sea, in the raigne of King Henry the fourth; and after his fathers death not ſufficiently tendered nor reſpected by the Scots, remained ſtill a Priſoner. The rather therefore to hinder the Scots, (that was the hope) from ayding the French, it was now thought fit by the Councell of England to enlarge him. Which was accordingly done upon pledges. Not long after the which, he married the Lady Ione, daughter to John Earle of Sommerſet, neere Coſen to King Henry. Principall ſetters-forward of this marriage (as by likelihood of his liberty alſo) to honour their Family with a Kingly alliance, were the Earle of Sommerſet and the Biſhop of Winchеſter, both of them Beauforts, who together with ſundry other of the Engliſh Nobility, conducted the new married Couple to the Scottiſh Borders. Much of his ranſome was abated, and his new kinſemen beſtowed upon him * ſtore of Plate, Gold, and Silver, and among other gorgeous Ornaments ſuits of hangings, in which the labours of Hercules were moſt curiouſly wrought. But this wiſe King (having had the benefit of excellent and Princely education in England) did not ſuffer any obligations contracted in the time of his durance, to preponderate with him the Generall State of Scotland, whoſe freedome did much depend upon the fortune of France, whereby the maine drift of his enlargers was not much advanced. The reaſon notwithſtanding which led this action was probable, and ſo much the more commendable, for that it was tempered with humanity. The forreine miſchiefe thus howſoever intended, hereby to be avoyded or qualified, Sir John Mortimer, (a dangerous fire-brand at home) being Priſoner in the Tower, was arraigned for many treaſonable ſpeeches uſed to a yeoman, (ſervant to Sir Robert Scot *, Keeper of the Tower of London) to draw the ſaid yeoman to let him eſcape: promiſing him great matters. The points of his ſpeeches were as that fellow charged upon him in open Parliament.

ſeiſon of Henault in right of his ſuppoſed wife, finding himſelfe hard ſet unto, by the aides which Burgoin miniſtred to the Duke of Brabant, hee challengeth Combat of the Duke of Burgundy, calling him traitour. Mediation tooke up the quarrell afterward betweene the Duke of Burgundy and him. Not long after the returne of the Duke of Glouceſter into England, the firſt marriage which had beene made and conſummated betweene the Duke of Brabant, and the ſaid Lady Iaqueline, was pronounced lawfull by Pope Martin the fifth. Hereupon the Duke of Glouceſter (having ſuſtained many loſſes, aſwell of friends as treaſure, in puniſhment of that great ſinne, in taking anothers Wife) forthwith marries Eleanor, daughter to Reignald Lord Cobham of Sterborough, whereby hee made her amends for that * unlawfull familiarity which had formerly paſſed betweene them.

Mean-while the Court of England doth well ſhew that the King was an Infant, for it was full of dangerous emulations and ſidings, the Duke of Glouceſter (whoſe high office it was to tender the wel-fare of the King and State) lying ſundry grievous accuſations againſt the Cardinall Beaufort (ſonne of John Duke of Lancaſter) Biſhop of Winchеſter, and Lord Chancellor, as being a perſon very dangerous unto both.

(10) The newes of theſe home-contentions comming to the Duke of Bedford into France, eaſily drew him home, though the State of that Realme could not well want his preſence. For John Duke of Britaine, (notwithſtanding his late renovation of league with the Regent at Amiens) jealous of the * Engliſh greatneſſe, turned ſuddenly to Charles, and with him, Arthur, Earle of Richmond his brother. This puts freſh ſpirit into the drooping Prince. Arthur is by Charles made Conſtable of France, in place of the Scottiſh Earle, who was ſlaine at the bloudy Battell of Vernoil. The Duke of Britaine over-lives this revolt but a ſmall time. Arthur, to declare his forwardneſſe on the behalfe of Charles, aſſembleth about twenty thouſand men, and with them ſodainely beſiegeth S. Iean a towne of Normandy, upon the Frontier of Britaine; which Edmund Duke of Sommerſet, Governour of Normandy, had lately fortified and ſtuft with Souldiers. The unexpected arrivall of the French, did greatly at the firſt perplex the Engliſh, but upon better adviſe, they valiantly fallied out upon them, both before and behind, which ſtroke ſo great terrour into the enemy, that with loſſe of their Artillery, and many of their people they forſooke the ſiege. To redeeme this diſhonour, he turnes his fury upon the Countrey of Anjou, which in many parts he depopulates and ſpoyles. The Regent being reſolved to returne into England, leaves behinde him Beauchamp * Earle of Warwick; as Lieutenant, who was lately arrived in France, having fixe thouſand freſh Souldiers in his company.

(11) The preſence of the Duke of Bedford, Regent of France, was to the State of England very neceſſary. For the wiſdome and authority of ſo great a Prince, being eldeſt Vncle to the King, and one whom many great deedes made famous, allayed the diſtemper which he found at his arrivall. It was a worke worthy of his labour, and he alſo found it to be a worke indeede, and not eaſily effectuable. The differences were debated firſt at St. Albans, then at Northampton, laſtly in a Parliament at Leiceſter, which continued there till toward the end of Iune. The Duke of Bedford himſelfe, to avoyd the note of partiality, for that his brother of Glouceſter was a party, did not intermeddle otherwiſe then as in generall words to perſwade amity, but the whole cauſe was referred to arbitrators of greateſt Nobility and prudence: by whoſe endevours all thoſe differences and grievances were equally thruſt into one ſacke, to be ſealed up for ever by oblivion, and without mention of amends on either ſide, the Duke and Biſhop, (the one hauing ſworne by his * Prince-hood, the other by his Prieſthood, truely to obſerve the award,) ſhooke hands; and were fully for that time reconciled. After which holy and neceſſary worke of private attonements, enſued acts of feſtivitie and honour. For in the ſame Towne of Leiceſter the young King, not then five yeares of age, was at the high Feaſt of Pentecoſt dubbed Knight by the Regent of France. Immediately whereupon the King honoured Richard Earle of Cambridge, (who by the fatall errour of the Counſell, was at this Parliament Created Duke of York, the ſame who was father to Edward the fourth) with the order of Knighthood, and about forty more with him. This Richard Duke of Yorke was hee, who brought upon this Kingdome and Nation moſt dolefull diviſions, to the utter extirpation of all the male lines of either Houſe, that is to ſay, his owne, and that of Lancaſter, whereof the yong King was head. From Leiceſter the King was conveighed to Killingworth, and Thomas Duke of Exceſter dying, Beauchamp Earle of Warwicke, was conſtituted Guardian and Tutor to the King.

Parliament-towne, and Vniversity, richly scituate upon the River of Loire, whose best glory it is, being the chiefe City which that renowned streame watereth. No enemies appearing abroad, hee * approacheth close to the wals. Assaults * proving vaine, hee entrencheth about it, and to secure his Camp, casts up ramparts and other workes, one of which (by reason of the hugenesse thereof) was called London, by the name of chiefe City of England. The Fort which stood at the Bridge-foot beyond the Lorie, hee fortifieth upon, and closeth them up on every side. Charles of France could minister no sufficient succour. God, when mans helpe failes interposeth his hand, which as all of us daily feele, so is it most conspicuous in the deliverance of Nations. The City is driven to some misery through the beginning want of all things; for the siege had now endured about 60. dayes, *not without much bloud-shed on both sides. The Earle of Salisbury impatient of such delay, purposeth to give a generall assault. The better to consider upon the course, hee stands to take view at a window, barred with Iron, which over-lookt the City toward the East. Behold how God began to uncut the knot of those bands with which the English held France bound; a Bullet of a great piece (which lay ready leveld at that window) discarged by the Gunners * sonne, a lad, stroke the grates, whose spinters so wounded the Earle, and one Sir Thomas Gargrave, that they both dyed of the incurable hurts within few dayes. Heare now the common judgement of Writers concerning this Earles losse: * *Presently after the death of this man the fortune of the warre changed. * Now both mortall and immortall powers began to looke favourably upon the State of France.* This to the * English was Initium malorum: for after this mishap they rather lost then won, so that by little and little they lost all their possession in France: and albeit that somewhat they got after, yet for one that they won, they lost three. So that Polydor not without cause (after many other great praises) both elsewhere call him the man in whom the safety of the English State consisted. The vertue therefore of a fortunate General is inestimable.

(14) Howbeit the siege did not determine with his life, William Earle of Suffolke, the Lord Talbot, and the rest maintained the same all the Winter. The wants of the Campe were relieved from Paris by a convoy, under the guard of Sir John Fastolfe, and fifteene hundred soldiers, who arrived safe in despite of all the attempts to distresse them, which the French made. The City would yeeld it selfe, but not to the English. The Duke of Burgundy they were content should have the honour. A subtile stratagem, rather then an offer of yeelding, for there was likelihood in it to breake thereby the amity betweene the English and him. The Regent and his Counsell being sent unto, thought it not reasonable (Aemilius erroniously makes the late Earle of Salisbury the Author of that refusall) neither indeed was it, theirs having beene the cost and labour. The Duke of Burgundy construed this repulse sowerly, which marred his taste of the English friendship ever after: yet the Regents answer was just and honest. That the warre was made in King Henries name, and therefore Orleance ought to be King Henries. Among these difficulties stood the French affaires. Charles of France understanding the miserable straits of his deare City, and ignorant how to remedy so neere a mischiefe; there presented herselfe unto him, at Chinon, a yong maide about eighteene yeares olde, calling Ioan of Loraine, * daughter to Iames of Arck, dwelling in Domremy neere Vaucalcurs, a * Shepheardesse under her father, whose flockes she tended, bids him not faint, and constantly affirmes, that God had sent her to deliver the Realme of France from the English yoake, and restore him to the fulnesse of his fortunes. She was not forthwith credited; but when the wise of both sorts, as well Clerkes as Souldiers had sifted her with manifold questions, shee continued in her first speech so stedfastly, uttering nothing but that which was *modest, chaste, and holy, that honour and faith was given unto her sayings. An * old woman directed her. Ioan armes her selfe like a man, and requires to have that sword which hung in * S. Katherines Church of Fierebois in Touraine. This demand encreased their admiration of her; for such a * sword was found among the old Donaries or Votive tokens of that Church. Thus warlikely arrayed she rides to Blois, where forces and fresh victuals lay for the reliefe of Orleance. She with the Admirall and Marshall of France enters safe. This did greatly encourage the fainting French. Ioan the Maid of God, so they called her, (though * some have written that it was a practise or impositure) writes thus to De la Pole Earle of Suffolke, who succeeded Salisbury in the maine charge of that siege.

"(15) King of England, doe reason to the King of "heaven, for his bloud-royall; yeeld up to the Virgin "the Keyes of all the good Cities which you have forced. "She is come from heaven to reclaime the bloud-royall "and is ready to make a peace, if you be ready to doe "reason: yeeld therefore and pay what you have taken, "King of England: I am the chiefe of this war, where-"soever I encounter your men in France, I will chase "them, will they or no. If they will obey, I will take "them to mercy. The Virgin comes from heaven to "drive you out of *France. If you will not obey, she will "cause so great a stirre as the like hath not beene these "thousand yeares in France. And beleeve certainly, "that the King of heaven will send to her, and her good "men of Armes, more force then you can have. Goe "in Gods name into your Countrey: be not obstinate, "for you shall not hold *France of the King of heaven, "the sonne of S. Mary, but Charles shall enjoy it, the "King and lawfull heire, to whom God hath given it.* "He shall enter Paris with a goodly traine; You Wil-"liam de la Pole Earle of Suffolk, John Lord Talbot, "Thomas Lord Scales, Lieutenants to the Duke of Bed-"ford; and you Duke of Bedford, terming your selfe "Regent of the Realme of France, spare innocent bloud, "and leave Orleance in liberty. If you doe not reason "to them whom you have wronged, the French will doe "the goodliest exploit that ever was done in Christen-dome. Vnderstand these newes of God, and of the Virgin. Yet Charles had at this time no whole Countries under his obedience, * but Languedoc and Dolphin, against which both the Savoyard and Burgundian prepared, but miscaried, the Prince of Orenge, the third Confederate, being discomfited.

(16) This letter was entertained by the English with laughter. Ioan reputed no better then a Bedlam, or Enchantresse. Though to some it may seeme more honourable to our Nation, that they were not to be expelled by a humane power, but by a divine, extraordinary revealing of it self. Du Serres describes this Parragon in these words: She had a modest countenance, sweete, civill, and resolute, her discourse was temperate, reasonable, and retired, her actions colde, shewing great chastity without vanity, affectation, babling, or courtly lightnesse. Let us not dissemble what we finde written: by her encouragements and conduct the English had Orleance pluckt out of their hopes, after they had suffered the Duke of Alanzon to enter with new force, and with much losse were driven to raise the siege. Ioan her selfe was wounded at one sally in which shee led, being shot through the arme with an arrow. Iudge what the esteemed of that hurt, when she used these admirable and terrible words: This is a favour, let us goe on; they cannot escape the hand of God. In all adventures she was one and formost. The English lost at this siege, the Earle of Salisbury, the Lord Molins, the Lord Poinings, and many other. But doe not rashly beleeve Serres in saying, that of all sorts were slaine in such Sallies, as the martiall Virgine made eight thousand. Our Writers say but * fixe hundreth. The Lord Talbot marched away with above nine thousand, whom Ioan would not suffer the French to pursue. In memorie of this admirable deliverance, they of that City erected a monu-

(17) There was an interchangeable taking and recovering of Townes and places of importance upon both sides. The Lord Talbot tooke Lavall, and the Earle of Suffolke puts himselfe into Iergeaux. Thither the Duke of Alanzon with Ioan, and other great Captaines come, which they force by assault. Sir Alexander Poole the Earles brother was slaine, with many others in the fight, the Earle himselfe remained prisoner. The Duke added some other places to this Conquest: Soone after his numbers are augmented by the repaire to him of Arthur Constable of France, the Earle of Vandome, the Lord Dalbret and others, so that now their whole Army contained about twenty and three thousand men. With these they encounter the Lord Talbot (who had scarce the fifth part of their numbers) at a Village called Patay, whom they charged so sodainely, that his Archers had no time to fortifie their battels (after their manner) with a Palizado, or empalement of stakes, so that the chiefe fight must bee made upon horse-backe. After three houres bloudy resistance, the English were put to the worst.* The Lord Scales, the Lord Hungerford, Sir Thomas Rampstone, and even the Lord Talbot himselfe (being first wounded in the backe) were taken. The footmen enforced to trust to their * swords, under the shelter of such horsemen as remained, retreated in order, and came to a place of safety. The English lost above a thousand, the French above 600. This blow shooke the whole fabricke of the English greatnesse in France at the very foundations, awaking multitudes (even of those who before had vowed fealty to the English, and now had colour of divine warrant for violating that vow) to joyne with the victors for the recovery of common liberty. There followed the present revolt of sundry Townes; neither was it long before Charles himselfe issues out in Armes, recovers the City of Aunerre and Rheimes; where, according to the Maides direction, hee was solemnely crowned King. Hitherto she might be thought prophetical and fortunate. It should seeme now that the chiefe part of her imployment was accomplished, yet shee flourished a while longer. The Duke of Bedford to burthresse the shrinking state of English affaires in France, and to encounter evill fortune in the face, upon the unpleasant newes of Orleance refused, and Talbots taking, musters his whole present forces, which made above tenne thousand English, besides certaine wings of Normans: with these hee marcheth out of Paris, and opposeth himselfe to the Current of Charles his new hopes, who meant to attempt that City, (some of whose Citizens held strict and secret correspondence with him. But upon this affrontment, he suspended the execution of that designe, having as then no hope to atchieve it. The Regent returnes to Paris, Ioane the Pucell dissuaded Charles from fight.

(10) Places of speciall note, as Champaigne and Beauvois yeelded themselves voluntarily to Charles. The Regent having setled the Estate, and Garrisons of the chiefe City, passeth into Normandy, to provide for a safe retreat there, if perhaps the English (by the inevitable will of God) should bee enforced to quit their other holds and dominions: which hee began to suspect, for that hee had intelligence of a secret purpose, which the French pursued, to winne the Burgundians from King Henries side. While the Regent was absent upon this occasion, Charles got the Towne of Saint Denis, (a neighbour to Paris) though hee held it not long by practise. From thence he sends the Duke of Alanzon and Ioan to try their friends and fortunes at Paris. They found not hoped successe, for the English gave them so rough an encounter, that Ioan her selfe was * wounded; and the rest with much slaughter driven to fall off. The Regent hearing of these attempts, entrusteth the Coast-Townes of Normandy, to the care of Richard Duke of Yorke, and Roan (the Capitall City of that Dutchy) to Edmund Duke of Sommerset, himselfe speedes to Paris, where he commends the Souldiers and Citizens for that they had not imitated the disloyalty of their Neighbours. New supplies came out of England. The next enterprize was to reduce Champaigne to obedience. John of Luxemburgh with Burgundians and some English besiegeth it. Here the glory of Ioan unfortunately ended; for comming to the rescue shee entred indeed, but afterward sallying forth, her troupes were beaten, and her selfe (being betrayed, say her favourers) taken prisoner by the said Burgundian * Knight, who for the value of her ransome (ten thousand pounds Turnoys, and three hundreth Crownes yearely rent) delivered her unto the English. The siege was notwithstanding raysed; they sent her to Roan, where she (about nine or tenne moneths after) was burnt to death. Clelia was saved by * Porsenna; and it is not to be doubted but that the magnanimity of the English would have spared her, had they not found it necessary to deface the opinion which the French, even with superstition, had conceived of her. Our * Writers shew how the course of her life being legally examined by the Bishop of Beauvois (in whose Diocesse shee was taken) and shee thereupon for sorcery, bloudshed, and unnaturall use of man-like apparrell, and habiliments contrary to her Sexe, condemned to dye, was notwithstanding upon her solemne abjuring of such her lewde practises, pardoned her life, till againe convicted of perjurious relapsing, though acknowledging her selfe a * strumpet, and saying to be with child, she deservedly underwent that punishment which shee fought to delay. The rumor of her end, and the ignominious cause thereof, was somewhat incommodious to the affaries of Charles. It was thought that the comming of King Henry to Paris would be much more.

(19) Hee had already with great solemnity received the Crowne of England at Westminster, being about nine yeares old, a most fathionable and waxen age for all impression either of good or bad. The next yeare after his Coronation in England, he passeth over into France, there also to receive the Diademe thereof. The Constableship of England, was before his departure, affigned by Patent, for tearme of life, to Richard Duke of Yorke (which gave him a more feeling of greatnesse, and secretly whetted his ambitious appetite,) upon this occasion. One John Upton of Feversham in Kent Notary, accused John Down of the same place Gentleman, That hee and his complices did imagine the Kings death at his Coronation. The Combate was granted, and in Smithfield (the Duke of Yorke exercising the office of high Constable) they fought in lists. In the end the Kings name was used to part and forgive them. It is a vice to suspect too farre. The Duke of Yorke (a most subtile man) seemes never in heart to have beene a true subject to King Henry: yet no man saith, hee was any author in this. Henry, (the Common-wealth having yeelded to liberall grants of money) is now ready to enter Paris. England remained under the government of the Duke of Glocester.

(20) There is no doubt that the English there, at their Kings presence, set forth their greatnesse to the full shew. The young King attended upon with two English Cardinals, Yorke and Winchester, and great Princes of his bloud, Dukes, Earles, Barons, Prelates, and the flower of our nation, with many, as well French and Burgonians, as Normans and others, excellently well appointed, makes a triumphant entry into the head City of that most noble Monarchy. There was no signe in the People but of joy and welcome, the showes were many and magnificent. Vpon the seventh day of December, hee was solemnely Crowned King of France, by the * Cardinall of Winchester, his great uncle in the * chiefe Church of Paris, called of our Lady. The Duke of Bedford entertained the minds minds of the Assembly with a set speech, wherein he declared, King Henry his Nephewes undoubted title to that Crowne, and commended the same to their fidelities, adding ample promises of honour and emolument. Such of the French Nobility as were present, did their homage. The people had good and gracious words given unto them and certaine * quantities of money, corne, and wine, in the nature of a donative, liberally distributed among them. Proclamations were made, that all French-men who came in by a day there named, should be protected. The Kings Patents and grants touching French matters, passed under the Seale and stile of *Henry King of the * French men, and of England*, which Seale (for variety) wee have prefixed, as we found it annexed * to a writing directed by the King to his Court of Requests in his Palace at Paris; but for English affaires he used another Seale, being in every point like unto that * of King Henry the fourth, and (as some thinke) the very same stampe, (which therefore we have here omitted,) as likewise some * Charters of his there are, whereunto he affixed the seale of his father. Charles of France esteemed not himselfe the lesse a King for all this, but pursues his affaire. His people tooke the City of Chartres by a stratagem, the Bishop whereof (because a Burgundian) they also put to the sword with others. Neither were the English idle. John Duke of Norfolke, Thomas Earle of Arundel, Richard Beauchamp Earle of Warwicke, the Earle of Suffolke, and others, made up this losse with advantage. Their actions are placed by some, as done before the Coronation, which is likely. The King having thus taken possession of France, not long after tooke his farewall thereof. His returne was by Roan, and so overland to Calis, from whence upon the eleventh day of February, hee arrived safe at Dover. His Uncle the Duke of Glocester was able to give an honest, and good account of the Government during the Kings absence. The suppression of an Insurrection, beginning at Abington in Oxfordshire was not the least service. A weaver (the Bayliffe of the Towne) was the ulcerous head, to which that corruption gathered; who had changed his own name, and called himselfe; Iacke Sharpe of Wigmores land in Wales. The speciall colour of his attempt was, * to have massacred Priests; whose heads (hee said) hee would make as cheape as Sheepes-heads; that is, two or three, or ten for a penny. But the mention of Wigmores lands, the ancient inheritance of Mortimer, (then the possession of the fatall Duke of Yorke, who afterward in the right of that name, challenged the Crowne of England from King Henry) insinuates somewhat further. The varlet forfeited his head and foure quarters for his attempt. It is to bee wondred that the Councell of Estate under King Henry, hearing that title so often glanced at, provided not better against the mischiefe. But the eies and hearts of the wise are blinded, when God hath a purpose to reserve a scourge, or to hide the fire which shall afterward be used to consume a nation. Vnquiet humors were aswell abroad as at home. The souldiers of Calis discontented with their wages, as too little, began to be mutinously troublesome. The Regent comes thither in person in Easter weeke, where he exerciseth necessary discipline severely. Foure, the most faulty lost their heads, one hundred and ten are cashiered, and baniſht from the Towne, as sixe-score others had formerly beene. Why dwell wee upon so petty accidents? The losse of the Kingdome of France is imminent. Let us diligently note the degrees which God found out to deprive our Nation of that honour. In this journey of the Regent, King Henries intereſt was not advanced. The Regent (a widdower) roade from thence to Turwin, where (without the Burgundians privity) hee married the Lady Iaquet, aged about * seventeene yeares, * daughter to Peter of Luxemburgh Earle of Saint Paul, no friend to the Burgundian. This was nothing prosperous to the English affaires. For Anne, the Regents former wife, sister to the Duke of Burgundy, being while shee lived, a strong reason and assurance of amitie, weakened the same by her death; and this second marriage, not pleasing the Burgundian, did yet more diminish it. These were but degrees.

In the meane space, the accidents of warre between the English and French, were manifold and perplext, now wee, now they leesing, or gaining, as opportunity served: which uncertainties brought forth their ordinary progenies, fearefull outrages, and * scarcity of all things needfull for the use of man. It would be wearisome, and not much necessary, to recount the particular lesser actions, neither indeed is it casie; for who can readily tell the sieges, surprises, skirmishes, and the like, being so confusedly set down by Authors, wherein divers of both Nations wanne to themselves much honour, and served the uses of those times, and their owne? The uttermost effect of those great labours, was, that the English Regency fell not forthwith into nothing. Permanent leaders in those publike services were the Regent himselfe; their maine Pillar and chiefe life, Thomas Earle of Arundel, Richard Earle of Warwicke, Henry his Sonne, the Lord Willoughby, the thrice noble John Lord Talbot, (who was now at liberty,) the Lord Scales, besides Knights, Esquires, and other valiant Captaines a multitude.

(21) The fortune of Renate Duke of Barre, is nor to bee omitted, for that afterward, our King unluckely married into his house. Hee had to * wife Isabell the daughter, and heire of Charles Duke of Loraine, by whom hee had issue two sonnes, and two daughters, the youngest of which was Lady Margaret, whom King Henry afterward tooke to Wife. Charles Duke of Loraine dying, Renate thinkes to succeed in that Estate. Anthony Earle of Vallemont, brother to Charles, presumes he hath a neerer right. The matter comes to bee determined by blowes. Charles King of France was a stedfast supporter of Renates claime, in lieu of like offices performed by Renate to him in the times of moſt difficulty. The Regent, and Philip Duke of Burgundy, stood for the Earle. Their aydes prevailed so much, that Renates forces were beaten, with losse of about * three thousand, from the siege of Vallemont, and himselfe with not fewer then two hundred others remained prisoner to the Duke of Burgundy, one of whose subjects commanded in chiefe at that enterprise. This * Renate was afterward entituled to the Crowne of Naples, and Sicilia, by the Testament of Ioane Queene of them. The King of France might seeme to have sustained a grievous losse by the enthralment of this Duke: but the English gained nothing thereby: for his perswasions, and private offices on the behalfe of King Charles, did not a little prepare the Burgundians heart (which now was knit to the English, but with feeble Arteries) to accept in time the holy impression of reconcilement. The French, who lived under the Regency, or in danger of the English, made choise of the Burgundian to protect them, which could not be embarred to them, for that hee was as yet King Henries pretended friend. Indeed this Scene and unstable state of affaires was full of horrour, which Polydore Virgil describeth well enough. While the English and French (quoth hee) contend for Dominion, Soveraignty, and life it selfe, mens goods in France were violently taken by the licence of warre, Churches spoiled, men every where murthered, or wounded, others put to death, or tortured; Matrons ravished, Maydes forcibly drawne from out their parents armes to bee deflowred, Townes daily taken, daily spoiled, daily defaced, the riches of the Inhabitants carried whither the Conquerours thinke good; houses and villages round about set on fire: no kinde of cruelty is left unpractised upon the miserable French; omitting many hundreth kindes of other calamities, which all at once oppressed them. Adde hereunto that the Common-wealth being destitute of the helpe of Lawes, (which for the most part are mute in times of warre and mutiny) floateth up and and downe, without any anchorage at right or justice. Neither was England her-self void of these mischiefes, who every day heard the newes of her valiant Childrens funerals, slaine in perpetuall skirmishes and bickerings, her generall wealth continually ebd, and wained, so that the evils seemed almost equall, and the whole Weſterne world echoed the groanes and sighes of either Nations quarrels, being the common argument of speech and compassion throughout Christendome.

(22) The course certainly which the English held, did onely faintly keepe alive the generall State of the Regency, without giving period to the warre, eyther by finishing the Conquest, or setling that which was conquered. Some would have had large supplies of men, and treasure levyed, that King Charles might no where have any rest: Of this opinion were Bedford * himselfe, the Dukes of Yorke and Somerset. This Counsell was not followed, but another, in shew more frugal, which fed the evils, but redressed none. Present sparings doe oftentimes draw after them infinite wasts, and no husbandry proves so ill as unseasonable Parsimonie. In the meane time, the Earle of Arundel, and the Lord Talbot, carry about victorious Armes, and terrifie Anion, Main, and other places, with their successes. In Normandie, nevertheleſſe the common people drew together in huge multitudes. There were three-score * thousand of them rebelliously knotted together in Pexin, Norman, and twenty thousand in Caux. Their purpose was, (through dislike of the English Government, or practise of the French) to have reacht one hand to King Charles, and to have thrust King Henries Officers out. What is a Multitude without advice? To stop their insolency and course which * they held toward Caux, the Earle of * Arundel, and Robert Lord Willoughby, with about thirteen hundred light horse, and sixe thousand Archers, march against them, by direction of the Dukes of Yorke and Somerset, who had the chiefe Lieutenancies in Normandy. They divide their forces to use them with the more advantage. The Earle stayes in ambush with two parts, the Lord Willoughby drawes them into it with the third. A thousand of the Rebels were cut downe before the souldiers hands could be stayed to spare the rest, who basely (as it became them) threw away their weapons, and fel to the earth, crying mercy. The multitudes were suffered to return, their ring-leaders lost their lives. All that the World could collect by this popular Insurrection, was, that the Normans would bee glaidy rid of the English. Nothing else was done. This Earle of Arundel having done sundry noble deedes during the warres in France, received his deaths-wound shortly after in a skirmish at Gerberoy in Beauvoisine, where La Hire (a famous Captaine among the enemies) had the day.

(23) The Regency yet held, and the miseries of France (being burnt up by the fiery reflections of two Counter-Suns) were nothing diminished: Who should give to them a Period? while the Duke of Burgundy continued English, it could not be. To prepare therefore a seperation between them, such of the Nobility as went over to the Burgundian Duke told him, * That King Charles upon all occasions (when speech was mimisired) spake of him honourably, and inwardly wished him well, and that he never heard any mention of the murther committed upon the Duke his father, (cause of the sonnes hatred to France) but hee heartily sighed, protesting hee was neither partie nor privy thereunto. These and the like mollifying salves applyed to the tumors of his revengefull affections, did worke strongly, the rather for that his minde heretofore possessed with the English amitie, was now vacant in that part, the same (by the meanes of sundry jealousies and aversions) lying open to contrary impressions. There wanted but an outward honourable meanes to fashion him entirely to the French party. Let us heare * Serres in this poynt: The Deputies of the Generall Councell presse both French, English, and Burgundians to end all quarrels by some good composition. The Citie of Arras is allowed of them all to treat in. From the * Pope and Counsell of Pisa, there came the Cardinals of S. Crosse and Cypres; with twelve Bishops. For the King of France, there was the Duke of Bourbon, the Earle of Richmond Constable of France, the Archbishop of Rheims, Chancellor of France, and many others, great noble, wise, and learned men. For the King of England, the two Cardinals of Yorke and Winchester, the Earles of Suffolke (* John Holland Earle of Huntington) the Bishops of Saint Davids, Iohn Ratcliffe Keeper of the great Seale, the Lord Hungerford, Ralph, the wise Officiall of Canterbury, and some Doctors of Divinity. For Philip Duke of Burgundy, the Duke of Guelders, the Earle of Nassau, the Bishop of Cambray, Count Fernambourg, the Bishop of Leige; five other great Earles, besides the Deputies of many his best Townes, sufficient to shew, that though he was in title but a Duke, yet that his greatnesse was equall to a King. When it came to communication, the English being also in possession, *urged farther for themselves the right of descent, and the act of Charles the sixth, father to this Charles, by which act the Crowne of France was setled upon Henry the fifth, and the issue of the Lady Katherine his wife, and therefore they propounded no other condition of peace, but that Henry their King might have all, and * Charles to hold of him. The French offered Normandie and Guien.* There ended the hope of agreement between them, for neither party would accept. King Charles therefore resolving to mayme the English faction upon any termes (how baie soever) sends Duke Philip a blanke, bids him therein to preſcribe his owne conditions and demands: he did so: and his Conditions were so unreasonable, and so many, even a great volume full, (saith a French man) as it is strange, so great a Monarch should stoope so much to his subjects and vassall, but that necessitie hath no law. They * joyne hereupon moſt firmely, and the Duke (a man wholly transported by profit) declares himselfe a publique enemy to all the enemies of King Charles, and friend to all his friends. This was the first parting-stroake which severed the French Dominions from the English Soveraignitie: the event declared, that the English had done more wisely, if they had accepted Normandy and Guyen; but as the case stood then, they could not in honour doe it; and Councels are not to be measured by events; for so the moſt foolish may sometimes passe for prudent. King Henry not onely lost now hereby a moſt needfull friend, but was compelled to relye upon his single strengths, aswell against King Charles his naturall enemy, as against the Duke of Burgundy, who plainely seemed to have betrayed the cause. To set a glosse upon this fact, the Duke * dispatcheth Ambassadors into England to King Henry (who, as * Aemylius erroneously saith, was present at this treaty of Arras) to make known the reasons of his peace with King Charles, and to perswade the King to entertaine the same. This Ambassage was so odious to the English, that they forbare not to call the Duke a deceitfull man, a turn-sorver, a perjured person, and a Traytor.

(24) The popular hatred also was such against the Dukes Subjects, reſtant in London, that they were beaten and slaine many of them, before the furie thereof coude be stayed by Proclamation. The Ambassadours returne with honest admonitions to their Master, against which, his eares and senses were strongly mured; for King Charles had set about them as it were a Barricado of royalties, priviledges, honours, money, Cities, Townes, and whole Provinces, which he confirmed to the Duke, onely to with-draw him from us. The whole Counties of * Aux, Erre, Ponthieu, Bolein, Artois, the towne of Abbeville, and other lands, the Cities and Townes in Picardy, upon the water of *Some, Amiens, Corbie, Peron, S. After his Ambassadors returned, he sends backe all contracts to the Duke of Bedford at Paris, and renounceth the alliance of England with a watch word, that every one should looke to himselfe.

(25) Each man hereupon (saith * Serres) sharpens his sword, and scoures his Armes, to recover that by force which they could not obtaine by reason; Serres might better have said, reasoning. All things certainely favoured the French desiignes, for this was the generall estate of the English affaires. King Henry scarse out of his Child-hood; and when he came to mans age, not Man enough to manage so turbulent occurrents; the Princes of the bloud weakely united in love, for the common good; the Protector vigilant over England, the Regent carefull for France, but both privately envied; Richard Duke of Yorke (whose strengths daily increased, which in time he meant nothing lesse then to use for the benefit of King Henry,) ambitiously reserving himselfe for a deare day; most of the great warriers slaine; and in briefe, a great inability (for want of a Soule, willing and fit to looke so sterne and dismall adventures in the face) through the whole body of the Englishs forces; which though otherwise they might have lingred out the warre, and kept their footing, yet the death of the great Duke of Bedford, Regent of France, doubled the difficulty, or rather the impossibility. In taking this triumphant Peere away, God made it manifest, that he held the English unworthy and unfit to continue their Empire among the French any longer. This Prince not long after this revolt of Duke Philip, dyed at * Paris uncertaine to some, whether through griefe of the evils he foresaw, or other malady. But the Analogy and colohr of his whole former life, doth contradict their conceit, who thinke that such a griefe should determine his daies, because it could not but proceed from a kind of feare and despaire, an humour absolutely opposite to Magnanimity, wherein he abounded. How mighty a Prince he was this his * style sheweth: Regent of France; Duke of Bedford, Alanzon, and Anjou, Earle of Maine, Richmond, and Kendale; and Constable of England, But (which excelleth his greatnesse) he was one of the best Patriots and Generals, that ever blossomed out of the royal Reisar of England. His valour was not more terrible to the enemy, then his memory honourable. For (doubtfull whether with more glory to him, then to the speaker) * Lewis the eleventh being afterwards counselled by certaine envious persons to demolish and deface his stately Tombe, (wherein, with him, * saith one, was buried all the Englishmens good fortune in France,) which was erected over his body in the North-side of the high Altar in our Ladies Church at Roan, used these indeed most Princely words.

(26) What honour shall it bee to us, or you, to breake this Monument, and to pull out of the ground the bones of him deadt whom in his life-time, neyther my father, nor your Progenitors with all their puissance, were once able to make flie one foote backward? who by his strength, pollicie, and wit, kept them all out of the principall dominions of the Realme of France, and out of this noble Dutchy of Normandy? wherefore I say first, God save his soule; and let his bodie now lye in rest: which when hee was alive, would have disquieted the proudest of us all: And as for the toombe, I assure you it is not so worthy or convenient, as his honour and acts deserved.

King Lewis his Princely testimony of the late Regents vertues.

(27) The Regent being now dead, the late peace made at Arras betweene King Charles and Philip Duke of Burgundie, presently disclosed, and put forth effects most dangerous to the English; for many Townes voluntarily yeeld, and multitudes of the French, (who hitherto through feare contained themselves) starting away, all the English Dominions were full of private conventicles, practises, and correspondences with the enemy. Such Englishas then were in France, are not altogether sloathfull, but yet, through a fatall either security or negligence at home, there was not speedy sufficiencies of resistance ministred.

(28) Richard Duke of Yorke, (whose services never did good to the English common-wealth) is created Regent of France, and Edmund Duke of Somerset (his perpetuall rivall, or perhaps an intelligent censor of his manners) continues his commands in Normandy. The Duke of Sommerset * opposed the advancement of Yorke to that slipperie dignity. He was no babe in so doing, but more fore-seeing then the Protector, and all the Councell of England: Yet his opposition was unseasonable, and fruitlesse; for the others carriage had wonne such a party about the King, (whom he meant by embracing to pull down) that notwithstanding the disadvantage of his silenced title, which was alone a great cause to have made him everlastingly incapable of so great trust & means he prevailed. But before he could arrive, Paris was lost. Robert Lord Willoughby was Governour there for the English, who had with him but about two thousand, the faith of the Citizens was presumed upon to make up the rest at a pinch, for a common resistance. On the contrary, they perceiving upon what tearmes the English affaires stood in France, chiefly after the late Regents death, conspire against them. The treason was carried so cunningly by some of the principall Magistrates of the Town, who capitulated for a generall pardon from King Charles (which was gladly yeelded unto,) that the mischiefe sooner tooke effect, then it could bee discovered. Thomas Lord Beaumont began the losse with his misfortune; for Arthur Earle of Richmond, Constable of France, hovering about Paris, in hope to recover the same, the Lord Beaumont, with certaine hundreths of English, fell into his danger about Saint Denis, and were distressed. While as yet the terror of this discomfiture (not great in regard of the numbers slaine, but in regard of the Circumstances) was freshest, the French advance their Banners up to the City, where a gate was opened unto them by their partisans. What should the English doe in this generall mischiefe? The townesmen, lately vassals, turne enemies on a sodaine: women and children assaile the English from their windowes with all sorts of misfill things. Many are beaten downe and massacred in the streets. The Lord Willoughby Governour of Paris, Lewis of Luxemburg Bishop of Therouenne, Chancellour of France for the English, the Bishops of Lisieux and Meaux, with other, flie to * S. Anthonies gate, and the Bastile, places which they had reserved for defence till extreame necessity. Many more had beene saved in those places, but that the perfidious Citizens drew chaines thwart the streetes, and empeached their retreat. Heare the rest in a * Erenchmans words.

(29) All runne to the Bastile. The Tournels are presently seized, and all approaches unto the Bastile are soone wonne. Such as were within it, at first made some shew of defence, but all things were prepared to force them: they demand a Parlea, and agree to depart with their lives and baggage. They are conducted about the Towne beneath the Loure, to embarke upon the River of Sein, and so passe to Roan. They could not well have passed through the Citie. The people hereof advertised, *advertised, runne to the walles, and cry out with great shoutes, * baiting the English like Dogs, who in a little before they had feared, and honoured as their masters.* Who of the English reades these things, without indignation? but they are the perpetuall maners of the base multitude, and the fortune therein of the English the same which followeth all like accidents. Some will thinke that the Lord Willoughby, and his people might have done more nobly, to have taken up their graves in the place which they pretended to make good against the French. Fortitude is never separated from Prudence. Succour was despaired. The Duke of Yorke was not as yet arrived, and in maintaining their strengths against the whole City of Paris, and all the present French forces, for the space of about ten dayes, they sufficiently cleared themselves both in point of honour and loyalty. Paris * is thus lost in the worst time for an Army to march in. They did wisely to choose so unseasonable a season, their marker might have else beene marred; for the new Regent (or so much hindred from sooner comming by the Duke of Sommersets emulations, which some affirme, as by the very quality of the winter weather) arrived afterward, accompanyed with the Earles of Salisbury and Suffolke, the Lord Falconbridge, and other worthy persons, with an Army of eight thousand men. But this Regent did never good in France: He who so * writes, might have also safely added, nor elsewhere. The English affaires were not as yet come to the very breake-necke point. They held (in the late conquered parts of France) Normandy entire, though not without much trouble; for the people againe rebell in Caux: but that mischiefe was destroyed with the greater and more merciesse confusion of the authors and actors, then the former. About five thousand of them were trampled to death by the just fury of the English, under the leading of the Lord Scales, the Lord Hoo, and others. They burnt all their dwellings, made booty of their goods, drave their whole numbers out of the country. The Lord Scales not long after discomfited La Hire, and his Company not farre from Roane The warre was handled on all sides without full or compleat armies: Skirmishes were the ordinary formes of fighting. The French were schooled from setling their rest upon a pitcht field. Thus hovered the affaires.

(30) Philip Duke of Burgoigne had as yet in person given no proofe against the English of his affection to King Charles. Now he addresseth himselfe to an enterprise worthy of that expectation, the recovery of Calis. You would suspect that hee continued still a friend to the English, in making choyce of a service, wherein he was most likely to waste his time in vaine, and yet make shew of much forwardnesse; but he was reall, though the rather stirred thereunto by the desire of private revenge. The English, upon his forsaking their alliance, had attempted to kindle the Gauntois, and other of the Flemish Townes (Subjects to the Duke) to rise in rebellion: but the opinion that King Henries fortunes in France were desperatly stooping, made their wils too danke to take fire. The notice notwithstanding of this attempt came to the Duke, which sharpened him to revenge, whereof (as the former passages abundantly declare) hee was not ordinarily thirfty. Hee brings his Army before Callis. Chiefe commanders there for King Henry, were the Lord Dudley who had charge of the Castle, and Sir John Ratcliffe of the Towne. The Dukes purpose was to have cloyed the harbour by sinking ships laden with stones, and such like choaking materials: but upon the ebbe-water the Calisians delivered the haven from that perill. The King of England advertised that his precious Fort and Towne of Calis were thus emperilled, Humphrey Duke of Gloucester the Protector comes in person with a very great Fleete (some write five hundreth saile) to the rescue, and in it a great puissance, with full purpose to give battell; glad perhaps that he might now revenge old grudges. It is able to move choler, to consider how

* Writers torture us with the diversities of reports, but the generall agreement is, that the Duke of Burgundy did raise his siege before he was fought with. Some * say the very rumour of the Protectors approach drave him away, and that the Protector came the next day after the Burgundians flight. Others excuse him (probably enough) in saying that the Flemings grew unweikly to his commandements, and would needs home.

(31) The Protector was master of the Dukes Camp, and spent eleven dayes in his Dominions, burning Popering and Bell, and greatly damnified him about * Gravelen and Bolognois, then setteth he the state of Callis, and * returnes, with great honour to his charge into England. But the English were thought to have created store of worke for this busie Duke at home, where many great tumults rose, in * one of which, his owne person was indangered at Burges, Lisle-Adam the Captaine of his guard being there presently slaine. Hence it came perhaps that a meane * was found, by contracts made with Isabel the Dutcheese, his third wife, (a most witty woman, a Portugesse,) to hold a league with England, and yet no breach with France.

(32) These have hitherto beene the actions of Men, let us not neglect two great Ladies, because much concerning our History depend on their courses. Queene Katherine, the widdow of King Henry the fift, and mother by him of this sixt Henry, about this time departed out of the world. This most noble Lady, when her Husband the King was dead, being not of judgement (by reason of her tender yeares to understand what became her greatnesse, or having found perhaps that greatnesse was no part of happinesse,) secretly marrieth one Owen ap Theodore or Tedor, [b] the most noble and most goodly Gentleman of all the Welsh Nation, and endued with [c] admirable vertues, who drew his descent from holy Cadwallader, last King of the Britaines. This Husband had by her sundry children, two of which, Edmund and Iasper doe beare a part in the royall history, and King Henry the sixt (their halfe-brother) created the first of them Earle of Richmond, the other of Pembroke. This Edmund is he, who by Margaret the daughter of Iohn Duke of Sommerset, (grand-child to Iohn of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster,) had Henry the 7. the most famous and prudent King of England.

(33) In that yeare in which this excellent Queene dyed, the yong Dutcheese Dowager of Bedford (widdow to the late Regent of France) married also (below her degree) a vigorous English Knight, one Sir [d] Richard Woodvile, of which match yet Serres needed not to have spoken so contemptibly, calling him an English adventurer, of small account; the thereby (saith he) giving cause to laugh at her: which censure tasteth perhaps of the French leven and prejudice, because the Lady was sister to the Earle of Saint Paul, who would not make one in the peace of Arras, but held with the English.

(3) But let us see the sequell. Out of this Matrimony also sprung Queenes; for her Husband (afterward made Earle of Rivers) had fundry children by her, whereof Elizabeth being one, had the honour to marry Edward the fourth King of England, and hereby was both her selfe a Queene and a Progenitresse of those glorious Kings and Queenes which followed: for from her and this match sprang another Elizabeth, the renowned Wife of King Henry the seventh, as King Henry himselfe did of the former: both these marriages proved most fortunate to England: but another marriage which then threatned present danger to King Henry, was that which Iames the first King of Scots made with France, who gave his daughter the Lady Margaret, to Lewis the Dolphin for wife, and sent new supplies of men against the English: hee meant also to have attempted some personall hostilitie, but that hee was most wickedly murthered by certaine bloudy Traitors in Perth; suborned thereunto by Walter Earle of Athol, (his

* Holl. Boeth. lib. 17.

(35) Let us now cast our eye to the doings of our new Regent the Duke of Yorke, that we may be witnesses, how farre by his endeavours, the affaires of King Henry were advanced in France. The silence at this time is every where very great, yet had he opportunity to have atchieved somewhat. Two * thousand French horsemen were mutined, and roved up and downe in great disorder. Paris was fearefully punished with famine, and the attendants of famine, pestilentiall maladies. The Countries about lay open: the Courtiers were discontented and divided: Nothing is yet done by our Regent, which * some impute to Edmund Duke of Sommersets opposition, who out of envy and disdaine hindred his dispatch. Wee must in the meane time finde out them that did somewhat. The Duke of Sommerset himselfe, accompanyed with the Lords Talbot and Faucenbridge, with other Gallants, and a competent force of the English, besiege Harflew, which the Normans in the late rebellion tooke from them, and still maintained against them under French Captaines: King Charles sends some of his principall Commanders, with foure thousand men, to rescue the Towne; who did their best, but not able to effect any thing, Harflew was rendred to the Duke.

The Earle of Warwicke becomes Regent into France, and Yorke returnes.

An. Dom. 1438.

(36) In November Richard Earle of Warwicke came as Regent into France, being surrogated in that office to the Duke of Yorke, who returned into England. Hee carried with him a thousand fresh Souldiers, and arrived at Harflew, from whence he repaired to Roane, the chiefe seat (Paris being now lost) of the English Dominions in North France, as Burdeaux was in the South; whither now the Earle of Huntington, with certaine troupes and companies of Souldiers, was sent as Seneschall. This new Regent busied himselfe in the generall affaires of his place. Vnder him the Duke of Burgoins forces were driven from Crotoy: Abbeville freed from the danger of a Bastile, with which the Duke had pent that Towne in; and the English for twenty dayes space together tooke their pleasure in spoyling the Country of Picardy about Amiens and Artois. These and some other actions having beene worthily carried during this Regents government, himselfe dyeth. The Duke of Yorke againe succeeds him. Our interest in France was retained, not so much by King Henries ministers and Armies, as by remissenesse of King Charles, whom also Lewis the Doulphin (afterward King) did greatly trouble by rebellious decessions, and absentments of himselfe. The feare of the English reconciled the sonne to the Father the sooner. King Charles was now false in dislike with his people, but to redeeme his credit, hee attempts the recovery of Pontoyse (a towne neere to Paris) which the Lord Clifford had not long before surprized by stratagems and money (an ordinary meanes as then for the expugnation of places) and comes in person to the enterprise. There attended upon him for that service about ten or twelve thousand men. The Lord Clifford is within, and makes a brave defence.

The siege of Pontoyse.

(37) The Duke of Yorke lately landed in Normandy, as Regent, assembleth his maine strengths, being about seven or eight thousand; offers the French King battell. Hee keepes himselfe within his trenches. The Duke (according to the ancient humor and discipline of the English, who love to set all upon a push) desirous to fight, unexpectedly passeth the River of Oyse, which ranne betweene the two Campes. King Charles dislodgeth so fearefully, that the French doe not over-boldly excuse him of * flying. The Duke having had the spoyle of the French Kings Campe, re-fortifies Pontoyse, and assaults a Bastile, where Charles had left three thousand Souldiers to maintaine the face of a siege. It was held better to pursue the King, who was gotten to Poyse. There the Duke of Yorke against very nobly provokes him to a field. It would not bee; King Charles saw the hazards were not equall, and therefore endures his bravado. He could doe no more, but is of necessity to returne to the maine of his charge in Normandy, and doth so. King Charles ranne into such obloquy and contempt with his people by this dishonourable retreate, but chiefely with the Parisians; that if he had not attempted againe and prevailed against Pontoyse, it might have jeoparded his whole estate; for there was a faction which would have made use of his disgrace. He returnes in great fury to the siege, and finally enters the Towne, not without much bloudshed. Serres faith, that five hundred English left their dead bodies at the breach. The King was one of the first that entred, choosing rather to be thought temerarious then timerous. This exploit established his opinion among the people. A fatiety of warre filled both sides, and the estate of England under King Henry, whose softnesse and lenity gave way to sundry dangerous Court-factions, needed quiet Commissioners to meet at Calis: nothing is concluded but the enlargement of Charles Duke of Orleance, for the summe of three hundred thousand Crownes. He had beene Prisoner in England about twenty and sixe yeares, ever since the Battell of Azincourt, where hee was taken. The Duke of Burgundy was a speciall Actor in his enlargement, with a purpose to secure his owne greatnesse by benefits: this high-borne Prince, for the murther of his Father, being naturally the head and chiefe of that deadly fewde, which had most mortally raged betweene the houses of Burgundy and Orleance. Humphrey Duke of Glocester prudently foreseeing the dangers like to ensue on Orleance his enlargement, stoutly opposed himselfe thereunto, and that upon important reasons which * hee required to have registred, that they might remaine on Record for a testimony and discharge of his duty in that behalfe.

Charles Duke of Orleance set at liberty by the English.

* Rym. Fœder. de Hen. 6. in the copy whereof I had from the learned Master John Clapham.

A short truce and a match concluded for King Henry with the sister of Sonne daughter.

An. Dom. 1444. A. Reg. 22.

1. First, for that the French King wanted discretion and judgement to order his affaires, which defects might be supplyed by the Duke, (being a man of experience and very subtile) if he should be set at liberty.

2. That the said Duke might procure an union of the factions (now hotely maintained in France among the Nobility) to the prejudice of the Crowne of England, and hazard of the losse of the Kings territories in France.

3. That the Dutchy of Normandy (having sustained a great charge in maintaining the warre) seeing the Duke of Orleance delivered, and no royall Army on the English part to withstand the common enemy, was likely enough to revolt.

4. That if the Duke should be delivered, it might be probably conjectured, that he would sooner break his oath, which hee should (being prisoner) make to the King of England, then the oath of his allegeance to the French King his Soveraigne Lord, of whom he holdeth his lands and dignity.

5. If the Articles concluded betweene his Majesty and the French on the Dukes behalfe, should not be performed, what remedy might his Majesty have or expect?

6. That considering his cosen of Huntington was to leave the Dutchy of Guyenne, and for that the alliance betwixt the said Duke, and the Earles of Armignacke and Foix, and the Lord de la Bret, was to be suspected as dangerous, it was very necessary that good provision should bee made for defence of that Countrey, being his Majesties ancient inheritance.

7. That his Majesty hath no allyance with any Christian Prince, but only the King of Portugall (being but of tender yeares, and farre off:) and therefore it was not safe for his Majesty to deliver him, that was likely to prove his Capitall enemy, and to seeke seeke meanes to deprive him of those lands which his noble Father had left him.

8. That if any of his Majesties kindred, or other Lords on that side the Sea, should happen to be taken prisoners, the said Duke of Orleance might ransome foure or five of them.

9. That it were for to take advise of the Lords, and other his Majesties Subjects in the Realme of France, and Dutchy of Normandy, whether they thought it expedient that the said Duke should be delivered or not. Otherwise the world might cry shame thereon, when men should call to minde the losse of his brethren of Clarence, and Bedford, and other noble Personages, in defending and keeping those Lands.

10. If he (the said Duke of Glocester) should consent to the said Dukes deliverance (the same being also quite contrary to the last Will of his Majesties Father) such inconveniences as would ensue thereupon, should be imputed to him.

(38) Notwithstanding, the weight of so many thousand Crownes over-peyed all these important and ponderous reasons; and the warre eates on still in the body of France, but not with so sharpe teeth, nor so full engorgement as before. Townes and people are taken on both sides. The Countie of Amiens was spoyled by the English Lords, Willoughby and Talbot; The Regent and the Duke of Sommerset, march into Anjou, where they charged their carriages with much spoyle, and returned. Then the Duke of Sommerset severs himselfe, and doth sundry exploits in and about Britaine. Diep in Normandy being besieged, was rescued by the Dolphin of France to our losse. The contemplation of these mutuall violences touched all Christendome: for the Turke common enemy thereof, encreased. Ambassadours are sent from all parts, to determine these bloudy differences. William de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, was chiefe for the English. A truce was hereupon taken for eighteene months, betweene King Henry and King Charles, and an hope of perpetuall amitie, weakly grounded upon a match which the Earle of Suffolke contracted for King Henry, with Margaret the daughter of Renate, titulary King of Sicile, Naples, and Jerusalem, Duke of Anjou and Loraine, Prince of the bloud. To effect this, the Earle covenanted that the English should abandon the possession of Anjou, and Main to her Father. A strange purchase of a wife, who though shee brought youth, beautie and hope of a perpetuall Peace with France, (the more profitable opportunitie whereof, the English had more bravely then happily neglected) yet was she otherwise without portion. The Earle notwithstanding (whose drift herein could not be without manifest ambition, to make himselfe one of the greatest of England, by this gratification of the French, with his Masters charge and dishonour) is not abashed to expect publique thankes for this high service, and an whole fifteene for the charge of her transportation. Sundry Lords of Councell, and the King himselfe, thought him worthy, and according to his devise and overture, the whole affaire was carried. Suffolke made Marquesse is sent over with many honorable persons, both men and women, to conduct the faire and goodly (but most unfortunate and fatall) Bride into England. * Polydore gives us no unfitting Character of this Lady. She was provident enough, very desirous of glory, abounding in discourse, counsel, gracious behaviour, and manly courage; but not free from womens humour, which (faith he) is usually vehement and apt to change. In England ye may easily suppose, that she was most royally entertained; Humfrey Duke of Glocester, among others, meeting her with a traine of * five hundred horsemen in a livery, that worthy Poet John Lydgate Monke of Bury, devising the speeches for such gratulatory triumphs as were made at her entrance into London. The King being married lawfully enjoyes her embracements, from which he was often afterward violently separated by the miseries of a most cruell warre, wherein she had her piteous portion. Suffolke in the meane time having the most assured favour of the Queene, pursues his ambitious purposes. She in the meane time was solemnly crowned Queene of England at Westminster upon the * thirtieth of May.

(39) Would to God it stood now with the qualitie of this argument to turne our eyes from the view of those actions which ensued; for here the mournefull tragedies of our poore Country began. But we cannot but open those old and most execrable sores, that, in their example, all true English bloud may the rather be tender over their bowels, beholding such effects as the divell and all the furies of hell were (by Gods severe permission) Actors in. Fabian gives us the causes and contents of those effects, in these grave and few words.

"(40) It appeareth that God was not pleased with that "marriage. For after this day, the fortune of the world "began to fall from the King, so that he lost his friends "in England, and his revennes in France: For shortly "after, all was ruled by the Queene and her Counsell, "to the great disprofit of the King and his Realme, and "to the great maugre (it is Fabians word) and obloquy of "the Queene, who as since hath beene well prooved) "*had many a wrong, and false report made of her. The Parliament in the meane time grants aydes of money, that upon expiration of that truce, there might be prefent abilities to maintaine warre. The Duke of Yorke is revoked, and the Duke of Somerset (in an evill houre) is sent in his place, with such provisions as were repured competent.

* This contract by proxie is said to have beene made in the twentieth yeare of King Henry; and that the Earle of Suffolke was chiefe, if not sole actor in breaking it.

The Duke of Somerset Regent of English France. The Duke of Glocesters troubles.

(41) Humfrey the renowned Duke of Glocester, Lord Protector, felt the first stroke of the evill Angel, which was sent to punish England, and to roote out her Nobles. This Duke was much hated of the Queene, and her faction, as the onely man who by his prudence, as also by the honour and authoritie of his birth & place, seemed to empeach that soveraign command, which they pretended to settle in the Kings owne person, but meant indeed (as the manner is under soft Princes) to raigne themselves in anothers name. Many great Lords were drawne on (at the time of a Parliament then * holden at Saint Edmunds-Bury) to concurre for his ruine, not perceiving, that thereby they pluckt up the floud-gate, at which the Duke of Yorke entered, overwhelming all of them in a deluge of bloud. Whether they had any true or just feare of Glocester himselfe, least perhaps hee should take revenge upon some particular persons among them, is doubtfull, though it be probable enough, that they had. Heare some things that fore-went this Parliament. About five or sixe yeares before, * the Dutchesse of Glocester Eleanor, was convented for witchcraft and sorcery, and afterward endited of treason in the Guild-hall in London, before the Earles of Huntington, Stafford, Suffolke, and Northumberland, and certaine Lords, as Fanhope, and Hungerford, with others, and Iudges of both Benches; of which crime shee was appealed by one Bolingbrook an Astronomer, and Thomas Southwell a Canon, which Southwell was charged to have said Masses over certaine instruments, by which the Astronomer should practise Necromancy against the life of the King. These being taken, accused her as accessary, shee having desired the helpe of their Art, to know what would befall her. Some part hereof she she confessed, for which she was put to publike and solemne penance in London, upon three severall daies, with wonderfull shame to her person, and after shee was committed to perpetuall prison under the Ward of Sir Thomas Stanley in the Castle of Chester, but from thence removed to Kenelworth. Her pride, fallhood, avarice, and lechery were causes of her confusion, saith Stow; who hath set forth that businesse very diligently, though not seeming to attribute much credit to that accusation of treason. The Duke of Glocester her unhappy Lord and Husband (whom shee by love-cups and enchantments was said to have envegled, using therein one Margery Gurdmain a witch of Ey in Suffolke, who was burnt in Smithfield) stung with this reproach, might reasonably be thought not unwilling to doe somewhat. Howsoever that was, his destruction borrowed countenance from that opinion. The Duke therefore being cometo attend in this Parliament at Bure, was arrested of high treason by John Lord Beaumont high Constable of England, the Dukes of Buckingham and Sommerset, with others. Certaine of the Kings houshold were appointed to guard him. Not long after hee was found dead. His body was shewed to the Lords and Commons, as if he had died of a palsey or an apostеme. Of thirtie and two of his servants which were attached, Sir Roger Chamberlaine Knight, Richard Middleton, Thomas Herbert, Arthur Tursey Esquiers, and Richard Nedham Gentleman, were condemned of high treason, and had this unexampled punishment. They were drawne from the Tower to Tiburne, hanged, let downe quick, stript naked, marked with a knife to be quartered, and then a Charter of pardon shewed for their lives by the Marquesse of Suffolke. But the yeomen * of the Crowne had their livelyhood, the executioner their cloathes. Their pardons were thus obtained by the earnest diligence of Doctor Gilbert Worthington, a famous Preacher, Parson of Saint Andrewes in Holborne. Thomas Wilde Esquire the Dukes servant also, being condemned and pardoned among other, had for a preamble in his Letters Patents words importing, * that he had beene one among many other traitors against the King, with Humfrey Duke of Glocester, who went about, and practised, to deliver Eleanor, late wife to the Duke, from out of prison, for which purpose he had gathered a great power and number of men, to come to the Parliament at Bury, there to have contrived the Kings destruction.

(42) Such was the end of this great Prince, who, notwithstanding this open shewing of his body, and these pretended crimes, was by the people of England thought to be doubly murthered, by detraction, and deadly practise. He was not only a true lover of learned men but himselfe also * learned, and (saith our Author) a father of his Countrey. His maine opinion concerning the government of King Henries French dominions, was as mainely opposed by the Cardinall of Winchester, and others, who altogether perswaded Peace, to which the noble Duke (standing precisely upon the honour and Majestie of the English name,) was * an absolute enemy. From this troubled fountaine of divided Councell many following blacke adventures did flow. The Duke thus brought to his end, good men (saith Polydore) fearefull of their owne safeties, did of their owne accord forsake the Court, into whose roomes many succeeded, who for the more part looking how to rise in dignitie made open an easie way for new factions. The Cardinal of Winchester (the other halfe-arch of the Kingdome) over-lived not the Duke above fifteene or sixteene dayes. The whole frame of government was thus drawne to repose it selfe upon the Queene, and such favourites, as the King by her commendation the rather liked.

(43) The Marquesse of * Suffolke, prime man in grace, was created Duke, which made him a more conspicuous marke of envie, then that any shadow of the King or Queene could shelter or protect. *After the Cardinals * death, the affaires in France (where Sommerset was now Regent) where neither duly looked unto, nor the governours of the Country well advised.* But the King and Realme of England lay, much more then France, open to the inevitable, deepe, and pernicious conspiracies of Richard Duke of Yorke. He (by the errour of King Henry, and the evill starres of our Countrey) being of himselfe a great Prince, and growne stronger by affected popularitie, perceiving the King to be a Ruler, and not to Rule, began secretly to allure his friends of the Nobility, and privily declared to them his title to the Crowne, as likewise he did to certaine Governours of Cities and Townes, which attempt was so politickly and closely carried, that his provision was ready, before his purpose was opened. The very state of things invited this fatall conspiracy: a milder King then England was worthy of; a Councell out of favour with the people; manifold losses and dishonours abroad; a turbulent and jealous condition of things at home. Of all which and much more, the Duke of Yorke, having King Henry the fourth (the enemy of his house (for a perillous example, made his precious use, cherishing the popular aversions, without seeking to redresse any evils, but representing them worse then they were, thereby to ripen that breach of loyaltie in the hearts of men, which his ambition wrought upon. His displacement from the Regency of France, did not a little (perhaps) offend him at first, because the Duke of Sommerset got it over his head; but it will not be long, before Sommersets evill carriage of that truft, and the declining fortune of England, will give him occasion to rejoyce at the foyle of his dreaded enemy. Let us not be long in the rehearsall of the publique shame and dammage of our nation.

The Duke of Sommerset (a proud man (saith Serres) who thinking to do better then the reſt, did absolutely ruine the Englisſh affaires) contrary to good discipline, cherishing his souldiers in their riots and disorders, neglected the justice of Nations in that point. The French make this their example, and surprize Port de l' Arch, and towne after towne, so many and so fast, that King Charles (who, that he might have God on his side, and wrong on his enemies, contained himselfe with great modesty, till * he saw all quiet restitution desperate) recovered Roan, Cane, and all Normandy within a short space after.

(46) But the odour of his vile successe in France, comming into England, filled mens hearts and senses with great perturbation. The Queene and Suffolke

Suffolke suffer obloquie for these effects in the generall judgement. The Common-wealth is not silent. A Parliament is called to be holde at Westminster, which from thence was assigned to be kept at Leicester. The place likes not; few appeare. It is brought backe to Westminster. There the whole body of publike counsell meets. Many * Articles are exhibited by the lower house against the Duke of Suffolke, wherein hee is charged with evill demeanour, misprision and treason: who thereupon is committed prisoner to the Tower: from thence, within foure or five weekes he is discharged, which more augmented the generall indignation then his commitment had ministred satisfaction. The perilous Duke of Yorke warmes himselfe at these blazes, and under-hand cherisheth them as opportunity will permit, having his cunning factors and instruments fit for such occasions secretly spread over the Realme, to instill the poysons of discontentment, and desire of change into the giddy multitude. When we reade in our vulgar Chronicles, that about this time Adam Molins Bishop of Chichester, Keeper of the Kings Privy Seale (through the procurement of Richard Duke of Yorke) was by shipmen slaine at Portsmouth, and yet no cause of so foule and wicked a murther expressed, it cannot but offend any curious Reader, who would receive satisfaction rather by the reason of actions, then by the events. His guiltinesse in the fact was so apparant, that King Henry in his answer, made a yeare or two after to the Dukes dissembling and deceitfull letter, confidently mentioned the same, where thus he speaketh. *Sooth it is, that long time among the people hath beene upon you many strange language, and in speciall anon after your disordinate and unlawfull slaying of the Bishop of Chichester, divers, and many of the untrue shipmen and other, said (in their manner) words against our state, making menace to our owne person by your sayings, that yee should be fetched with many thousands, and you should take upon * you that which you neither ought, nor as we doubt not will attempt, &c.* What cause led the Duke to commit this so impious a deed, may easily now be conjectured, being none other but the common hatred he bare to all such wise or valiant persons, as might in any fort uphold the most just & gracious Henrys; & this sincerity in the Bishop could not be but a grievous crime in the Dukes ambitious eyes, whose greatnesse was even then too intollerable; for where was the Kings justice when such a fact might hope of impunity? The Duke did effect it by his bloudy complices, as he did many other most seditious and perfidious things, while hee was absent in Ireland. Thomas Thanie notwithstanding, calling himselfe Blew-beard, being a Fuller of Canterbury, and attempting to gather the people, miscarrieth in his treason, and for that was hanged and quartered: this was a preamble to the following tumults. The Duke of Yorkes whole and onely hopes were reposed in the generall perturbations of his Countrey.

(47) The Duke of Suffolke (a principall pillar of King Henries safety) being set at liberty, attends the King and Queene in their Parliament at Leicester. Behold the humour of the Commons which were sowred with the pestilent leaven of Yorkes conspiracy. They cannot endure the sight of this Prince, because his re-advancement seemes done in despight of them. Calumniations and odious surmises are exhibited against him: he must downe, to make way for King Henries most unworthy ruine. The most vile part of this Parliamentall accusation was, that they should charge that for a crime upon Suffolke, which themselves had universally in another former Parliament assented unto, and ratified. Which was the delivery of Aniou and Main upon the marriage, concluded (for the good of England, if others had not inverted or interrupted the successe by their temerity) with Renate, Father of Queene Margaret. Neither did the envy only of the secret Yorkists overlade this noble Gentleman, but the impotency of the Duke of Sommersets faction, whose rashnesse and vanity having lost all Normandy, would gladly find any others shoulder, upon which to cast the imputation, either in part or whole. In that former Parliament assembled immediately upon Suffolkes returne from that treaty with Renate out of France, this was the summe of the whole proceedings: Suffolke (as he was very eloquent) made knowne to both Houses, his counsels and services, and the effect of his Embassie, praying they might be approved, and enrolled for his discharge. Whereupon * the next morrow, Burley, Speaker of the lower house, and the body thereof, repaired to the Kings presence, then sitting among the Lords, and there * humbly required, that the requeſt of the Marquesse (afterward created Duke of Suffolke) might be granted: and the Lords made the like petition, kneeling on their knees. The King condiscended to their desires, and so the whole matter was recorded for his acquitall.

The Duke of Yorke pursueth his end.

* This was in An.Dom. 1446.

(48) What can be more evident? or who can enough admire the vanity of popular mutability? The Duke (the principall marke, though the Bishop of Salisbury, the Lord Say, and others were also accused) unable to stand the push of so generall an opposition, must be banished. The King unwillingly gives this sentence against the Duke, or rather against his owne life and safety: five yeares are limited to his exile. Being upon the sea, hee is taken by his enemies, who at Dover-road stroke off his head upon the side of a Cocke-boat. This divellish murther (for it was none other, the Kings authority being not used therein) committed upon so great a Prince, was the lesse pittied, for that he was noysed among the people to have beene a privie actor in the noble Duke of Glocesters death, who perished (saith a learned * Authour) by the fraud and practise of a woman, (belike) Queene Margaret. The Bishop of Salisbury beforesaid, more impiously, and irregularly lost his life in the following tumults, being murthered (after he had finished divine Service) by his owne Tenants, who dragged him from the Altar to an hill-top, and there (while hee was making his last prayers) cleft his sacred head: The Lord Say Treasurer of England, fell likewise into the peoples fury, and had his head cut off by the commandement of that execrable Rebell Iacke Cade, at the Standard in Cheape, as yee shall hereafter learne.

The bloudy effects of the Duke of Yorks popularity.

(49) *This William Duke of Suffolke * was indeed a great and worthy person; for when his Father, and three Brothers had valiantly powred forth their lives for their Countrey in the warre of France, he served in them foure and thirty yeares, in seventeene of the which hee never returned home, hee was once taken prisoner, being then but a Knight, and payed for his ransome twenty thousand pounds sterling, he was fifteene yeares Privy Counsellour, and thirtie yeares Knight of the Garter.* Notwithstanding all which, the same Authour truely addeth: *That as for these causes he was in highest grace with the King, so he was the more disgracious or hated of the people, and for * certaine very sleight matters, and those not very apparant, hee was driven into banishment, and* (as you have already heard) was intercepted upon the Sea in his passage to France, and by his adversaries killed. What honest heart doth not melt at the relation of these violent contempts of all Religion, honor, reason and justice? yet are they but the drops which doe fore-goe those many bloudy showres, which the cloud of Yorkes faction rainde upon our miserable Nation. They who murthered this great triumphant Gentleman, were certaine persons who wafted upon the Seas in a Barke called the Nicholas of the Tower, which belonged to John * Holland Duke of Excester, Constable of the Tower of London, whom Gods revenging hand shall not leave unpunished.

(50) The Yorkists having thus rid Suffolke out of the way, thought it now a fit season to spring their practise. Hereupon the Commons of Kent, (who have seldome refrained in such turbulent times) while the Duke of Yorke was a yet in Ireland, take Armes. One Iacke-Cade is their Captaine: hee had beene the servant of a Suſſex Knight, Sir Thomas Dagre; kils a woman with Childe; abjureth the land; turnes French; ſwearing ſervice to them, and now returning, is the inſtrument to hang out Mortimers name, like a flag, to draw a party, faining himſelfe to be a Coſen to the Duke of Yorke. A peſtilent deviſe, to ſound the affections of the multitude, and to proclaime the Title to the Crowne, which the Duke (as heire of that family) afterward challenged; for who would not aske, what ſhould moove him to uſe the name of Mortimer? This Cade, whom ſome (by contraries) call Iohn Amend-all, (that is, John Marre-all) having drawn great numbers to follow him, encamps at Blacke-Heath by Greenewich, and in his writings cals himſelfe the Captaine of Kent. His pretences (as of all like diſloyall actions) were the common good, and ſuch other. The King at the report of theſe ſtirres, is ſtirred. The Captaine of Kent demands,

(51) Thus traiterouſly, to the Kings welfare, and ſcandalouſly to his moſt gentle government, writes this arrogant Captaine of Rebels. The King upon view of theſe braves, beginnes to feele the indignity and danger. An Armie is raiſed, Cade retires to Sevenoke in Kent. The King ſuppoſing hee had fled, ſends after him * Sir Humfrey Stafford Knight and other Gentlemen, with ſome forces. Wee reade none of theſe things without a ſuſpition, that the King was alwayes betraied by ſuch hypocrites about him, as would not have him proſper. Marke the event. At Sevenoke Cade abides, probably not without encouragement from ſecret Traitours, and after long fight ſlew Sir Humfrey, with many others. He armed himſelfe in the dead Knights abillements, with guilt ſpurres. The King and Queene hearing of this miſhappe, leave the Tower of London to the cuſtody of the Lord Scales, and of that renowned Elquire Mathew Gough; and London it ſelfe to the Lord Maiors fidelity, themſelves departing to Kenilworth. The headlong crewes of London favour the Rebell, and give entrance. Robert Horne Alderman, like an honeſt wiſe man, would have had them reſiſted. This free neceſſary ſpeech endangered his life; honourable in his memory for the hazard onely, what ſhould hee have beene if hee had gloriouſly loſt it? but money buyes out his perill with the Tyrant, who fined him at * five hundred Markes. The time was very ſlippery and looſe; for the Eſſex-men alſo were encampted upon Mile-end by London: All men are afraid of their own eſtates; ſuch ſecret well-wiſhings attended upon the Arch-Rebels pretences. The King before he had left London, was enforced (by ſuch hollow friends as were about him) to commit the Lord Say, Treaſurer of England to the Tower, after that the valiant and loyall Sir Humfrey Stafford was ſlaine, and the newes of his unlucky deſeate were confirmed.

It is needleſſe to be particular in this Rebels behaviour: The next day he returnes, and the Lord Say is beheaded in Cheapſide (as is before ſaid) at Cades commandement, and his body cut into quarters. The King being by the loſſe of ſo truſty and grave a ſervant, not a little weakened.

(53) The next tragedy was Cromeres an Eſquire, and high Sheriffe of Kent, (the Lord Sayes ſonne in law) who is drawne out of the Fleet (and to appeaſe the Eſſex Rebels) ſacrificed, by beheading, without any tryall, at Mile-end. The Citie ſtirres not for all this. Malpas and Gerſtie, two rich Citizens, at whoſe houſes Cade had ſeverally dined, being ſpoyled and robbed by him (leſt perhaps it might appeare, that he who durſt commit treaſons, had not alſo the heart to commit felonies) teach what others are to expect. The Maior, Thomas Chalton and the wiſer wealthy ones, over-ruled by faction till then, ſee their danger now, and ſecretly ſend to the Lord Scales for ayde. Mathew Gough at night is come among them as ſent by him. The Kentiſhmen, hearing their entry was barred, runne furiouſly to armes. Cade endeavours to open his way by force; but in deſpight of all his power, the Citizens made good and defended London-bridge againſt him, though with the loſſe of many valiant and honeſt men, for the conflict endured all night, till nine in the morning. Among ſuch as were ſlaine on the Kings ſide, were John Sutton Alderman, Mathew Gough himſelfe, and Robert Heyſand Citizen. This Gough (an Eſquire of Wales) was a man of excellent vertue, manhood, and zeale to his Countrey, and of great renowne in the warre of France, where he had ſerved with ſpeciall commendations faithfully, for the ſpace of above twenty yeares. His deſerts at this time deſerved a Statue in the City, for whoſe ſafety hee ſpent his laſt bloud. To give a quicke end to theſe miſeries, impunity is proclained for all offenders, and ſent to them in the Kings name by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Lord Chancellour, under the great Seale of England: the rebels are ſcattered with this aſſurance of their ſafeties, and every man retires in peace from following ſo peſtilent an Impoſtor. A * thouſand Markes (when Cade afterward attempted new troubles) are promiſed to him, who kils or takes this counterfeit: Mortimer. Alexander Eden, a Gentleman of Kent, had the happineſſe to diſcover and kill him at Hothfield in that County: his wretched carkaſe was brought to London, where his faſe head was ſet ſentinell upon London-bridge, and his quarters were advanced for terrour in ſeverall parts of Kent. There died alſo by the ſtroke of Iuſtice twenty and ſixe more, wherof eight were executed at Canterbury, and the reſt elſewhere in Kent and Suſſex. The multitude it ſelfe * came naked in their ſhirts to the King on Black-heath, humbly praying mercy, which they obtained.

(54) The Kentiſh rebellion thus pacified, farre greater and farre more dangerous troubles enſued, as it faareth in humane bodies, which relapſing into ſickneſſes, are ſhaken ſo much the more terribly.* Theſe troubles had their fountaine and mediate Originall from Richard Duke of Yorke, no degenerous ſonne of that Richard whom King Henry the fift had created Earle of Cambridge, and enriched with much wealth, honouring him above others, in regard of his bloud and parentage; *but * no bounty, nor benefits could change a treacherous diſpoſition*, for (as you have heard before) he

he conſpired to murther his Benefactor King Henry the fifth, as the Duke of Yorke (his true progeny) laboured to diſpoſe this King Henry his advancer. The humours of the popular body, were, in the laſt commotion, not obſcurely diſcovered. The Commonweale had perhaps ſome few enormities, through the abuſe of Magiſtrates and men in place, but yet ſuch, as the malady was infinitely leſſe pernicious then the remedy. Vpon this intelligence the Duke comes ſuddenly out of Ireland, and to begin his uſurped cenſureſhip and dictature, apprehends * Iohn Sutton Lord Dudley, Reignald Abbot of Saint Peters at Glaſtenbury, and another, whom he impriſoneth within his Caſtle of Ludlow. (55) Yorke ſeeing this, doth finde that Suffolke periſhed in vaine, if Sommerſet held like graces againſt whoſe perſon he had a particular pretence of quarrel, for that the City of Cane in Normandy, which was the Duke of Yorkes charge, was rendred up to the French by him, when the Engliſh affaires grew deſperate in thoſe parts; Sr. David Hall Knight, being at that time Captain there for his Lord and Maſter the Duke of Yorke, and not allowing it, although the renowned Talbot himſelf was preſent at the render, and became an hoſtage for performance of the Capitulations. Yorke hereupon conſults with his ſpeciall friends, Richard Earle of Salisbury, and Richard his ſon, (who was afterward that moſt feditious and great fighting Earle of Warwick) Thomas Courtney Earle of Devonſhire, Edmund Brooke, Lord Cobham; and others, how Yorke might get the Crowne of England, and for that cauſe how to ruine or fret out the Duke of Sommerſet, who ſtanding, they were to looke for ſtrong oppoſition. In the end, they conclude to take armes, but yet to ſmother the mention of the Duke of Yorkes Title, giving out to the world for the reaſon of their doings, that they meant all honour and obedience to King Henry, and onely to remove certaine bad men from about his perſon, who afflicted the people, and made a prey of the Common-wealth: which, to gaine the more credit, and to blind the good king, the ſubtile Duke declares by Proclamation; *wherein, thus ſpeaketh that ambitious Hypocrite. God knoweth, from whom nothing is hid, I am, have beene, and ever will be, his true Liege-man, &c. And to the very proofe it is ſo, I offer my ſelfe to ſweare that on the bleſſed Sacrament, and receive it, the which I hope ſhall be my ſalvation at the day of doome, &c. In that it was the evill hap of the Duke of Sommerſet, that Normandy was loſt during his Regency, his enemies had the more commodity to incommodate him with the people, who forbare not at his returne to offer to him ſundry diſhonours and injuries, till upon paine of death they were reſtrained, for breach of which Proclamation, one had his head cut off in Weſt-Cheape London.

The Duke of Yorke takes armes upon pretence to reforme the State.

An. Dom. 1452. *Pat. 31. Hen. 6. m. 6 at the Dukes Caſtle of Ludlow. Hypocriſie hath a dictionary of diſſimulation in his poſſeſſion.

The King marcheth againſt the Duke of Yorke.

(56) The King (notwithſtanding all his Coſens Arts and diſſimulations) ſeeing the hooke through the baite, and the Snake through the graſſe, by the adviſe of his truſty friends, chiefly of Edmund Duke of Sommerſet, thinkes not fit to relie upon his enemies good nature, but having a ſtrong power, and ſtore of honourable men to conduct them, hee marcheth toward Wales againſt the Duke. The King did herein wiſely, but not ſo much as the cauſe required. Yorke having notice of the Kings approach turnes aſide, and withall ſpeed marcheth toward London. That Citie, (the vain hope of all rebellions,) would not hearken; Thereupon hee ſlides with his people into Kent, the neſt of his hopes, and at Brent-Heath neere Dertford (a towne about twelve miles from London) encampeth, meaning to fight. The King is not ſlow, but leaving his march toward Wales, pitcheth up his Royall Pavillion upon Blacke-Heath, with a purpoſe to teach his Coſen of Yorke more duty. Behold the fortune of England. God puts an excellent opportunity into the Kings hands, of tearing up the danger of his houſe by the rootes, for the Duke was farre inferiour in numbers. Such therefore as ſecretly favoured him, fearing his overthrow, were willing to adviſe a reconcilement. Meſſengers goe betweene the hoaſts. The Duke in his wonted manner, *pretends loyalty and particular injuries, as that the Kings ſervants, Sir Iohn Talbot at Holt Caſtle, Sir Thomas Stanley in Cheſhire, and others in other places, were ſet to beaken upon him. That by * two of the Norrices, Bulkley, Gruſt, Bould, (and other Gentlemen) hee was forbidden to land at Bewmaris, or to have any refreſhment, affirming that he* (the Duke of Yorke) was againſt the Kings intent, and as a Traitor. The King ſtoopes ſo much as to anſwer the letter, letting him to know: That the ſuſpicion univerſally conceived of his behaviours moved thoſe effects: nevertheleſſe, in regard of the humble obedience which was now proteſted, hee, for the eaſing of the Dukes heart, doth declare, repute, and admit him as a true and faithfull ſubject, and as his welbeloved Coſen. The Duke then advanceth his practiſe one ſtep further, and writes to the King, that Iuſtice might be done upon all perſons of what degree ſoever, which were guilty, or noyſed to be guilty of treaſon: aiming at the Duke of Sommerſet, whom he doubted not to overwhelme with ſleights and calumnies, as hee and his had done the Duke of Suffolke.

The Kings army being greater then the Dukes, peace is unhappily made.

* Exiſterit Regi & Duci.

(57) The King is contented (ſuch weake or treacherous Counſels hee relied upon,) that Sommerſet (for his ſatisfaction) ſhould be commanded priſoner to his * owne houſe; and Yorke (having firſt diſſolved his Armie) ſhould come in perſon, and put himſelfe into the Kings hand. When he was come, hee exhibites a great complaint againſt the Pride and Avarice of the Duke of Sommerſet, and cunningly accuſing none but him, hee ſeekes the good will of all others. A cunning drift as any, conſidering that hereby he derived upon his enemy all the envie of the people, and left him ſingle to withſtand the effects. Sommerſet (a Prince of great ſpirit and wit) not thinking it reaſonable, as well in regard of his owne honour as the Common-wealths intereſt, to endure ſuch indignitie, preſents himſelfe to the King againſt his accuſer, and reſolving not to be tender-mouthed in the ſo apparent perill of the King and Realme, whoſe quiet was undermined, anſwers Yorke face to face, and, in plaine tearmes, accuſeth him of highest Treaſon, as having conſpired to depoſe the King, and take upon himſelfe the Soveraignety: vehemently urging: That * the Duke of Yorke might bee committed and arraigned, to the intent that by his deſerved death, and the diſ-enablement of his ſonnes, Civill warre might be extinguiſhed, praying finally that God would not ſuffer the enemy of the King dome to eſcape the hand of Iuſtice.

* Polyd. Virg. lib. 23.

* The Duke of Sommerſet confidently accuſeth the Duke of Yorke of Treaſon.

(58) This had in likelihood beene done, but that the publique faith ſeemed to ſtand engaged for the Dukes indemnity, hee having come in upon the Kings word, and alſo for that the hearts of men were not well aſſured to the King, which by executing Yorke would perhaps have beene more unſetled, becauſe (not looking into the depth of the Kings perill) it would have beene thought that he had beene deſtroyed to gratifie Sommerſet, and not to ſecure the Realme. There was hope likewiſe to recover Aquitaine, for that Burdeaux had offered to returne. Laſtly, the Dukes ſonne and heire, Edward Earle of March (after King) was reported to be ready with a great force of Welſhmen to ſuccour his Father. Vpon theſe and other reaſons, the Duke is no longer reſtrained, as upon Sommerſets moſt weighty accuſations he had beene, and to aſſure the gentle and indulgent King of his alleageance, hee makes his ſubmiſſion, and ſolemnely TAKES HIS OATH to be true, faithfull and obedient ſubject. This was done upon the tenth of March in the Church of St. Paul in London, the King himſelfe, and moſt of the chiefe

"I Richard Duke of Yorke, confesse and be knowne
"that I am and ought to be humble subiect and Liege-
"man to you my Soveraigne Lord, King Henry the sixth,
"and owe therefore to beare you faith and truth, as to

"shall with all speed and diligence possible to mee, make,
"that your Highnesse shall have knowledge thereof, and,
"over that, doe all that shall possible bee to mee to the "withstanding, and let thereof, to the uttermost of my "life: I shall not any thing take upon mee against your
"royall estate or obeisance that is due thereto, nor suffer
"any other man to doe, as farre foorth as shall be in my "power to let it. And also shall come at your comman"dement, wheresoever I shall bee called by the same, in "humble and obeisant wise, but if I be letted by any sicke-
"nesse or impotency of my person, or by such other cause
"as shall be thought by you my Soveraigne Lord reaso"nable. I shall never hereafter take upon mee to gather

"out your commandement, or license, or in my lawfull
"defence, in interpretation or declaration of the which "my lawfull defence, I shall report me at all times to "your Highnesse, and if the case require to my Peeres; nor "any thing attempt against any of your Subiects, of "what estate, degree, or condition that they be. But "wheresoever I finde my selfe wronged and agreeved, I "shall sue humbly for remedy to your Highnesse, and
"proceed after the course of your lawes, and none other"wise, saving in mine owne lawfull defence, in manner
"aboveseid, and otherwise have to your Highnesse as "an humble and true subiect ought to have him to his "Soveraigne Lord. All these things aboveseid I pro"mise you truely to observe and keepe, by the holy Evan"gelists contained in the Booke that I lay my hand here
"upon, and by the holy Crosse I here touch, and by "the blessed Sacrament of our Lords body, that I shall
"now with his mercy receive. And over I agree mee
"and will, that if at any time hereafter, as by the grace
"of our Lord God I never shall, any thing attempt by "way of feate, or otherwise against your Royall Maje"stie and obeisance, that I owe thereto, or any thing
"take upon mee otherwise then is above expressed, I
"from that time forth to be unabled, held, and taken as "an untrue and openly for-sworne man, and unable to "all manner of worship, estate, or degree, bee it such as "I now occupie, or any other that might in any wise
"grow to mee hereafter. And this I have here promi"sed and sworne proceedeth of mine owne desire and "free volunt, and by no constraining nor coaction. In "witnesse of all which things above written, I Richard "Duke of Yorke above writ, subscribe with mine owne
"hand and seale.

This oath he also tooke at Westminster and Coventrie at sundry times. Who now can consider the effects of this so publique and solemne Oath, and doth not tremble in every part? Let us hasten to their view, left God perhaps may quietly seeme to have beene mockt to his face by a vaine ambitious man.

Hope conceived to recover Gascoigne.

(60) To divert these home-breeding rancors and practises, by employing the wits and bodies of men in other more honest things, the Earle of Candal (sonne * to Captal de Budie, who had upon necessitie submitted his Segnories to Charles the French King, but reserved his person out of that obedience) and the Lord L'Esparre, come secretly from Burdeaux and pray an Armie, for that Burdeaux and the Gascoignes would returne to the English, if they might be supported. An Army is decreed for their reduction. John Lord Talbot, the first Earle of Shrewsbury of his name, as Generall in that enterprize, lands in Gascoigne, where he doth sundry exploits, and the fame of his former chevalrie flying before with terrour, makes many places the rather to yeeld. Burdeaux her selfe secretly opens a gate unto him, which the French Garrison perceiving fled out of a Postern, but many being overtaken were slaine by the Lord L'Esparre and the English. New supplies and victuals arrive, whereof the Earle of Shrewsburies younger Sonne, (Viscount Lile by his Wife,) was a principall conductor. Burdeaux thus throughly man'd and fortified, the Earle is advertised that the French lay at siege before Castillon, a place of importance upon the river of Dardonne. Thither the Earle marcheth, and with too great a confidence charging the enemy upon unequall termes, was there slaine together with his sonne the Viscount Lile, and others. Burdeaux received such as fled. The English fortunes and hopes which began to quicken, made this unhappy Catastrophe in * Iuly, to the infinite losse of our nation and griefe of the Gascoignes, who generally misliked the French, and inclined to the English, having so honorably, and for so long a time governed those dominions. This was the end of that great Earle, after he had for the space of twenty and foure yeares served his Prince and Countrey in the French warres, with highest commendation; * a most Noble and most valiant man, by whose vertue the English name did chiefly become terrible in France. Burdeaux it selfe, and all other places after this, were by siege brought againe under the French King, who profecuted those affaires in person. From that time forward the English never obtained there any hold or further footing, the felicity of this attempt breaking all combinations of the Gascoignes. This Dutchy of * Aquitaine contained foure Archbishopricks, foure and twenty Bishopricks, fifteene Earledomes, two hundred and two Barons, and above a thousand Captain-ships and Baliwicks. The losse of so goodly an inheritance, which had continued English for almost three hundred yeares, the world may easily conjecture how justly it was grieved and lamented for. In this false estate of the English, the Queene upon the thirteenth day of October, was delivered of her first sonne, who was named Edward, prooving the childe of sorrow and infelicity.

(61) It were to be wished we might now rather number the following evils of England, then describe them; for, what can we learne out of such unnaturall and savage destructions, but matter of horrour and detestation? but fith they must be handled, (the law and necessity of our taske exacting it,) the sooner to be quit of so unpleasing objects, it will be best abruptly to thrust into the narration. The Duke of Yorke (wickedly careless of an oath so religiously and publiquely taken,) to make his way to the Crowne more easie, hath now procured his chiefe and most feared enemy the Duke of Sommerset to be suddenly arrested of High Treason, (doubtfull whether by any authority but his owne) in the Queens great Chamber, and sent to the Tower of London, upon pretence that he had capitall matter to charge him with. Yorks principall friends (upon confidence of whom hee dared so high things) were Richard Nevill Earle of Salisbury, second sonne of Ralfe Nevill Earle of Westmorland, whose daughter the Duke of Yorke had married. This Richard was Earle of Salisbury in right of Alice his Wife, sole heire to Thomas Montacute, the famous Earle, slaine at the siege of Orleance. The Dukes other maine hope was Richard Nevill (Sonne of the former Richard Nevill,) who in right of his Wife, the Lady Anne, (sole-sister, and heire of the whole bloud to Henry Beauchampe Duke of Warwicke) was by this King Henry the fixth created Earle of Warwicke, in a most unhappy houre both for the King and Kingdome, being * Invicto animo &c. a man a man of an undaunted minde, but flitting faith.

The King marcheth to Saint Albans against the Duke of Yorke.

(62) The King in the meane space, while the Duke of Sommerset was thus endangered, lay sicke; and Yorke (as Regent) swayed and over-swayed in Court; but when the King (perceiving malice and practise to be the chiefe bases of Yorkes accusations) had recovered his health, and resumed the government, Sommerset is set at liberty, and made Captaine of Calis; Yorke and his adherents repayre to open force: They levy their army about the Marches of Wales, with which they repayre toward London, the maine object of Prerendents. The King hearing of his enemies approach, is accompanied with Humfrey Duke of Buckingham, Edmund Duke of Sommerset, Humfrey Earle of Stafford, Henry Piercie Earle of Northumberland, Iames Butler Earle of Wiltshire and Ormond, Beaufort Earle of Dorset, Iasper Teder Earle of Pembroke the Kings halfe-brother, Thomas Courtney Earle of Devonshire, the Lords, Clifford, Sudley, Berners, Rosse, and others, and with them enters into Saint Albans in warlike manner, having certaine thousands of common Souldiers. Thither also the Duke of Yorke and his adherents came. This was toward the end of May: The Dukes request to the King was, that hee would deliver such persons to be deservedly punished as he would name. The King (to let them know who he was) returnes this confident answere: That hee and the rest were Traitors, and that rather then they should have any Lord from him who was with him at that time, he himselfe would for their sake in the quarrell upon that day live and die.

(64) The Yorkists hereupon assaile the Kings people within the Towne, and Warwicke breaking in through a Garden, a sharpe battell is begun. The losse fell lamentably upon King Henries side; for besides the Duke of Sommerset, there were slaine the Earles of Northumberland and Stafford, the Lord Clifford, with sundry worthy Knights and Esquires, of which forty and eight were buried in Saint Albans, there being slain above five thousand of King Henries party, and of the Yorkists about sixe hundreth. The King himselfe was shot into the neck with an arrow; & other of his chief friends were likewise sore wounded and taken. The Earle of Wiltshire, and Thomas Thorpe Lord chiefe Baron of the Exchequer, with others, saved themselves by flight. The Duke of York, the Earles of Salisbury and Warwick, with the King, (whom they in shew did use most reverently, and as if they had meant nothing unto him but good faith) upon the morrow ride to London, where in Iuly immediately following, a Parliament is holden in King Henries name. The fore-runner whereof was a Comet, or Blazing-Starre, which appeared in the moneth of Iune, the beames whereof extended themselves into the South. The first popular act of this assembly was, to restore the memory of Humfrey Duke of Glocester to honour, declaring him to have beene a true subiect to the King and Realme.

Humfrey Duke of Glocester declared to have been a true subiect.

(65) The next provisions which the Yorkists made, were for themselves, and their owne security, willing and commanding that the Duke of Yorke and his partakers should incurre no blame by reason of the journey at Saint Albans: the whole fault whereof was laid upon the dead Duke of Sommerset, the Lord Chiefe Baron, and one William Ioseph Esquire, who (say they) kept from the King a pacificatorie Letter which the Duke of Yorke had sent. It is a wonder and a shame to reade how officiously these violent Lords (meaning nothing lesse) behaved themselves to the King, of whose Majesty they will needes seeme to be the onely Champions and Conservators. The Duke of Yorke in the same Parliament creates himselfe Protector of England, the Earle of Salisbury is made Lord Chancellour, and the Earle of Warwicke (his sonne) Captaine of Calis: they spared as yet to touch King Henries life, because the people did wonderfully honour, esteeme, and reverence him for his singular holinesse, and for that he had great friends left alive, and a sonne. In the meane space, that they might without trouble, and at their pleasure, uncrowne or kill him, they by little and little displaced the ancient Counsellors, and substituted their assured favourites. Another Act of that absolute force and fraud which they exercised in this dreadfull perturbation of all things, was the drawing of John Holland Duke of Exceter out of Sanctuary at Westminster, conveying him to Pomfret-Castle in the North.

The Duke of Yorke is Protector of the Realme.

Polid. Virgil. Henry 6.

(66) Henry Beaufort Duke of Sommerset, (sonne of the former) the Duke of Buckingham, (whose sonne and heire the Earle of Stafford was slaine at S. Albans) and other the Kings friends, perceiving whereunto this faire shew tended, consult with the Queene at Greenewich concerning her husbands danger, and how to prevent it. Hereupon the Duke of Yorke is displaced from the Protectorship, a ridiculous title to be assumed, where the King was aged about five and thirty, and had no other fault or unfitnesse, but that he was too good to live among them. The Earle of Salisbury was also deprived of his Lord Chancellorship.

A. Reg. 34.

The Duke of Yorke is discharged of the usurped Protectorship.

(67) The King having thus recovered his dignity and authority, but not sufficient means to suppresse his dangers, the French take courage at our intestine divisions, and landing at Sandwich with fifteene thousand men (part of their forces) they kill the Major, Bailefs, and other officers of that Towne, with sundry Gentlemen of the Country, spoyle all they could lay hand upon, and among all, they rob two great vessels laden with merchandise, which lay there bound for London, and departed. Another part of them, burnes Fowey and certaine other townes in Devonshire. On the other side, the Scots hostilly entred into Northumberland, but upon notice that the Duke of Yorke approached with a power, they returned, having not as yet done any great harme.

The French take Sandwich in Kent, and Fowey in Deuonshire.

(67) These indignities and losses might have united the disjoyned affections of true English hearts, which was greatly desired by such as loved their Countrey: For which purpose the King, Queene, and their chiefe friends, being at Coventrie, the Duke of Yorke, the Earles of Salisbury and Warwicke are sent for by the Kings Letters under his privy Seale, to give their attendance, whither they come, but they (either warned of some plot contrived against them, or fearing it, or faining to feare) sodainely leave the Court, without leave, the Duke departing to Wigmore in the Welsh marches, the Earle of Salisbury to his Castle of Middleham in the North-Country, and the Earle of Warwicke to Callis, whose bodies though thus divided, their mindes continued most firme factionated. But the King (a patterne of * Christian goodnesse) being tender over the generall estate of his Countrey, and wonderfully desirous to reconcile differences among his subjects, that they might the better withstand their imminent forreine enemies returnes to London, there to consult how to effect his holy wishes. The great Lords are perswaded to * meete there; which they did; but yet not without store of followers, for the Duke brought with him foure hundred men, the Earle of Salisbury five hundreth, the Earle of Warwicke sixe hundreth: The Dukes of Exceter and Sommerset eight hundreth, the Earle of Northumberland, the Lords Egremond and Clifford fifteene hundreth. This was the fashion of that fwording age.

(69) In March, the King and Queene with a very royal company alight at Westminster, to accomplish (if it were possible) this charitable and necessary worke of attonement and reconciliation. Godfrey Bolein was at that time Lord Major of London, (being the ancestor of two renowned and vertuous Queenes of England, Anne, second Wife to King Henrie the eight, and Elizabeth their daughter,) through whose great vigilancie and providence, the Citie stood so well guarded, that the Kings peace was dutifully kept, notwithstanding the great Lords of doth the factions (Yorkists and Lancastrians,) were with so great troupes of followers lodged within, and about the

the same: for during the whole time of their abode he had * five thousand Citizens in Harnesse, himselfe riding dayly about the City and Subtirbes, to see the publique quiet preserved: and for the night watch there were assigned to three Aldermen two thousand corsler-men.

* Rob. Fab. Chr.

(69) During this watch, a great Councell was holden by the King and Lords, where at length by the diligent travaile, good exhortation, and prudent advise of the Archbishop of Canterburie, and of other learned and godly Prelates, the parties offended were induced to a communication, and afterward to a finall accord: the points whereof, considering they held so short a while, (for as one saith truely, the dissimuled love day hung but by a small threed) it were frivolous to dwell in their rehearsall. The King himselfe (a singular testimony of the opinion which all parties had of his integritie) was whole arbitrator of their differences. Certaine satisfactions were awarded to be made by the Duke of Yorke, with the Earles of Warwicke and Salisbury, for the death of Edmund Duke of Sommerset, and others slaine at St. Albans. And the same Duke of Sommerset, the Earle of Northumberland, the Lord Clifford, (slaine in that battell by the Yorkists) are declared for true Liegemen to the King at the day of their deathes, aswell as the Duke of Yorke, the Earles of Warwicke and Salisbury. So both parts stand iustè fide and recti in curia. Many other articles and awards were made, to solder and give together their alienated hearts and affections. The rejoycement caused by this seeming peace (which on the behalfe of the Kings person was undoubtedly sincere and true) was wonderfully great among all good Englishmen, who flocked to the publique celebration thereof. For upon our * Ladies day in Lent, a solemne precession was made within the Cathedrall Church of St. Paul in London, where the King (adorned with Crowne and robes of Majestie) went in person, before whom went hand in hand the Duke of Sommerset, and the Earle of Saliburie, the Duke of Excester, and the Earle of Warwick, and so of either faction one and one, and behinde the King himselfe, came the Queene and Duke of Yorke with great familiarity in all mens sights. O religion, O honour, O sinceritie, that your divine vertue should not have contayned these spirits in the harmony of sweet obedience; but if you could not, what alas should England must be more severely scourged, then that so goodly a blessing of publike reconciliation should continue, whereby the proud tops of her Nation (offensive to God and men) being taken off, the way might be opened to other names or races, which as yet were nothing thought on.

The quarrels ended by the Kings award with shew of commonlikings.

* Martii 25.

(70) There is no reason to doubt, but that the Duke of Yorke, (a man of deepe retirement in himselfe) secretely continued his purpose for the Crowne, notwithstanding all these his vernished pretences, and did onely therefore not as then put for it, because he presumed the time was incommodious, Againe the Queene (true head and life of the contrary part) as well in regard of her selfe, her husband, and young sonne, may in likelihood be thought to have laide downe any thing, rather then the wakefulnesse and jealousie, which former perils, and the enemies present strength, might worthily keepe alive in her. The thinne ashes therefore, which covered these glowing coles, were thus againe first unraked and set to blaze.

The probable condition of things after the reconciliement.

(71) The King and many of the Lords, still being at Westminster, there hapned (or perhaps * was plotted) a fray betweene one of the Kings servants and a follower of the Earle of Warwick, who hurt the Kings servant. Hereupon his fellowes of all sorts, (as Cookes with their spits, &c.) in great disorder assaile the Earle himselfe, as he was comming from the Councell, and had there slaine him, but that the evill fate of England and his owne, reserved him to doe and suffer greater mischiefes. The Earle hardly gets to his Barge, and reputing all things unsure about the King, gets over to his place at Callis. The Yorkists directly charge the Queene with this, as with a plot drawne for the Earles destruction. Not long after this, the young Duke of Sommerset is sent Captaine to Callis. Warwicke will resigne no roome, notwithstanding the Kings command, alleaging he was made by Parliament: Sommerset is rejected, with danger to his person. Warwicke partly maintaines himselfe, and such as stucke to him in that charge, with spoyles which he got at Sea; How lawfully it appeares not; though Warwicke is said to have beene Admirall by Patent, though now revoked. The Ordinary Bookes have, that he, with foureteene sayle of men of warre, set upon three Caricks of Gene or Genoa, and two of Spaine, greater then the Caricks: three of which Marchant-fleete (which how they should be lawfull prize, we see not) he vanquished after two dayes fight, with he losse of about an * hundreth men of his owne, and a thousand of theirs: The booty was worth, at meane rates, ten thousand pounds; such also as followed the Duke of Sommerset comming into his hands, he beheaded at Callis. These were strange darings in the Earle of Warwicke; whom yet the unskilfull, and drunken multitude so highly praise: but what are these in regard of them which will presently follow?

* Rob. Fabian, who also reports a much greater number of Merchants ships.

(72) The Duke of Yorke in the meane time, and Warwicke with his father, the Earle of Salisbury (the Triumvirs of England) consult of their affaires: Salisbury is resolved with sword in hand to expostulate the danger and injury offered to his sonne at Westminster. The Queene (a Lady of incomparable magnanimity and fore-sight) confident in this, that now King Henry, or the Duke of Yorke must perish, and that one Kingdome was not wide enough for both their Families, bestirres her selfe to maintaine the possession of a Crowne, and to advance to the same her owne flesh and bloud Prince Edward, by ruining his house, whose whole building consisted of Lancastrian beneficence. She consults, she sends, she speakes, she gives, and strengthneth her selfe with friends on all sides, chiefly in Cheshire, causing her sonne to distribute silver Swannes (his badge or devise) to all the Gentlemen of that Countie, and to many other through England. Salisbury sets forward from his Castle at Meddleham, with foure or five thousand men, James Touchet Lord Audeley, encounters him unadvisedly upon Blore-heath neere Muchelstone The fight was long and bloudy, but in the end King Henries evill fortune gave the better of the day to the Earle of Salisbury, where, besides the valiant Lord Audeley himselfe, were slaine not fewer then two thousand and foure hundreth, but the chiefe losse fell upon the Cheshire-men, who ware the Princes Liverie.

The civill war begins again.

Buried at Mortpeath, after King Henrie side hath the worth.

(73) The Earle of Salisbury in this sort opened to himselfe a way to Ludlow, where the head of their combination, Richard Duke of Yorke, busied himselfe to gather forces: being met, they conclude, that seeing the matter was now become deadly, they would deale in cloudes no longer, but fight it out to the extremity. Men are drawne out of all parts with large hopes and promises of sharing in their fortunes, and the Earle of Warwicke bringing with him from Callis (which he left with his friends) that valiant Captaine Andrew Trolop, and a Band of stout and choyse Souldiers, comes to the generall Rendevou of the Yorkists, the Castle of Ludlow. The King in the meane space, (and not before it was neede and time) hath assembled a great puissance of faithfull Subjects, and being * attended with the Dukes of Sommerset and Excester, and other of his chiefe friends marcheth against his enemies. His first worke was, to offer them generall pardon. It is refused, and called by them a staffe of Reede, or Glasse-Buckler. The sword must decide the quarrells; whereupon the King commands his Standards to advance: while he was in his March, * a letter fraught with the wonted wonted hypocrisies) is delivered to the King. There are in it among many other insinuations these also: Most Christian King, right high and mighty Prince, and our most dread Soveraigne Lord, &c. Wee sent unto your good grace by the Prior of the Cathedrall Church of Worcester and divers other Doctors, and among other by M. William Linwood Doctor of Divinitie, which ministred unto us severally the blessed Sacrament of the body of Iesus, whereupon we and every of us deposed of our said truth and dutie.

The horrible abuse of Christian Sacraments to beguile the King.

(74) Thus these prophane and ambitious men play with GOD, who in the end will severely be avenged on them for their impiety: but the letter made no overture of any course, upon which they would yeeld to lay downe Armes, alleadging, they would but make their way to the King for redresse of abuses, and that they were enforced to stand together for their owne defence, against such great Courtiers and Favourites, as (say they) intended their destruction; meaning indeede such persons whose vigilancy and manhood might protect and guard him from their practise and violence. The King is now in sight, whom the Triumvirs Yorke, Warwicke, and Salisbury, being strongly entrenched before Ludlow, * meane to assaile. Andrew Trollop (who had in the Kings pay done great service upon the French) was acquainted with all their counsell, and finding himselfe extreamly deceived, (for he thought, and so by the Earle of Warwicke was made to beleeve, that the preservation of the King was intended, and not destruction) abandons the Yorkists camp at mid-night, & with a choise number of trusty men presents himselfe and services to the King, who graciously received him and his. The truth of the Triumvirates plot, and bottome of their conspiracies was thus made clearely knowne: The Yorkists upon notice of Trollops act, despairing of successe at that present, flie. The Duke of Yorke with the Earle of Rutland his younger sonne into Ireland, the Earle of March his eldest sonne and heire, Warwicke and Salisbury, with much difficulty escape to Callis, which place (as * one saith probably) if Henry had in time taken from his enemies, they had without question beene forthwith irrecoverably ruined.

* Polyd. Virg. lib. 23.

(75) The multitude which served under Yorke found mercy, but their Tenants were many of them executed, maimed, or generally ransackt. The towne of Ludlow it selfe was spoyled to the bare walls, and Dutchesse of Yorke deprived of all her goods. What lesse could be the effects against the friends of such adversaries, upon so publike an act and advantage? The point is followed more sharpely upon the great Offenders in the next Parliament, which was holden at Coventrie: there Richard Duke of Yorke, Edward Earle of March, Richard Earle of Warwicke, Edmund Earle of Rutland, Richard Earle of Salisbury, Alice Countesse of Salisbury, (in whose right her husband was Earle) two or three Lords, nine Knights, and certaine other, were openly of high Treason attainted, and their whole estates confiscated.

(76) Callis, a most important piece, being in the meane space violently possest by Warwicke, the Duke of Sommerset, the Lords Rosse and Audley, are sent with forces to take it; their successe was evill, for the Duke was glad to flie, his Souldiers were robbed, by Warwicks men, of their harnesse, the Lord Audley is taken into the towne, and the Lord Rosse hardly escaped. Letters are hereupon written into forraine parts, entreating * that no relieſe be minisired to the Traitors who kept Callis against the King, and all men are at home forbidden to transport any victuall or refreshment thither. Evident it is, that the Councell of England rather wished that the Town and Castle had beene French againe, then as it was; neither therein erred they, for it could not be so mischievous to the maine of their cause, as now it was. The Duke of Sommerset being in Guines, a neighbour Castle, doth daily by his Souldiers skirmish with the Calisians: Warwicke meditates other things. Hee must speake with the Duke of Yorke, at whose commandement all Ireland, (where he abode) seemed to be ready; but is advertised that the King had certaine ships, which lay at Sandwich to transport supplies and succours to the Duke of Sommerset. He meanes not to leave such a perill behinde him unremoved; having therefore espied his time, he wils his people to slip over in the night to Sandwich, which they accordingly did, tooke the Lord Rivers, and his sonne Anthony Woodvile prisoners, and brought away all the Ships, except one called Grace de Dieu: one Sir Baldwine Fulford Knight, having (after this) assumed to doe service upon the Earle of Warwicke, and to take him, returnes empty. Warwicke sayles now to Ireland. The King makes the Duke of Excester Admirall, and gives him commission to apprehend the Earle of Warwicke. The Duke with a great Navie puts forth to Sea from Sandwich. Behold the ill carriage of things: At Dertmouth many of his Souldiers, pretending want of money and victuals, forsake him. Meane-while the Earle of Warwicke passeth by, the Duke, not daring to affaile him, nor hee willing to assaile the Duke, for that he was Admirall and of the Kings bloud. Such was the act and cunning of the Yorkists, to pretend reverence unto that which most of all they thirsted to shed. Five hundreth fresh souldiers attend at Sandwich, to be shipt over to the Duke of Sommerset for safe-conducting him into England. Warwicks men sodainely come upon them, slew Montford their Captaine, and many other, and disarmed the rest. Such was the distracted estate of our poore Countrey at this time, through the pride and restlesse ambition of one or two unhappy men. But though nothing was more plaine then that the Duke of Yorke fought the Crown of England; yet nothing is truer, then that they as yet pretended nothing lesse, for the veneration of King Henries purity of life, would have prevailed with the people greatly to their prejudice.

The Earle of Warwicks men take the Lord Rivers and some other Kings Navie at Sandwich.

The King armes to Sea, but cannot take the Earle, who returnes from Ireland to Callis.

(77) The King failing thus to obtaine the person of Warwicke, or his Towne of Callis, the Yorkists send over certaine Articles into Kent, in which (as if they were the onely Patriots and best Subjects of the world) they complaine of certaine generall enormities concerning injuries done to the Church, and the ill minsstration of justice, abuse of purveyors and takers, the Kings poverty by the corruption of his officers, and the like plausible stuffe: where they speake of the King, they sequester him from all exception, as being of so noble, so vertuous, so righteous, and so blessed disposition: (these are their words and the truth) as any Prince earthly. Where they speake of their enemies, (that is, the Kings principall friends and faithfull Subjects) they name the Earle of Salisbury, the Earle of Wiltshire, and the Lord Beaumont, which must ever bee an honour to their memories, and put the blame (if it were blame-worthy) of such attaindors which were enacted against the Yorkists at Coventrie, upon these three Lords specially. Where they speake of themselves and their intentions, they professe all sincerity and loyalty to King Henry, and that they only meant to come upon their guard to speake with him concerning the common-wealth, and their owne safeties, and that now they would attempt the same againe, in the name of the Land, and not to suffer such mischiefes to raigne upon them. The conclusion of their cunning and painted pretences hath these fained holy words: Requiring you (the people) on Gods behalfe, and praying you in your owne, therein to assist us, doing alway the duty of Liegemen to our persons to our said Soveraigne Lord, to his estate, prerogative and preheminence, and to the surety of his most noble person, whereunto we have ever beene, and will be as true as any of his subjects alive: whereof wee call God, our Lady Saint Marie, and all the Saints in heaven, to witnesse, and record. But of the thing it selfe, (that is to Crowne the Duke of Yorke) they make not the least mention: What wanted in these men to the height and depth of humane malice? They prevaile with the multitudes; a shallow-braind, but a great great and many-headed beast. The Lord Fauconbridge is sent to found their affections, and to draw the purulent matter to an head: hee findes great forwardnesse. The Earles of March, Warwicke, and Salisbury advertised of all things, land in Kent. But the people onely were not deluded; for Thomas Bourchier Archbishop of Canterbury, and other grave men, beleeved they meant sooth; which that they might the rather doe, the Earle of Warwicke made open oath upon the Crosse of Canterbury, that they had ever borne true faith and allegeance to King Henry. A strange humour in the English, that could neither brooke bad nor benigne Princes. The King had before the comming quit the Citie of London, as not greatly trusting the affections which the people therof bare toward such as the Yorkish faction had made odious about him, and appointed the Rendevow of his forces at Northampton, where he abode. The enemy (shewing friend) advanceth thither. It is a shame to reade that some of the great Prelates would simply be drawne to countenance such an enterprise: but their intentions were different: they hoped to reconcile enmities, the Earles to make Yorke King. Meanewhile their complices labour to take the Tower of London, within which there were for King Henrie these loyall Nobles. The Earle of Warwick lends his side an Oath.

(78) At Northampton, things were carried thus: The King meaning there to abide his adversaries, when it was not thought meete to admit the Earle of Warwicke to his presence, (which thing was colourably sued for to raise a ground of justification for battell) they prepare on both parts. The Earles of March and Warwicke (with like or greater cunning, then they had desired admission to the Kings speech) let cry through the field, that no man should lay hand upon the King, nor common people, but upon the Lords, Knights, and Esquires.

(79) The hoasts joyne. No stroake they gave but seemes to wound us also. Let us swiftly turne our eyes from so unnaturall slaughters. The * Lord Grey of Ruthen began the discomfiture of the Kings side, for he (let the World judge with what commendation) having the poynt, did quit his place, and fled to the Earles. The Kings Army is defeated, and utterly broken. Many were slaine and drowned. Polydor and Grafton say ten thousand: The chiefe of the Nobles who there lost their lives, were the Duke of Buckingham, John Earle of Shrewsbury, (a * most hopefull young Gentleman, and in all points like his heroyicke Ancestors) John Vicount Beaumont, Thomas Lord Egremond; and among sundry other prime men,* Sir William Lucie, who making haste to the fight, was upon his first approch chopt downe with an Axe. The Kings Ordnance could not play, there fell so great a raine.

(80) This wofull Battell was fought upon the * ninth of July. The King (as a man borne to all calamities and miseries, though he not therefore the lesse, but the more happy through that excellent fortitude of minde, with which hee invincibly sustained them) comes into his enemies hands; but the Queene and the Prince, and the remaines of their scattered fortunes flye into the North, there to reenforce their powers, and to * subdue (as she caused them to be proclaimed) the Kings Rebels and enemies. The Tower of London, after this misfortune, renders it selfe. The Lord Scales is wickedly murthered upon the Thames by Wherrimen, belonging to the Earle of Warwicke, as hee intended to passe to * Sanctuary at Westminster. The Earles when they were possessed of the King, continued their admirable hypocrisies (which God will terribly plague them for) thereby to leade the people on, and had to him these words.

(81) Most noble Prince, displease you not, though it hath pleased God of his grace to grant us the victory of our mortall enemies, who by their venemous malice have untruely stirred and moved your Highnesse to exile us out of the Land, and would have put us to finall shame, and confusion: we come not to unquiet or grieve your said Highnesse, but to please your noble person, desiring tenderly the high wel-fare and prosperity thereof, and of all your Realme, and to be your true Liegemen while our lives shall endure. Our soules are amazed at these acts, and men blush to publish to the World things so unworthy.

(83) Scotland, by reason of late affinity with the house of Beaufort, whose chiefe and top was the Duke of Somerset, (descended from John Duke of Lancaster by the Lady Katherine) was a speciall back, and second, to King Henry in all his tempestuous adversities; but now that refuge was also hazzarded: for King James the second, partly in favour of King Henry, and partly as making use of the troubles in England, layeth siege to Rocksbrough (Bellenden the Scot calleth the same Castle * Marchmont) being in the custody of King Henries enemies, where while himselfe (whose * skill and delight in shooting of Ordnance was great) comming downe the trenches to see the * Lion (a new great piece which had lately beene cast in Flanders) and the other Artillery discharged, one of them brake, and with a shiver thereof slew the King, and dangerously wounded the Earle of Angus. This unhappy accident hapned upon a a Sunday, the * third day of August. The Queene of Scotland nevertheless maintaineth the siege, and as well obtaines that place, as the Castle of Warke, both which shee (in revenge) threw to the Earth. James the third, a childe of seaven yeares old succeeded to his father, as well to the cherishment of the distressed English, as to the Crowne.

(84) The Parliament being begun, about the * eight of October at Westminster in King Henries name, thither comes with flying speed, Richard Duke of Yorke, who brake open the Kings lodging-Chamber, and placed himselfe therein, suffering the King to provide else-where. Then makes hee his claime to the Crown of England, and publisheth it in open Parliament, together with his pedigree. The whole house (such among them excepted as were privie to the Dukes intention) was * greatly dismayed, both for that he did set himselfe in the Kings Seat, and for this his unexpected challenge: But the Duke though at first hee greatly meant to have deposed King Henrie, and with speed to be crowned himselfe at Alhallontide next, yet finding such amazement and silence, hee sends them his pedigree and his claime in writing, that they might the better consider, yeelding (as it seemes) to be ordered therein; according to their generall agreement; during the treaty whereof, hee would not visit King Henry, alledging, himselfe was peerelesse in England. The maine points of his Title were as followeth. King Edward the third had issue, Edward Prince of Wales, William of Hatfield, Lionell Duke of Clarence, John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, Edmund Duke of Yorke, Thomas D. of Glouc ester, and William of Windsor. Edward Prince of Wales died, living his Father, and left issue Richard the second King of England, who dyed without issue: as did also William King Edwards second sonne.

Allegations for King Henries and the Lancastrians title.

(86) Iohn of Gaunt the fourth sonne and younger brother to Lionel, had issue Henry, who immediately after King Richards resignation, unrighteously (saith the Booke) entred upon the same, for that Edmund Earle of March, sonne of Roger Earle of March, and of Philip daughter and heire of the before said Lionel Duke of Clarence, elder brother to Iohn Duke of Lancaster was then alive, and that aswell the said Henry, eldest sonne to Iohn Duke of Lancaster, as his descendents have hitherto holden the Crowne of England, &c. unjustly, for that himselfe the said Richard Plantagenet Duke of Yorke was the lawfull heire, being the sonne of Richard Plantagenet Earle of Cambridge, and of Anne before said.

(87) This was the effect of the Duke of Yorkes title, which for the poynts of the Pedegree was very true, though in barre thereof the friends of King Henry, (without denying any part of the premises, being all of them more evident then that they could be honestly denyed) had not a little to say for him: for they could among other things alledge, That Richard the second resigned up his Crowne and Regality at large; and that none else making claime but Henry Duke of Lancaster, he was thereunto by the consent of all the three Estates admitted; that Richard Earle of Cambridge was for high Treason attainted and executed, and his Issue made incapable of any inheritance, that this Richard his sonne now challenging the Crowne of England, being restored by the meere clemency and goodnesse of this King Henry the first, had voluntarily acknowledged him for his lawfull Soveraigne, and sworne the same, and that the said Richard was finally for treason attainted, and adjudged uninheritable: they could hereunto have added sundry Acts of Parliament, made to establish the right of the Lancastrian line, the succession of three Kings, all Henries, that is to say, the fourth, fift, and sixth; the politicke addresses of the first of those Kings, the noble victories of the second, and the holy life of the third; which three Kings lives contained of raigne about threescore yeares, in which number this was the nine and thirtieth of King Henry the sixth, who was descended of the male line, and the Duke of Yorke but of a female: of which female line none had ever beene in possession of the Crowne. Great and weighty poynts, (if any) and the rather to be considered, for that King Henries person being (in very truth) Prisoner, no act of his to establish Yorkes title could bind in law or conscience, and the lesse, for that he had a wife, and by her a sonne, who was at liberty, and ready with Armes to free his father, or hazard to destroy the whole English name. But they who (on Yorkes behalfe) abstractively disputed these highest questions, knew a rule of law, which saith, Iura sanguinis nullo jure civili dirimi possunt; and the Lancastrians were not without their speculative and remote considerations to countenance the particulars of their cause. Thus wee see that in Monarchies (though the noblest forme of Regiment) where lineall succession is the rule of inheritance, there sometimes fall out as great and as indeterminable difficulties, as where Election designeth the Successor: wherof the French tragedies which our Nation made among them, and now these in England, are without all exception, the most fearefull instances. For France had heretofore her time of affliction, but now (O dearest England) it was thine.

(88) While this weighty controversie was debated, a Crowne which hung for garnishment in the middle of the roofe where the Knights and Burgesses of the Parliament met to consult, and the crowne which for like cause stood upon the highest Tower of Dover-Castell, * fell sodainely downe, which were vulgarly construed * to portend, That the raigne of King Henry was at an end, and that the Crowne should bee transferred from one royall line to another. But the Queene, her sonne Prince Edward, and her fast friends in the North (the seat of their hopes) being nothing discouraged at their late ill fortunes, prepare all the forces they can to recover King Henry and the Kingdome; which thing whiles they are pursuing, the conclusion of the Parliament concerning the Crowne was, That Henry the sixth should raigne, and be King during his life, the remainder to rest in Richard Duke of Yorke, and the lawfull heires of his body in generall tayle, King Henries heires to be excluded. The Duke in the meane time is proclaimed heire apparant, and called Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, Earle of Chester, and Protector of England. The agreement was engrossed, sealed, and sworne unto. The Queen wil have nothing to doe in this bargaine, being so dangerous and prejudicious to her selfe, her Husband, and her sonne; and therefore when the King (at the Duke of Yorkes instigation) sent for her to repaire unto him, she relying upon the Dukes of Somerset and Exceter, and other the Kings friends, utterly refuseth Henry continueth King. The Armes therefore, which she taketh for his deliverance, have the more justice. The Duke of Yorke missing the prey he expected, leaves the King with the Duke of Norfolke, and the Earle of Warwicke at London; himselfe with the Earles of Salisbury and Rutland, and certaine forces,* fetcheth forward to Wakefield to pursue the Queen and her son, sending direction to the Earle of March that he should follow with all his power. The Castle of Sandall standeth pleasantly upon a small hill, in view of the faire towne of Wakefield; there the Duke of Yorke (comming thither upon Christmas-Eve) reposeth himselfe, and expecteth the encrease of his numbers. The Queene advertised, thinks it wisdome to fight before the Duke grow too strong; and thereupon marcheth forward, having an Army of eighteene thousand men, led by the Dukes of Somerset and Exceter, the Earles of * Devonshire and * Wiltshire, the Lords Nevill, Clifford, Rosse, and in effect all the Notherne Nobilitie. The host (or so much thereof as they thought necessary to shew) presents it selfe before Sandall, to provoke and dare the Duke to battell. His bloud impatient of these braves, and ignorant perhaps, that the enemy had so great a multitude will needs fight, though the Earle of Salisbury, and Sir David Hall (an ancient servant of his, and a great Souldier) gave him advise to stay, till his sonne (the Earle of March) approached with such Welshmen and Marchers, as he had in great numbers assembled. But God would forbeare him no longer, but like a severe Master meanes to take a present account: at which he found whether all the kingdomes of the earth are worth the least sinne, much lesse a wilfull perjurie.

The Queenes Army comes to wakefield.

(89) The Queene therefore addeth strategeme and wit to her force, to the entent hee might not escape her hands; whereupon the Earle of Wiltshire upon one side of the Hill, and the Lord Clifford upon the other, lye in ambush to thrust betweene him and the Castle; the Dukes of Somerset and Exceter, stand embattelled in the open field. Their policy had the wished successe; for the Duke being not fully five thousand strong, issueth out of the Castle downe the Hill. The battels which stood in Front joyne furiously, when sodainely the Duke of Yorke sees himselfe inclosed, and although he expressed great manhood, yet within one halfe houre, his whole Army was discomfited, himselfe and divers his deare friends beaten downe and slaine. There lay dead about him the Lord Harington, Sir Thomas Nevill, sonne to the Earle of Salisbury, Sir David Hall, with sundry Knights and others, about two thousand and two hundred; among which were the heires of many Southern gentlemen of great account, whose * bloud was shortly after revenged. Let us not linger upon the particular accidents of this battell, but consider what it wrought for King Henries advancement; yet these few things are not to be un-remembred. (90) That mercileſſe propoſition was common (as the event will ſhew) to either faction. The Duke of Yorkes head, crowned with paper, is preſented to the Queene. Cruell joy is ſeldome fortunate. Cæſar wept over Pompeis head, but the Queene (ignorant how manifold cauſes of teares were reſerved for her owne ſhare) makes her ſelfe merry with that gaſtly and bloudy ſpectacle. The Earle of Saliſbury, after wounds received, being in this battell taken priſoner, is conveighed to Pomfret Caſtle; from whence the common people (who loved him not) * violently haled him, and cut off his head; which perhaps was not done without the good liking of others. (91) This battell (called of Wakefield) was fought upon the laſt day of December; of whoſe weathers complexion if their courages had participated, miſchiefe might have made her ſtop here, which now is in her ſwifteſt courſe.

(92) For the Earle of March, ſonne, and heire to this late valiant Duke of Yorke, hearing of this tragicall adventure, gives not over: but, having gathered an army of about twenty thouſand to march againſt the Queene, he finds employment neerer hand: being certified, that Iaſper Teder Earle of Pembrooke, (half-brother to King Henry) and Iames Butler Earle of Ormond and Wiltſhire, had with him a great force of Welſh and Iriſh to take him. The youthfull and valiant Earle of March, whoſe amiable preſence and carriage made him gracious with the people, (and the rather for that he had the generall good word of * women,) meanes to try his fortune againſt the ſaid Earles. Hee ſodainly therefore turnes backe from Shrewsbury, and at a place called Mortimers-Croſſe neere Ludlow, where the enemy abode, he ſets upon them. It was Candlemas-day in the morning, at which time there appeared, (as ſome write) three Sunnes, which ſodainely joyned in one. This luckie prognoſticon, and ominous Meteor, exceedingly fired the Earle of March, and was (ſome ſay) the reaſon, why he uſed for his Badge, or royall deviſe, the Sunne in his full brightneſſe. The Battels maintaine their fight with great fury; but, in the end, the Earle of March obtaines the victory, killing of his enemies three thouſand, and eight hundreth men; the Earles ſaved themſelves by flight. The ſonne of honour and fortune did thus begin to ſhine, through Clouds of bloud and miſerie, upon Edward, whom ſhortly we are to behold King of England. (93) The Queene on the other ſide (having ordered her affaires in the North, ſetled the eſtate thereof, and refreſhed her people,) within a while after drawes neere with her Northerne army to S. Albans. There came before them an evill fame of their behaviour to London, whoſe wealth lookt pale knowing it ſelfe in danger; for the Northern army, (in which were Scots, Welſh, and Iriſh as well as Engliſh,) made bold by the way with what they liked, making ſmall diſtinction of ſacred or prophane, after they were once paſt the river of Trent, Captaine Andrew Trollop being their Coronell. King Henry himſelfe in perſon, with the Dukes of Norfolke and Suffolke, the Earles of Warwicke and Arundel, the Lord Bonuile, and other, with a great puiſſance encampe at Saint Albans, to give the Queene battell, and ſtop her farther paſſage toward London. But the Lords of her faction being ready to attempt on her behalfe, aſſaile the Kings forces within the towne, and after ſome ſharpe affronts, breake through, and drive their adverſaries out with much-bloud-ſhed, till they fell upon a ſquadron or battalion of the Kings, wherein there were about foure or five thouſand men, which made good their ground for a while with great courage, but in the end the Queenes ſide clearely wanne the day. There periſhed in this conflict about two thouſand.

This hapned upon Shrove-tueſday, the ſeventeenth of February. The King, Queene, and Prince meet joyfully, where hee Knights his ſonne, (being eight yeares old,) and thirtie others. The Lord Bonuile and Sir Thomas * Kiriel of Kent being taken in the fight, were beheaded, but all the other great men eſcape. The common people of London doe notwithſtanding ſtand wholly for the beautifull Earle of March, and ſtand the more confidently, becauſe they had ſure intelligence, that hee had vanquiſhed the Earle of Pembrooke in the Marches of Wales, and that the Earle of Warwicke, eſcaping from S. Albans, had met with the Earle of March neere Coſtwold, and that both with joynt-forces were marching toward London. Theſe newes made the King and Queene retire into the North, and leave that Citie and the Southerne Countreyes to their Enemie, till they might recover a fairer opportunitie, or more ſufficiencies. Edward upon notice of the Kings departure, entreth London, and gives period to Henries raigne, which is accounted to take end after he had ſucceſſively ruled this Land the ſpace of thirtie eight yeares, ſixe moneths, and foure dayes.

She was exceedingly beautified in face, and of goodly feature, of a great wit, and deepe pollicie, but of ſtomack farre above her ſexe, as in the managing of thoſe troubleſome times did too well appeare. She was his Wife twenty ſixe yeares, and twenty nine daies: and (after her Husbands depulſion from his regall Throne) her forces being vanquiſhed at the battell of Tewkſbury, in a poore Religious Houſe, whether ſhe had fled for the ſafety of her life, was taken priſoner, and ſo carried Captive to London, where ſhe remained in durance, till Duke Reynate her father did purchaſe her liberty with great ſummes of money, unto whom ſhee returned, and laſtly died in her native Countrie.

KING OF THE HOVSE OF YORKE, KING OF ENGLAND AND FRANCE, LORD OF IRELAND, THE FIFTIE-FOVRTH MONARCH OF THIS LAND, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND ISSVE.

Monarch 54.

CHAPTER XVII.

EDVVARD whose birth was at Roan in Normandy, and bearing the title of March in England, having won the battell at Mortimers Crosse, (though the Lords his Confederates had lost that of Saint Albans) from Ludlow hasted towards London, and on his way was seconded by Richard Nevill, the stout Earle of Warwicke, to the great encrease of his number and power, which so terrified Queene Margaret, now ready to possesse the South, that with her Husband and Sonne, in a perplexed feare, she returned againe into the North; upon which advantage Edward now Duke of Yorke presently played. For London un-resolved whether Prince to obey (the one very powerfull, and the other in possession) daily consulted for their safest estate; when on the suddaine Edward with Warwicke entred their Gates, whose warlike Visages so daunted the adverse affected, that they began with the first to make him way to the Throne, and the Noblemen likewise made him offers of their service, to establish his claime, neither were the Clergie to learne the observance of time, or to sway with the man upon whom the World smiled. All these set in Counsell to conferre of the State, Duke Edward made knowne his title to the Crowne, and in well-set termes declared, how the body of the whole Parliament formerly had thereunto consented, and Henry himselfe subscribed with his owne hand; whose title, though now carried through three descents; yet what right Lancaster had, they all knew, and how insufficient this last man was for rule, France to their dishonour did witnesse, where all was lost through his neglect, whose simplicitie ever minded more his private devotions, devotions, then the potent managing of a Soveraignes command.

(2) These things urged (and most of them true) their voices went current, that Edward was the undoubted King, whereunto the Londoners the sooner yeelded, for that his dreaded Northerne Army was then encamped in Saint Iohns field: neither was any reservation made (as before) of Henries naturall life, but he is now absolutely neglected, as unworthy of his Crowne, how acceptable soever he had raigned till then, whose following miseries were not so much lamented, as his constant patience was admired in undergoing the same. Edward thus mounted, before his foote had well touched the first step, was upon Sunday the second of March, among his Northerne Souldiers proclaimed King; William Lord Fauconbridge Earle of Kent declaring his claime, and disabling King Henry of stile or Governement, whose weake head (as he alledged) had over-long blemished the English Crowne.

King Henry deprived of his Crowne.

March 3.

(3) Vpon the next day, with all pompe he was conveied to Westminster, and set upon the Kings seat in the Hall, where holding the Scepter of Saint Edward in his hand, the voice of the people was againe demanded, and againe granted; such was the hap of unfortunate Henry, and condition of the multitude ever to dislike the present, and to affect the new: but no interim left to diswade or attempt, the next day his stile and title was againe proclaimed by the name of King Edward the fourth, being the fourth of March, and * about the 20. yeare of his age.

* He was borne An. Dom. 1441. April 29.

(4) These sodaine alterations made the richer sort somwhat fearfull, especially, those whose heart stood firme for King Henry, (who was now in the North new mustering of men) and among those, London afforded many, as King Edwards jealousie suspected, whereof one Walker a substantiall Citizen and Grocer was a sufficient proofe, who for wordes spoken concerning his owne sonne, that hee would make him heire of the Crowne, (meaning his house having that Signe) was the eight day of this Kings raigne apprehended and beheaded in Smithfield. And albeit his words intended no treason, (the Grocer not once dreaming to touch King Edwards title) yet the time being when the Crowne lay at stake, the tenure of the Law made them his death. This rough beginning moved many to doubt, that they had wronged themselves in wronging King Henry, which opinion was more confirmed in that hee retained * a great summe of money borrowed of the Staplers-Merchants, and disbursed in his affaires, whose restitution he utterly denyed with an austere commandement to surcease the demaund. But hearing how Henry was beloved in the North, and what followers were gathered to recover him the Crown, upon the twelfth of March with a complete Army hee sett forth of London, accompanied with his brethren, and many other Nobles: with whom marching towards Pomfret, he there appoynts the Lord Fitzwater to keepe the passage of Ferribrig, omitting no directions of a worthie commander.

King Edwards beginnings somewhat difficult.

King Edwards expedition into the North.

(5) King Henry for his part though nothing so warlike, yet thought it best policy to employ such leaders as desired revenge against the house of Yorke; such were the Duke of Sommerset, the Earle of Northumberland, and the Lord Clifford, whose fathers had beene slaine in the first battell of S. Albans, which last, though in degree the least man, yet sought to raise his fame with the first, and therefore to leave no attempt unassayed, hee so sodainely charged upon the Troupe appointed for Ferribrig, that the Lord Fitzwater unarmed (only with a Pollax in his hand) came hastily to the Bridge thinking a fray had beene among his owne Souldiers, where, with the Bastard of Salisbury, hee and many of his men were slaine by the enemy.

The Lord Fitzwater, and Bastard Salisbury slaine.

(6) The brute of which gust blowne into stout Warwickes eare, hee mounted his Courser, and posting to Edward, puffing, blowing, and almost out of breath, said, Sir, I pray God have mercy on their soules, which in the beginning of your enterprize have lost their lives; I see no succour in the world, but in God, to whom I remit the vengeance. And so alighting, forthwith slew his horse with his sword, saying, Let him flie, that flie will; I will tarry with him that will tarry with me, which he confirmed by kissing the crosse of his sword, the usuall complement of covenants made by martiall men. The valiant Lord Fauconbridge fearing lest this beginning would give an edge to the sequell, got over the River at Castleford, three miles from the Bridge, meaning to include the takers upon their backes, which Clifford perceiving, fought to avoyde, and whether for haste, heate, or paine, put off the gorget he wore, when sodainely an arrow without an head, shot from the Bow of some layde in ambush, pierced through his throat, and stucke in his necke, which set a period unto his life.

(7) The next day more fatall for Englands bloud, was celebrated with speares in stead of Palmes, usually borne on * that Sabbath of Lent, in whose dawning, the Lord Fauconbridge, who commanded the foreward (the Duke of Norfolke being sicke) tooke the field on a plaine, betwixt the Townes of Towton and Saxton, where King Edward joyning his whole forces (being forty eight thousand, and six hundreth sixty persons, as King Henries were also threescore thousand) caused proclamation to be made, that hee who feared to fight, might forthwith depart, but if any souldier abiding, should seek to fly or turne back, he should be slaine by his next fellow, and the slayer to receive a great reward, besides the stipend of a double pay.

* March 29.

King Edwards proclamation much forwardeth his service.

(8) Both Armies ready to joyne, a small fleet of snow hapned to fall, which with the winde was carried into the face of the Lancastrian hoast, whereby their fight was much impeached, which advantage Fauconbridge soone espying, forth-with commanded his archers to shoot each man a slight, and then to stand without further proffer. The Northerne men feeling the arrowes, but not seeing the Archers, made haste to acquite them with the like, and shot their whole sheaves of arrowes without intermission, but short of the marke by threescore yards at the least; which storme being past, and all their store spent, the worthy Fauconbridge advanced forward, and within reach of his Archers sore galled the enemy, making a double advantage of what they had done: for their owne quivers being full, when the others were empty, they gathered up and shot theirs, against their owne shooters, yet left some of them sticking to gall the legs of their pursuers: by which only stratagem, as was constantly averred, the battell and day was lost and wonne.

(9) The fight was bloudy, and continued ten houres, for all being English, acquit themselves English-like, no taking of prisoners, nor looking for ransome, but all to retaine, and to get honour that day; wherein died the Lords Beaumont, Nevill, Willoughby, Wells, Scales, Gray, Dacres, Fitzhugh, Beckingham, and Clifford, (who dyed the day before) the two Bastards of Exceter, Knights, Esquiers, and Gentlemen a great number, and in all (on both parts) thirty five thousand, ninety and one; so that not onely the field lay stayned with English bloud, but the rivers ran red for a great distance, so markable is this battell of Englands civill warres.

(10) Henry, who never was victor where soever he came, hearing this losse which seemed irrecoverable, with his Queene and sonne hasted into Scotland, where, of Iames the young King hee was royally entertained, with comfort of assistance to recover his estate, in regard whereof he surrendred the strong towne Barwicke into the Scots hand, and concluded a marriage betwixt Prince Edward his sonne, and Lady Margaret the sister of the said King. These things thus effected, milde Henry conceived some new budding hopes, and Queene Margaret his wife, (indeed

An. Dom. 1461. King Edward crowned.

(11) Victorious Edward, after those his prosperous successes in the North, in triumph returned to London, and the eight & twentieth of June with great solemnity was crowned at Westminster, wherein S. Peters Church, the next day it was againe most solemnly set on his head, and the third day so crowned he came to Saint Paules in London, and therein was censed with great applause of the people. In November following a Parliament began, wherein K. Henry, Queene Margaret, and Prince Edward their Sonne, were disherited of their right to the Crowne; the Dukes of Excester and Sommerset, and the Earle of Devonshire, with an hundred and forty moe, were attainted also, and disherited; so fortune dallieth in setting the Dice of her favours, or frownes.

An. Dom. 1462. Queene Margaret returned into Scotland.

(12) Queene Margaret stored with men, but in want of money, with her French powers made into Scotland; whose comming was most welcome to the two Kings there, and thence, with great shew of enterprize, hoised her sailes for England, but having touched the bay of Tinmouth, (whether upon better advise, or feared with their owne shadowes,) she with her French put backe to the Sea, where such a fore tempest tooke them, as had not Queene Margaret in a small Carvell got unto Barwicke, she had not lived to vexe the new King, nor seene the unfortunate losse of her Husband, her Sonne, and Realme, nor the miserable calamities of her owne old age. Her French, by Bastard Ogle, were beate into Holy Iland, many slaine, and foure hundred of them put to their ransomes.

An. Dom. 1463.

(13) This fainting French enterprize, though it dulled the edge of some spirits, yet did it nothing daunt the courage of the Queene, her better hopes being fixed upon the Scots valour; so, (leaving Prince Edward for safety in Barwicke,) with her Husband and Scots shee entred Northumberland, tooke the Castle of Bamburgh, and so passed forward unto the Bishopricke, their forces daily increasing, through the confluence of such English as favoured King Henrie.

Queene Margaret entreth Northumberland in hostile manner.

King Edward commeth to Yorke.

(14) King Edward hearing these stirres in the North, made his preparation both by Sea and Land, and with his Brethren, and Nobles, came to Yorke, from whence he sent John Nevill Lord Montacute, with a power of men, as somewhat mistrusting the loialties of the Northumbrians, who passing forward, upon Hegely-Moore was sodainely encountred by the Lords Hungerford and Roos, with whom was Sir Ralph Piercy, a most valiant Knight; but Montacute, accompanied with such as would neither looke backe, nor stand gazing on, abode the encounter, and at the first push put backe the two Lords, and finally slew the said Piercy, who no waies would depart out of the field; but in dying said, I have saved the bird in my breast, meaning his oath made to King Henrie.

(15) Lord Montacutes Sunne thus mounting in the Horizon, cast forth the rayes of his rising fame, which as he well hoped would higher ascend. And therefore learning by espials, that Henries hoast lay incamped upon a plaine called Livels, neere unto Hexham, by the Water Dowill, he hasted thither and so valiantly assaulted their Campe, as after great slaughter, in chase were taken Lord Henry D. of Sommerset, the Lords, Roos, Molins, and Hungerford, all which were beheaded, and Sir Ralph Gray, who first solemnly disgraded, his guilt spurres cut from his heeles by the Master-Cooke, his Sword broken over his head, his Coat-armour rent, another reverfed put on by the King at armes, was so led to his execution. King Henry himselfe got away (as Stow saith) into Lancashire, where, with some few hee lived full hardly in Caves, and unknowne, more then a yeare, but (saith Grafton) he fled into Scotland, which is more likely.

(16) Edward thus cleared of the Clowd-threatning storme, thought best ere others did light, to provide for himselfe, and therefore he raised Bulwarkes, built new Fortresses in places of danger, put forth his espials upon the Marches of Scotland, and commanded that none should keepe Henrie or Margarets in secret, whose sight, he feared, would draw the affections of many, which otherwise stood in case of obedience. But over-borne Henry (whether past all feare, or inforced by destinie) in disguised apparrell past into England, where he was soone apprehended by one Cantlow; but Stow saith, by Thomas Talbot in Cletherwood besides Bungerley Hippingstones in Lancashire, being betrayed in Waddington Hall as he fate at dinner, and thence brought to London with his legs bound to the stirrups, arrested by Warwicke, his guilt spurres taken off, and committed Prisoner to the Tower of London.

(17) The Lyon thus pent, his pawes cut or pared, and Queene Margaret in France with her father Renate, King Edward now quiet, fet his minde upon Government for the good of his Realme. In his Court of Kings Bench he used to sit in person certaine daies together, to see how his lawes proceeded with justice; ordained penall Statutes against excessive pride in Apparrell, especially against long picked shooes then usually worne, which grew to such an extreame, that the pikes in the Toes were turned upward, and with silver chaines, or silke laces tied to the knee. But among many good provisions, one proved very bad, as the sequell shewes; for concluding a league with King Henry of Castile, and John King of Arragon, he granted a license to transport certaine numbers of Cotefwold Sheepe, which are since growne to such an exceeding increase, as the Clothes made of their Woolles is a great hindrance to our Marchants, which adventure in the Levant Seas.

(18) His next care was to finde a fit Queene, both for the hope of Issue to succeede, and for alliance and power to assist (if need were) against Henries claime. First therefore minding to send into Scotland, to desire in marriage the Ladie Margaret, (sister to King Iames the third) thereby to frustrate Henries further hope; was made to believe that the said Ladie was, by reason of sickenesse, not capable of conception, which altogether declined his affection from that way. Next, as some say, a motion was made for Lady Elizabeth, sister and heire apparant unto Henrie King of Castile, as a match most convenient, considering King Edward had thereunto a Claime, whose great Grandmother was one of the heires of Castile, being the daughter of Don Peter the King, besides which high match, and combination of alliances, a hope was conceived that the Dutchies of Guien and Aquitaine, might be recovered by the assistance of these Castilians, without great charge or travell to the English. But the tender spring of the one, and the lusty growth of the other, would not be grafted into one stocke to beare fruit, shee little above sixe, and he about twenty three, farre unfit to abstaine till thee could give him content.

(19) A third Princesse was assaid, against whom could be no exceptions, for birth, beautie, yeares, or Alliance, which was Lady Bona, daughter of Lewis Duke of Savoy, and sister to Carlot the French Queene, at that time residing in the French Court. This double string was thought most fit for King Edwards bow; for the Duke more remote, might strengthen him abroad, and the French neerer home would be made a good neighbour, having the Night-bird still singing in his eare: especially to cast a rubbe in King Henries way, whose hopes lay most upon Lewis, for that Renate of Anjou, stiling himselfe King of Naples, Sicil, and Ierusalem, had more honour by that verball stile, then rents or revenues to maintaine his estate, or any subjection acknowledged by them; so as if King Lewis were Edwards, Anjou was not to be feared feared. This match being most approved in counsell, none was held more fit to solicite the businesse then Lord Richard Nevill the great Earle of Warwicke a man esteemed for power a Demy-King, and for magnificence and hospitality matchlesse: in whose house at London (as some have verified) sixe Oxen were spent every day, and most Taverns in the City full of his meat.

(20) Warwicke in great state arrived at Tours, and his message knowne, was accordingly entertained in the French Court, where he wrought the Queen herselfe to be the chiefest Agent; who drew on her sister Bona, with recommending the state and stile of a magnificent Queene (a sound very tunable in a Ladies eare,) and her Husband Lewis, with assurance of a potent and wise Allie, a pleasing theame to soft-natured-Princes, as the French King was. And indeed to all shee undertooke all good contentments; so as on that side all things were cleare, and Warwicke dismissed with Courtly French complements, the Earle Damp-martin was to passe into England for the finall confirmation.

(21) But whilest Warwicke had beene industriously wooing in France, King Edwards affection in England was working another way; for being on hunting in the Forrest of Wychwood beside Stony-Stratford, hee there found other game, that made game in his eye, which was the Lady Elizabeth Gray attending the Dutchesse of Bedford her mother, who then sojourned at his Mannour of Grafton, whither hee repaired for his recreation. She had beene attendant upon Queene Margaret the Wife of King Henry the sixt, and had beene married unto John Gray Esquier, knighted and slaine at the battell of S. Albans, upon King Henries part, who now was a suiter unto the King, for some thing taken away in the extremity of that time, to be restored towards the maintenance of her estate. But howsoever her suit pierced his eare, her sweetly composed feature strangely affected his heart; more formall she was, and lovely in countenance, then either tall, or exceedingly faire; yet both sufficient to meete in one person, of an excellent witte, a sober demeanour, a modest looke, a feminine smile, and her speech uttered in such a naturall eloquence as her answeres ever set on edge King Edwards desires, which howsoever distastefull to the appetite of his wanton bed, (affirming with blushes, that as shee accounted her selfe most unworthy of the name of his Queene, so she held her selfe of more worth, and her chast honour dearer then to be his Concubine) yet held they him in chase till she had taken him in the snares of her love.

(22) Their many meetings and lovers complements, made the old Dutchesse of Yorke (the Kings Mother) much to suspect it would bee a match; to hinder which, with a Parents authority shee entred discourse, alleading it honourable, safe, and of much profite to linke with some great Princesse in forraigne Lands; both for the increase of possessions abroad, and (as the case stood) to bee affisted at home: that Warwicke had gone so farre in his suite in France, as if in himselfe now were the stay, the feared their displeasures would not be staied. To marry his Subject shee held it unprincely, especially one without revenewes, alliance, or riches, no other thing moving, but a wanton dotage on the person; and although that in Lady Elizabeth nothing was to be misliked, yet was there nothing so excellent, but the fame was incorporated in farre greater Ladies, more meete as shee thought of a Queenely estate. A Virgin (quoth she) is most fit for a sacred Prince his side, whose head is annoynted with holy Oyle, and whose Majesty is outwardly more sublime then the Levitical Priests: yet were they forbidden to make widdowes their wives, lest the holy callings should be defiled with the staine of Bigamy.

(23) When his Mother had said, and expected his answere, the King who had taken counsell of his owne desires, and knew himselfe to bee out of his mothers rule, partly in earnest, and partly in pleasance, made her this reply: That marriage being a spirituall type, ought rather to be conjoyned where God had framed the parties to consent (as this of his was) then in regard of any temporall respect whatsoever. That his choise was pleasing to himselfe, and would be to his Subjects he certainly knew, whose amity before all other Nations hee most preferred and desired; neither could he give them better occasion of love then in this, that being their Soveraigne, hee disdained not to marry into their Tribes; and so likewise for his Issue, there could not any Prince be better beloved then hee that was their naturall Prince so borne of both Parents. That if forraine alliances were so needfull, hee had many of his kin, to contract them, and that with content of all parties: but for himselfe, to marry for possessions, or to please others with displeasing his own affections, hee saw it no wisedome, having already sufficient of the one; and the other offended, even sweete pleasure would seeme sowre pils; especially, the choise that is made by another mans eye. That there are many comparable to her, said hee, I make no question, and am the more glad, let them have them that like them, I will not repine, neither I hope will any abridge me of that which I allow unto others: the Proverbe is (Mother) that marriage goes by Destiny, but to be wived against a mans own liking, is an earthly Purgatory: And therefore my Cosen Warwicke I am sure, neither loveth me so little, to grudge at that I love, nor is so unreasonable to looke that I should in choise of a wife, rather be ruled by his eye, then by mine owne; as though I were a Ward, that were bound to marry by the appointment of a Guardian: I would not be a King with that condition, to forbeare mine owne liberty, in choyse of mine owne marriage. As for possibility of more inheritance by new affinity in forraine land, it proves oftner the occasion of more trouble then profite; and we have already title by that meanes, to so much, as sufficeth to get, and keepe well, in one mans dayes. That she is a widdow, and hath already children, by Gods blessed Lady I am a Bachelour, and have come too, and so each of us hath a proofe, that neither of us is like to be barren. And therefore (Madam) I pray you be content, I trust in God thee shall bring a young Prince, that shall play on your lap, to your great pleasure, and your selfe shall blesse the wombe that bare such a babe: and as for your objection of Bigamy, let the Bishop hardly lay it in my way, when I come to take Orders; for I understand it is forbidden a Priest, but I never wist that it was forbidden a Prince.

His Mothers desire to crosse his purpose of marriage.

(24) The Dutchesse seeing the King so set on his owne choyse, that she could not pull him backe; tooke it in such disdaine, that under pretext of her duty to Godward, she devised to frustrate the match, and rather gave furtherance, that Lady Elizabeth Lucy should be his Queene, whom not long before hee had with wanton dalliances enticed to his bed: for which act, under pretence of a contract with her, whose husband he was before God, (as she alleadged) his Mother openly objected against this his intended marriage, in the discharge (forsooth) of her owne conscience, which was the cause of such an obstacle, as either the Bishops durst not, or the King, proceed to the solemnization of this Wedding, till the same were clearely purged, and the truth openly testified: whereupon Dame Elizabeth Lucy was sent for; which Lady, albeit she was instigated by the Kings Mother, and others, to averre the same, yet when she was solemnly sworne to speake truth, she confessed that they were never affured indeede, howbeit she affirmed his Grace spake so loving words unto her, as she verily hoped he would have maried her, and that if it had not beene for such kinde words, she would never have shewed such kindnesse unto him. This point cleared, and no impediment resting, the

The descent and parentage of the Lady Elizabeth Grey.

(25) She was honourably descended, especially by the surer side, whose Mother was Iaquelin, daughter to Peter of Luxemburge Earle of S. Paul, and Dutchesse to Iohn Duke of Bedford, Regent of France; after whose death she married Sir Richard Woodvile Knight, and among others bare unto him this Elizabeth, Englands faire Queene, who being privately married at the Mannour of Grafton, was afterwards crowned Queene at Westminster with all due celebrations, upon the five and twentieth of May, Anno, 1465. Her Father then by this new made honne in law, and Soveraigne Lord, was created Lord Rivers, and made high Constable of England, her Brother Lord Anthony, married to the sole heire of the Lord Scales, and her Sonne Thomas Grey, borne to her first Husband, was created Marquesse Dorset, and married to the heire of the Lord Bonvile.

(26) But when Warwicke had knowledge the wanton King had got a new Wife, and his courting of Lady Bona, to be but a ball to make Edwards play; hee stormed not a little, whose credite hee tooke to be cracke in the French Court, and himselfe rather thought to have dallyed in this motion, then to deale by commission from his King, for which cause hee conceived so inward an indignation, that his affection was withdrawne from King Edward, and thenceforth ranne upon Henrie, retained in prison, to which end hee temporized with the present King applauded the Queene, and bare countenance in Court with no discontented shew: The King as wary as Warwicke was, cast no eye of dislike, or of any suspition, gave him countenance in Court, and in familiar conference heard him before others; yet left the stem of his greatnesse should overtop his Crown, and his Brethren, the spreading branches, shadow his designes, hee tooke the Chancellorshippe from George Nevill, the one of them, then Bishop of Exceter, afterward Archbishop of Yorke, and from the other Iohn Nevill Baron Montacute, the Earledome of Northumberland, bestowing the same (at the suite of the Northumbrians, set on by himselfe) upon Henry Piercy, whose father was slaine at Touton, and himselfe at that present fled into Scotland for safety. Whereupon Montacute was removed, and to avoide suspition was created Marquesse, a greater name, but farre lesse in power. And to have a stake in store howsoever the Dice chanced to turne, hee sought to joyne friendship with forraine Princes, having offended France for the refusing of his Queenes sister: so as he sought, and abtained the amity of Henry King of Castile, and of Iohn King of Arragon, and tooke a truce with his neighbour the Scottish King for fifteene yeares following.

(27) But these confederates for the more part too farre to be called for by whistle, fortune beyond expectation set him another even at his elbow, which was Philip Duke of Burgundy, Prince of Flanders, Brabant, and Zealand, whose onely sonne legitimate, (Charles Earle of Charoloys a widdower, and without any Sonne) he sought to conjoyne to King Edwards faire Sister, not so much for any love hee bare to the House of Yorke, himselfe being a Lancastrian by his Mothers side, as to bandy against Lewis King of France, whom he had lately overcome in a battell at Montlehery, and as then stood upon his defence, as he was sure King Edward did. This motion King Edward and his Councell well-liked, onely Warwicke withstood it, in favour of the French: but the Lady Margaret sent over according to her estate, and Warwicke left fuming with a discontented minde, after some complements of mirth with his brethren the Archbishoppe, of Montacute, at his Towne of Warwicke, brast forth into warlike consultations for the deposing of Edward, and restauration of Henrie, whose wrongs (as he alleadged) did cry for right at their hands The Bishoppe lightly consented to side for King Henry; but the Marquesse would hardly bee drawne from King Edward, which Warwicke perceiving, layd his lime-twiggs yet another way.

Polid. Com lib. 3. cap. 4

Earle Warwicke plotteth king Edwards deposition.

(28) For being a man of a deepe reach and wit, hee well saw that George Duke of Clarence the Kings second brother, bare not the best liking to the sway of the times: him therefore hee fought to allure to his fift, which once mand, Edward should loose the best Faulcon for his game; him therefore by Problemes hee meant first to prove, and according to their digest, purposed to proceed. So falling in familiar conference with Clarence, beganne to complaine of some unkindnes in the King, both in breach of some promises, and staine of his honour in the French Court. The Duke as discontented as Warwicke, interrupted his tale before it was told: Why my Lord (quoth Clarence) do you looke that a Leopard should have no spots in his skinne, or a Camelion no colours but one? in faith you are deceived, and loose but your labor to wash the naturall Blackamore: for will you have him kinde that is by nature unkinde, and to be respected of him that respects not his owne bloud: or thinke you (a Cosen and Allie) to be raised by him, that seeth (if not seeketh) his owne Brethrens fals? For the heire of the Lord Scales (you see) hee hath married to his Wives brother, the heire of the Lord Bonvile and Harington to his wives sonne, and affianced the heire of the Lord Hungerford to the Lord Hastings, marriages indeed more meete for his two brethren and kinne, then for such new fondlings as hee hath bestowed them upon. But by my George I sweare, if my Brother of Glocester would joyne with me, wee would make him know that we are all three one mans Sonnes, and of one and the same Mother.

Warwicke inveigh against the King.

(29) Earle Warwicke having that which he greedily sought after, seconded the resolution with his owne affistance, imparting now boldly what confederates he had made, and to joyne more faithfully in this his designe, he proffered Clarence his eldest daughter Lady Isabel in marriage, faire and well qualified. with the one halfe of his Wives inheritance, she being sole heire unto Henry Beauchampe Earle of Warwicke her brother, and nothing inferiour to any of those whom Edward had bestowed upon others, which no sooner was spoken, but was as presently embraced, and the plot conferred how to proceede, which was concluded, forth-with to saile unto Calis, (whereof the Earle was Captaine, and where the Virgine Lady lay) as well to confirme the contract betwixt them, as to be absent when the commotion should begin, as the safer from suspition, and the surer to strike when the Ball came to hand, to stirre which, the Archbishop and Montacute were appointed for the North.

The occasion pickt to make Malecontents, was the abuse of Charity unto an Hospitall dedicated to Saint Leonard in the Citie of Yorke, whose revenew stood most upon corne, yearely received from Farmers in the Country, as an Oblation of their first graine. Warwicke and Clarence make affinity.

Pembrooke and his power fall out in their Inne.

The occasion found for a commotion.

to continue what they had begunne.

(31) To which end they choose them two Chieftains, of greater account, and eminent calling, which were Henrie, Sonne and heire to the Lord Fitz-hugh, and Sir Henry Nevill, Sonne and heire to the Lord Latimer, the one of them being Nephew, and the other Cosen-germane unto the Earle of Warwicke; these but young, and not altogether experienced in Armes, choose for their Tutor Sir Iohn Conyers a Knight of such courage, skill and valiantnesse, as in the North parts few were his like: who meaning to strike at the head, determined to march forthwith to London, proclaiming in his way, that Edward was neither a just Prince unto God, nor a profitable King unto the Common-weale.

(32) King Edward hearing of these Northerne proceedings, and that his Brother and Warwicke were preparing against him, sent for the Lord Herbert, whom he had created Earle of Pembrooke, to be his Generall in the North (who partly to deserve the Kings liberality in advancing him to such honour, and partly in emulation he bare toward Warwicke, being the sole obstacle (as he tooke it) why he obtained not the Wardship of the Lord Bonvils daughter and heire for his eldest sonne) did not a little rejoyce of that his employment. And therefore accompanied with Sir Richard Herbert his Brother, and eighteene thousand well-furnished Wellshmen, marched towards the enemy, and after him was sent Humfrey Lord Stafford with sixe thousand Archers to second him in his warres. These Lords meeting together, had notice by espials that the Northern made forwards towards Northampton: to intercept whom, the Lord Stafford lately made Earle of Devonshire was imployed, and Sir Richard Herbert, who with two thousand horse layd themselves covertly by the side of a wood, and sodainely set upon the rereward, the rest having passed: but the Northerne very nimbly turned about, and bad the Wellshmen such welcome as few of them returned to tell of their entertainement.

(33) The King understanding of this hard beginning, mustred his subjects on every side, intending to cope with the Northerne himselfe. And Earle Warwicke as forward to forward his fortunes, gathered his friends, with purpose to encounter with Pembrooke and his Welsh. But before any supplies came to either of both; it chanced the Armies to meete at unawares, upon a faire plaine called Danesmore neere to the Towne Hedgecot, three miles from Banbury, and presently fell to a bickering, wherein Sir Henry Nevill Knight, sonne of the Lord Latimer, upon a lusty courage, venturing somewhat too farre, was taken prisoner, and notwithstanding hee yeelded himselfe to his Takers, was cruelly slaine, which unmartiall act rested not long unrepaied with the losse of most of the Welsh the next day. For the field withdrawn, the L. Stafford repaired to Banbury, and there tooke his lodging, where his affections were much enamoured upon a faire Damsell in the Inne. But the Earle of Pembrooke comming to the same Towne, tooke into the same Inne, and commanded the Lord Stafford to provide him elsewhere, contrary to their agreements made before, whereat Stafford was displeased, and departing thence with his whole Band, left the Earle naked of men in the Towne, and disabled the field of the Archers, whereby the day was lost upon the Kings part, for which he shortly lost his owne head.

(34) The Northerne enflamed for the death of young Nevill, the next morning most valiantly set upon the Wellshmen, and by the force of Archers, drave them from their ground of advantage, which Pembrooke wanting, supplyed with his owne prowesse, and Richard his brother with his Pollaxe twice made way through the battell of the Northern, without any mortall or deadly wound: so that by their valours it was verily supposed the field had beene wonne, had not Iohn Clappam an Esquire and servant to Warwicke displayed his Lords Colours with his White-Beare, and from an eminent place cried a Warwicke, a Warwicke, whereat the Welsh were so terrified, as they turned and fled, leaving their Generall and his brother alone in the field, who valiantly fighting, were incompassed and taken, with the death of five thousand of their men. The Earle with his brother Sir Richard Herbert were brought to Banbury, where with ten other Gentlemen they lost their heads, Conyers and Clappam being their Iudges.

(35) This second victory thus got, and the Northerne now fleshed; under the leading of Robbin of Riddisdale, hasted to the Kings Mannor of Grafton, where the Earle Rivers Father to the Queene then lay, whom with his Sonne Iohn, they sodainely furprized, and in Northampton strucke off their heads without any judgement. The deaths of these Lords the King greatly lamented, and sought to revenge: first therefore writing his Commissions for the apprehension of Lord Humfrey Stafford of Southwicke (who by diligent search was found at Brentmarch, and beheaded at Bridgewater, as he worthily deserved) next hee prepared a mighty Army, and with the same marched towards Warwicke, his company increasing ever as he went.

(36) King Edward set downe his tents at Wolney, foure miles from Warwicke, where the Duke and the Earle of Warwicke hoast lay ready for battell, but by the mediation of friends a peace was intreated, and letters written from either parties, expressing the griefes and wrongs sustained, with proffers of redresse, in amending all, and in shew so farre it proceeded, as the King conceiving a certaine hope of peace, rested secure, not fearing any foule-play, which politique Warwick (by his spiall perceiving) thought it not wisdome to loose the advantage, and thereupon in the dead of the night with a selected Company he entred the Kings Camp, killing them that kept the watch, tooke the King in his bed, and brought him his prisoner to his Castle of Warwicke, and thence by easie journyes in the night had him convayed to Middleham Castle in Yorkeshire, not farre from Richmond, where under the custody of his Brother George Nevill Archbishoppe of Yorke he was retained.

Is imprisoned in Middleham Castle.

(37) His usage was Princely, and according to his estate, which he often acknowledged to the Archbishoppe with all kinde thankes, and complements of wordes, whereby hee wrought himselfe into such trust and favour, as hee had the Forrests to hunt in, and the Parkes for his pleasure, whose pales are well knowne, unsufficient wals to pen the Lyon in, as appeared by this King, who being abroad and on hunting, Sir William Stanley, with Sir Thomas Burgh brought him fresh horse, and such a crew of followers, that his Keepers more feared their owne lives, then were forward to force him backe againe to prison, and so let the game goe without further chase. King Edward thus escaped, Warwicke like a wilde man furiously raged, but seeing no remedy, made use of necessity, and gave forth that himselfe so caused it, having power to make Kings, and to unmake them againe.

King Edward escaped out of prison.

(38) The King forthwith repaired to Yorke, where with great honour hee was joyfully received, and abode certaine daies, which made him well hope of a further supply of friends and men, but fayling thereof, and fearing the Archbishops pursuite, with a small traine he posted to Lancaster, where hee found the Lord Hastings his Chamberlaine well-accompanied for his Convey. His spirits then revived, and traine daily increasing, with speedy journeyes hee came unto London: where all his studies and consultations were, how to be revenged upon these disloyall Lords, his brother, and Earle Warwicke, and they againe fretting at the Archbishoppes folly sought to make stronger their factions against the King.

divisions, and no estate sure to enjoy what was theirs, the Nobles a new began to sollicite the parties unto a Peace, having first obtained liberty to post too and fro without their impeachments, and so effectually layd downe the state of the Land, whose ruines now were so eminent by these intestine warres, that the Natives lamented, the Forrein rejoyced, and God they saw highly displeased, which swoke sword thus given into their hands, was to be feared would be the destruction of the English, as Nabucadnezzars of Babell was of Iudea, and indeed so effectually wrought, that the Duke and Earle upon perfect confidence came to London, accompanyed with a small number in respect of their great danger: where falling into conference with the King, hee taxed them with disloialty, and they him with ingratitude, so that their spleenes were nothing appeased, but much more increased, and with high words departed, the King unto Canterbury, and they againe to Warwicke.

An. Dom. 1470. A commotion in Lincolnshire.

(39) The stout Earle, whose stomacke must have vent, otherwise the Caske must needs breake, caused new stirres to be raised in Lincolnshire, under the leading of Sir Robert Wels, an expert souldier, and sonne of the Lord Wels, who with thirty thousand Commons disturbed the Countrey, and in every place proclaimed King Henrie; setting downe his barrell not farre from Stamford, meaning to abide the encounter of his opposers; which when the King heard of, he sent for the Lord Wels his father, commanding him to write to his sonne to surcease the Warres, and so marching towards Stamford tooke Wels in his company, with a good hope that the sonne would not beare Armes against his owne father in field; but howsoever he had writ, or the King conceived, Sir Robert went on in his former designes, which so fore moved Edward, that he beheaded Lord Wels with Sir Thomas Dimocke that had married his daughter, although hee had given them promise of safety and life.

The Lord Wels and Sir Thomas Dimocke beheaded.

(40) Young Wels then hearing of his Fathers death, sought the revenge upon this untrusty Prince, and not staying for Warwicke, who was in preparing to come, set manfully upon the King and his power, where betwixt them was performed a most bloudy fight, till at last Sir Robert was taken, with Sir Thomas Deland, and others, whereat the Lincolnshire men were so terrified, that casting off their Coates, they all ranne away, in regard whereof this battell to this day is called, the battell of Losecoat-field, wherein were slaine ten thousand men at the least: after which victory the King commanded Wels, with many other of note to be put to death, as the chiefe causers of these dangerous Commotions.

(41) This untimely conflict and unfortunate over-throw, made Clarence and Warwicke, at their wits end, who unprovided to field against Edward, gave way to necessity, and from Dartmouth in Devonshire embarked themselves and wives for France, both to instigate King Lewis, no friend unto Edward, and to secure themselves in Callis (whereof Warwicke was Captaine) till fortune had changed the hand of her play. These, crossing the Seas, cast Anchor before the Towne of Callis, and gave notice they were ready to land, but the Lord Fawclere a Gascoigne, whom Warwicke had substituted his Deputy, discharged divers peeces of Ordnance against them, and sent word flatly they should not come there: meane-while the Dutchesse of Clarence fell in travell, and was there on Shippe-board delivered of a faire Sonne, which Child the Earles deputy would scarcely suffer to be baptized in the Towne, nor without great entreaty permit two flagons of wine to be conveyed aboard to the Ladies lying in the haven. For which his good service, King Edward by his letters Patents made Fawclere chiefe Captaine of Callis, and discharged the Earle, as a Traitour or Rebell against him.

(42) Charles Duke of Burgundy, being then at S. Omers, owing Earle Warwick an old grudge for gainestanding his marriage, thought now a fit time to requite the discourtesie; and therefore sent many thankes unto Fawclere, with promise of a thousand Crownes pension by yeare, if he stood firme for his Wives brother King Edward, himselfe laying the Coast to impeach his arrivage. But how Monsieur Fawclere stood affected, whatsoever shew hee made, Comines the French kings Historian doth tel, who sent Warwicke word of the danger he stood in, of the said Duke, and of Duras the Kings Admirall, so as to land would be his finall confusion: His counsell therefore was that he should make into France, unto whose King he should be most welcome; and as for the Town of Callis, he willed him to take no thought, but promised to make him a good reckoning thereof, when time should best serve. Whereupon the Earle wayed anchor for Normandy, and in his way tooke many rich Ships of the Duke of Burgundies Subjects, which netled him not a little, but yet found no docke to rub out the smart.

The Duke of Burgundy bends himself against Earle Warwick.

(43) King Lewis hearing of the arrivage of Warwicke, and knowing his troubles to arise for his Ambassage to Bona, and faith unto France, sent certaine Princes to conduct him to the Castle of Amboys, where a supply was made against all necessities, and himselfe and traine most honourably intertained, whereat the Duke of Burgundy fore repined, and sent Lewis word that he disliked his doings, with threats of revenge, if he ayded him against his wives brother. This not withstanding, the French king gave all comforts to these fugitives, and prepared his assistance for their restorations, and the raising againe of godly King Henry.

(44) Queene Margaret having fled England and sojourning in France with her Father Renate, (a King in name, but scarcely able to beare the State of an Earle) saw now the Iron hot, and ready to be strucke, therefore with her Sonne Prince Edward, Iohn Earle of Oxford, and Iasper Earle of Pembrooke (who lately had escaped out of prison in England) came unto Amboyse, where by meanes of the French King a combination of Alliance was confirmed betwixt the Prince of Wales, young Edward, and Anne the second daughter to the Earle of Warwicke, then present with her Mother and Sister in France. That King Henry should be againe restored, the Duke of Clarence, and the Earle tooke a solemne Oath never to desist whiles they had power, and in the nonage of the Prince they joyntly were to be deputed his Protectors, and the lands sole Governors.

Renate of great title and small power.

(45) Edward in England hearing what Queene Margaret, his brother Clarence, and stout Warwicke in the French Court had done, was struck into a sodaine dumpe, being as doubtfull of friends, as fearefull of foes, and therefore such as were alied to the Lancastrians, or favorites of the down-cast K Henry, he began somewhat roughly to deale with: many therefore that were guilty dayly tooke Sanctuary, or yeelded themselves to his mercy, among whom Iohn Marquesse Montacute brother to Warwicke was one, who with faireft words of promises, was received into favour, and upon whose example many others came in, which notwithstanding meant to stand out if occasion should serve. But no busier was Edward to keepe the Crowne on his head, then these Lords in France were resolute to strike it off: in middeft of whose consultations behold how it happened.

King Edward driven into his dumps.

A marriage concluded betwixt Prince Edward and Anne daughter of Earle Warwicke.

(46) There came from England to Callis a damsell belonging (as she said) to the Dutchesse of Clarence, who signified unto Monsieur Fawclere that shee came from King Edward with a declaration of peace, which hee fearing to impart the conditions to other, had made her the instrument, the better to passe without any suspect, and hee glad to heare for the Earles sake (whom he entirely affected) gave her his safe conduct unto the Duke of Clarence then at Amboys; where having private accesse unto him, shee told, that it was neither naturall nor honourable for him to take part against the house of Yorke; that that the house of Lancaster was not onely by the whole Court of Parliament debarred to be the indubitate Heire of the Kingdome, but that King Henrie himselfe had discharged his Issue from claime, as it standeth (said she) upon Record to be seene, contrary to which, as he might well perceive this marriage of Prince Edward with the Earles daughter, did onely aime and intend to the utter extinct of the House of Yorke, whereof himselfe was one, and in neere possibility of the Crowne, Edwards Issue young, and not many, and the King very wanton, a sinne commonly punished with want of posterity, which if it so chanced, then hee, or his were the next. These reasons wayed, so over-wayed the Dukes further designes, that hee promised thereafter a more brother-like affection, as (said hee) Edward should finde; with which good newes he returned into England, Warwicke utterly ignorant what was said or done.

The Duke of Clarence inclineth to his brother.

Warwicke and Clarence returne into England.

(47) All now in a readinesse for the returne, ships, money and men supplied by the French King, the Admirall of France was sent to secure them from the Duke of Burgundies Fleet, which with an extraordinary number and power lay in the mouth of Seyne, to fight with Warwicke when he should loose out of Harbour: but see how the Heavens favoured, and frowned upon the parties, for the night before they should hoyse saile, such a stormy tempest tooke the Dukes Fleete, lying more remote from the Lee, that they were scattered asunder, some into Scotland, some into Denmarke, and many of them drowned. But the Seas calmed, and the winde serving faire, the English set saile and landed at Dartmouth, whence they had shipped into France almost sixe moneths before.

King Lewis favoreth Warwicke.

Burgundy offended with Lewis for favouring his enemy.

(48) King Edward relying upon Burgundy abroad, and thinking all friends who fawned at home, gave himselfe dayly to follow the Hound and the Hawke, and nightly to his Court pleasures in dancings and daliances with damsels, little minding their approach that meant to marre his mirth; for Warwicke now landed, proclaimed King Henry, commanding all from sixteene to sixty, upon a great penalty to take Armes against Edward Duke of Yorke, the most unjust usurper of Henries rightfull Crowne, and uncredible it was, to see the confluence of them which came armed to him, who ere-while applauded and approved none but King Edward. Thus making towards London, his company dayly encreased; which the youthfull King seemed little to regard, but verily supposing hee had now Warwicke in his trappe, wrote to Burgundy to secure the Seas, left he should escape againe into France, and to his Lords of England, to attend him in his wars; but very many neglected his commaund, and few or none made their repaire. Which when Edward perceived, hee was strucke into a great feare, and with his brother of Glocester, the Lord Hastings his Chamberlaine, and the Lord Scales the Queenes brother, hee hasted towards Nottingham, there to determine what was to be done.

Septemb 13. An. Reg. 10.

King Edwards opinion touching Warwickes approach.

(49) In the mean-while the bastard Fawconbridge in the West, and the Earle of Pembrooke in Wales, every where proclaimed King Henry; and to forward the matter, D. Godard preaching at Pauls-Crosse declared by reading of Billes, and divers other proofes, that King Henry was the undoubted and true heire unto the English Crowne. Neither is the Lord Montacute now the man that he was, who having mustered sixe thousand, in the name of King Edward, and brought them forward almost to Nottingham, on the sodaine drew backe his forces, alleadging that Edward was ungratefull, and regardles of his friends, as himselfe said, himselfe was the example, who having served him in many bloudy battels, was rewarded with a verball word Marquesse, without any maintenance at all, no not so much as Pyes poore nest: and therefore hee had just cause never to draw his Sword in his quarrell any more, and them that did, he assured them should receive the like reward in the end.

(50) These, with the like distastures, divulged among the rude multitude, it wasa world to see the face of this new World, for in every street Bonfires were made, in every Church Bels rung, Ditties were sung at every meeting, and every man cryed King Henrie, King Henrie, whose Eccho likewise redoubled, a Warwicke, a Warwicke, and indeed all so applauded the passage now on foote, as King Edward hearing the rumor, thought it not safe any longer to stay, and therefore with those trusty Lords and some others, hee fled from his hoast besides Nottingham, passing the Washes towards Lynne, with greater difficulties then was befitting a Prince to adventure; and thus without any order taken for his Realme, in two Hulkes of Holland, and one English shippe, destitute of all necessary provisions, set saile toward Burgundy, and in the way was encountred by the Easterlings, Englands great Enemies, having much adoe to cleare himselfe from their surprise.

(51) In these times of miserie the Queene (whose marriage was the onely cause of all these stirres) upon the first of October had stolne out of the Tower, and taken Sanctuary at Westminster, where like a woman forsaken thee solitarily remained, and on the fourth of November following was delivered of a Sonne, which without all pompe, more like a private mans Childe then a Prince, was there also baptized by the name of Edward, who after his fathers death, a while was King of England, as shall be said; other Sanctuaries were full of King Edwards friends, that prayed devoutly for his prosperous health, and well hoped the world would againe turne, as shortly it did. One King thus fled, and the other in prison, the Kentish, whose conditions are mutable at the change of Princes, came to seeke prey in London, where they knew it was to be had: Ratcliffe, S. Katherines, and Southwarke they robbed, and within the Citie did some hurt besides, yea, and surely more had done, had not Earle Warwicke in good time come to the rescue, which encreased his name, that was great enough before.

(53) Thus farre proceeded, and Henrie re-established, a Parliament was begunne at Westminster the sixe and twentieth day of November following, wherein King Edward was declared a Traitor to his Country, an usurper of the Crowne, and all his goods confiscated; the like judgement passed against all his partakers; wherein also it was enacted, that all such persons as had taken Armes in his quarrell; should be severely punished; among whom, Iohn Typtoft Earle of Worcester, King Edwards Lieutenant in Ireland was attainted, who being found hid in the top of a tree in the Forreft of Weybridge, not farre from Huntington, was brought to London, and upon Tower-hill beheaded. Moreover, all Statutes made by King Edward were clearely revoked, abrogated, and made frustrate: the Crownes of England and France entayled to King Henrie, and the Heires-male lawfully begot of his body, and for the want of ſuch heires unto George Duke of Clarence, and his heire-males lawfully produced, and the ſaid Duke to be the next heire to his father Richard Duke of Yorke, diſabling his elder brother Edward, by the vertue of his Atteindor; and Iaſper Earle of Pembrooke, Iohn Earle of Oxford with other, attainted by the uſurper Edward, to be reſtored in bloud, dignities, and ancient poſſeſſions; and finally, Earle Warwicke the good Common-wealths man, made Gouernour of the Realme in theſe turbulent times, unto whom was aſſociated George Duke of Clarence, this great Earles ſonne in law, and Warwickes brother Montacute upon his ſubmiſſion obtained his pardon, which was the eaſilier gotten for his ſervice at Nottingham.

(54) Queene Margaret appointed to follow into England, if fortune did favour theſe great Lords ſucceſſe, now hearing of the faire Sun-ſhine, wherein her Husband King Henry was ſet, amidſt the ſtormie winter blaſts, which the ſeaſon afforded, with Prince Edward her ſonne, ſet ſaile from France, towards that wiſhed and temperate climate, where the ſpring of new Regality beganne to bud forth, but was met with ſuch tempeſt and ſtorming ſeas, as ſhee was forced to returne, and deferre her journey untill another time, to her great griefe and ſore diſcontent. In like perplexity was the Burgundian Duke, who neither durſt give Edward his outward aſſiſtance (the French and Warwicke being ſo mighty oppoſites) nor leave him in diſtreſſe, leſt the ſparkes of diſcontent ſhould flie from the eyes of his faire wife, and therefore to know whether Vawclere the Governour of Callis ſtood reſolute for him, according to Covenants, hee ſecretly ſent Philip Comines the honymouth Hiſtorian, to drop ſome of his ſweet eloquence into his gold-thirſting eare.

(55) Comines comming to Callis, and obſerving the ſequence for which he was ſent, ſaw every man weare the Earle of Warwicks badge, for no head could bee gallant that was not adorned with his ragged ſtaffe, nor no doore frequented that was not painted with his white Croſſe. Inſomuch that Vawclere himſelfe had a Iewell in his Hatte, wherein was a white ragged ſtaffe, embroidered with gold, and others his followers the like wrought in ſilke, gold, and ſilver; and to ſtampe the print deeper, a liking and report was brought to the towne, that Warwicke had prepared foure thouſand valiant men to warre upon the frontiers of Burgundy. But Comines in conference ſo wrought with the Councell, and they againe with Earle Warwicke, as he was contented to leave off the enterpriſe, Duke Charles promiſing to ſide with King Henrie.

(56) King Edward hearing what his brother of Burgundy had done, and being dayly ſolicited from his friends in England, thought it no policy long to delay, leſt Henry ſhould take growth to a bigger ſtreame; and therefore repairing to his brother in the towne of Saint Paul, required his ayde, as the onely man on whom hee relied, aſwell for the bond of alliance in the marriage of his ſiſter, as alſo in regard of the orders which they both ware, the King that of his, which was the golden Fleece; and the Duke the Gartar and Roabe of Saint George. In the Court of Burgundy at that time lay Edmund Duke of Somerſet, coſen-germane removed unto Duke Charles, a great enemy againſt the houſe of Yorke, and now ſet himſelfe to thwart King Edwards ſuite, alledging, that it was more honourable for the Duke of Burgundy to ſide with the Lancaſtrians, from whom he was deſcended by his Grand-mother the daughter of Iohn of Gaunt: as alſo in the uprightneſſe of King Henries title, held good in her brother, and his Grandfather, and in her Nephew his father without all exceptions.

(57) The Duke perplexed betweene theſe great ſupplicants, did then, as many doe now, ſpeake much, and meane nothing leſſe, or elſe ſay little, and meane to doe much. To Sommerſet, for Henry, he outwardly promiſed all helpe and aſſiſtance, but never gave the leaſt, and to Edward no comfortable words of ſupply, and yet under-hand he hyred him Shippes, furniſhed him with munition, and lent him fifty thouſand Florences in money. And now the ſeaſon ſerving for warre, King Edward with two thouſand ſtrong beſides his Mariners made ouer for England, attempting to take land in Norfolke; but thoſe coaſts guarded, hee wafted more Northward, and entring Humber, landed at Ravenſpur in Yorkeſhire, when laying aſide all claime to the Crowne, and pretending nothing but his Dutchy of Yorke, he ſhewed the rude multitude the Letters and ſeale of the Earle of Northumberland, which as he affirmed, and made them beleeve was ſent for his ſafe conduct to enjoy the ſame, and in every place where he came proclaimed King Henry himſelfe, wearing an Eſtrich Feather, which was Prince Edwards Livery, and paſſing to Yorke in no other ſhew then a Subject, his oath firſt taken to be true to King Henry, entred the City, which preſently hee ſurpriſed and aſſumed to himſelfe.

(58) Earle Warwicke now hearing that Edward was landed, before he had marched very farre in the maine, ſent ſtrait charge to his brother the Marqueſſe Montacute then reſiding at Pomfret (with a ſufficient Army to ſecure thoſe parts) that hee ſhould not ſuffer his acceſſe unto Yorke, leſt he grew more potent, then was to bee wiſhed; himſelfe making ready with all poſſible ſpeed to repare into thoſe parts; but whether the Marqueſſe purpoſely winked, or elſe (and that rather) would not ſee at all, hee made no great haſt to fore-lay his way to Yorke, neither ſought to empeach the paſſage: when Edward from thence marched in a more hoſtile manner towards Nottingham; taking his way not farre from Pomfret, and as it were through the middeſt of his enemies; which encouraged many to favour his deſignes, holding that Montacute was either a friend, or a fraide to deale againſt ſo powerfull an enemy.

(59) The White Roſe thus bloomed, and the red falling his leafe, all tooke the time of this pleaſant ſpring, and flocked to Edward as to their Aprill Sun, who now more able, and therefore more bold, made forward towards Leiceſter, where the Earles of Warwicke and Oxford with a great power were, but becauſe Clarence was abſent, they let Edward hold on without any encounter, whoſe traine as hee paſſed was like to a river that in the running is ever encreaſed with new ſprings, which Warwicke perceiving, thought it more then time to give battell, well knowing that his brothers forbearance had given him that head. And to that end ſent unto Clarence, then about London in levying of men, but hee ſomewhat too backeward, and Warwicke too forward, tooke into the City Coventrie, meaning from thence to ſet on the enemy. But Edward, whoſe ſtar had now paſt the darke threatning cloud, pitched his tents neere unto that Citie in a plaine field, and valiantly bad the Earle come to battell. But hee then miſtruſting (as in truth he had cauſe) that the boldneſſe of Edward was backt by a Clarence, kept cloſe within the Wals, with a purpoſe to ſee how the world would goe.

(60) Edward loth to looſe time about one Cities ſiege, raiſed his Campe, and haſted forward toward Warwicke, unto which Towne likewiſe his brother Clarence, with foure thouſand ſtrong was on march: Theſe meeting upon a plaine, three miles from the Towne, ſet their battels in Aray, as if they meant to have fought, but the King, his brother Gloucester, Lord Rivers, Haſtings, and others, without any gard made towards Clarence, which vvhen he beheld, himſelfe accompanied vvith ſome of eſtate, encountred his brother vvith a loving countenance and friendly cheare, ſo as no ſparke of hatred vvas perceived betvvixt them, but vvith all brotherly affections entred into amity and peace, vvhich afterwards proved the confuſion of the Duke. Clarence thus got, ſought to to draw Warwicke into the ſame traine, to which end he ſent certaine meſſengers unto him; firſt to excuſe his owne fact, as too unnaturall for him to unſheath his ſword againſt his owne brother, as alſo hee fought to ſtay the effuſion of Engliſh bloud, which in theſe quarrels lay ready to be ſhed: his peace with Edward he promiſed to worke, and that with ſuch honour as Warwicke ſhould know himſelfe nor onely a father to Clarence, but likewiſe unto Edward, great Englands King. Vnto all which motion Warwicke gave eare onely, with this reply, Go tell your Duke (ſaid he) that I had rather be an Earle, and alwayes like my ſelfe, then a falſe and perjured Duke, and that ere my oath ſhall be falſified (as his apparantly is) I will lay downe my life at my enemies foote; which I doubt not but ſhall be bought very deare.

(61) This ſtout reſolution made Edward more warie, and therefore to obtaine London, the onely key that opened the doore to the Crowne, he haſted thitherward, whoſe Citizens hearing of the increaſe of his hoſte, and waying that Henry was but a milkeſop to him, thought it moſt ſafety to ſayle with the faireſt winde, and therefore ſet open their Gates, and with publique applaud cryed, King Edward. Which when the Duke of Sommerſet with others, left to attend the innocent King Henrie, heard, they fled for their lives; and left him in the Biſhops Palace at London, where his Competitor King Edward tooke him, and ſent him againe priſoner to the Tower. With ſo many winds are the ſayles of their ſhips filled, which ſeeke the Port of their ſafety by the affections of the people: for even the ſame day had Henrie beene carried through the Citie (as it were) in triumph, and had heard the ſhouts of the Commons in every ſtreete crying; God ſave King Henrie.

(62) But Earle Warwicke hearing how things went in London, and now fully conceiving that the hazyard of battell muſt determine either with, or againſt him, being come to Saint Albanes, fell into a deepe conſideration what was to be done: His aſſiſtants were Iohn Duke of Exceſter, the Earles of Oxford and Sommerſet, and Marqueſſe Montacute his brother, whom notwithſtanding he did not greatly truſt, being alwayes too favourable to the contrary Faction. Theſe in Counſell held it beſt policie to follow the enemy, and before the body grew too great, to lop off the branches, leſt they ſhould ſhadow their Sun-ſhine too farre. In which reſolution, they haſted forward, and came unto Barnet, with a full purpoſe to recover London: but Edward well knowing the ſtare of the City unfurniſhed for ſiege, and ready to take ſtampe of any impreſſe, meant not to be pent within thoſe weake wals; and therefore taking with him unfortunate Henry, leſt any conſederacy ſhould be made in his abſence, he marched with all poſſible haſt, to encounter his oppoſites, before they came too-farre, and upon Gladmore neere unto Barnet ſet downe his Tents cloſe to the enemy; the Eve of Chriſts reſurrection, ſo careleſſe is Mars of divine celebrations, that the holieſt Feaſt is prophaned, when his Sword is drawne.

(63) The next day being the Paſchall whereon Chriſt roſe from death, which with due reverence is celebrated in all the Chriſtian World, theſe Engliſh contenders for a terreſtriall Crowne, with iteſull hearts and hands as ready, made ready to digge each others graves: for at breake of day Warwicke began to Marſhall his Army, which he divided into three battalions: The right Wing was led by the Marqueſſe his brother, with the Earle of Oxford, conſiſting chiefly of Horſe-men, himſelfe with the Duke of Exceſter led the left; and the maine battell was commanded by Edmund Duke of Sommerſet, which was ſupplied for the moſt part with Archers. K. Edward likewiſe ordered his men. The fore-ward was led by Richard Duke of Glouceſter his brother, a good Souldier and ſufficient for adviſe, the middle by himſelfe, and his brother Clarence, having King Henry in their company; And the Rere-ward was commanded by the Lord Haſtings, ever moſt firme for the Houſe of Yorke, reſerving a freſh ſupply, when occaſion ſhould ſerve.

King Edward carried King Henry with him to battell.

Barnet-field fought upon Eaſter day.

(64) The battels joyned, were manfully maintained by the proweſſe of Oxford, upon that part of the kings, againſt which he fought, which with great violence he forced backe, ſo that many of them fled to London, bringing newes that with Warwicke went the day: and ſurely in great forwardneſſe it was, had not fortune thwarted it by an unexpected chance: for the day being foggy, and over-caſt with Miſts, hindred their eyes of any farre ſight, ſo as the ſtarres embroidered upon the Earle of Oxfords mens Coats, were miſtaken for the Sunne, which King Edwards men wore, in which errour Warwickes battell let flie at their owne fellowes, who were in great forwardneſſe to have wonne the day, and they not knowing the cauſe of theerror cried, treaſon, treaſon, we are all betraid. Whereupon the Earle of Oxford with eight hundred fled the Field, leaving the chance to be caſt for the Crowne; which when Warwicke perceived, with words like a Souldier, he encouraged his men, and ſeeing the freſh ſupply of his enemy draw now unto fight, he furiouſly ruſhed into the midſt of their battell, wherein he adventured ſo far as he could not bee reſcued, but valiantly fighting was ſtrucke downe, and among them ſlaine, having repaid his danger with many a wound. The Marqueſſe Montacute made forward to ſecond his brother, (who till then had been the Marre and Make-King of England) but was ſo over-laid by his oppoſites, that they ſent his ſoule likewiſe from his body, whereby was ended that bloudy dayes taske.

assistance to erect Prince Edward her sonne, though it were done with the losse of their owne lives, requiring her onely to undertake the authority of the war, and themselves would undergoe the charge and burthen thereof by whose valour and power, they doubted not to daunt the pride of the Vsurping Edward; who now held himselfe sure, & began to grow careless. To these their resolutions the warlike Queene most gladly consented, and gave all encouragements unto them shee could; when falling in counsell how to proceede; her care (according to the naturall affection of a Mother) was most upon the safetie and life of her sonne: and therefore aswell for their owne parts (if fortune should faile in this their first attempt) as for the feare which the Torkists would possesse (who whiles Prince Edward his corrivall lived, could not account the Diademe his Bride) shee thought it best to send him back againe into France, till God had set the Crowne where it should stand: whence he might supply them with new forces, or at least-wise over awe Edward for tyrannizing too farre. But the Lords contrary-wise alleadged, that Prince Edward being the morning-Sunne of the Lancastrians hopes, and the rayes very splendent to most English eyes, was to be present in field himselfe, whose sight would both heat the courage of his own Souldiers, and attract the glance of his adversaries hearts, either to fight faintly, or else, and that rather, to come to his side. Thus their counsell at that time prevailed; and thus resolved, every man departed to make ready his power, the Queene with her French repairing to Bathe.

The opinions of the Lords.

(69) But Edward in London had not sat two dayes in rest, before he heard of Queene Margarets arrivage, and the confluence of people out of Cornewall, Devonshire, and of the Westerne parts, which hourely flew to give her assistance; wherefore committing to the Tower King Henry, and George Archbishop of Torke, with a selected company, hee marched to meet them, intending to cut off many Springs before they should joyne to the body of a River, whose streame without danger could not be passed: therefore from Windsor, Abington, Chichester, and Malmesbury he proceeded; seeking and urging his enemies to battell: but the Queen and her forces fearing to abide in Bathe, removed to Bristow, Berkley, and Glocester, and lastly, at Tewkesbury, Duke Sommerset, her Generall, pitched downe his Tents, not staying the comming of the Earle of Pembroke: his battell he marshalled into three sights, whereof himselfe and his brother John Lord Sommerset led the foreward; the middle battalion was commanded by Edward the young Prince, under the conduct of the Lords Saint John and Wenlocke, and the Rereward governed by John Courtney Earle of Devonshire, a mortall enemy against the house of Torke.

(70) King Edward, who was come now within sight of his enemies, divided likewise his Army into three battalions, committing the Foreward unto the guidance of his brother Richard Duke of Gloucester, a good Souldier, and of a deepe reach and policy: the Maine hee undertooke to governe himselfe, and the Rereward was commanded by the Lord Hastings his Chamberlaine. The field thus Marshalled, and the signe of battell being given, a most bloudy fight began, the King had planted his Ordnance at most advantage, which Glocester frankley bestowed among the Dukes men, and they lodged betwixt ditches, bushes, and hedges, with their showers of Arrowes galled Glocesters followers, so as by his command his battell gave backe, as though they would shrinke, which Sommerset no sooner perceived, but that hee came on, and overcome with courage, came out of his strength, when by a certaine passage before-hand provided, hee came into the place where King Edward was embattelled, thinking verily that Wenlocke had followed at his backe, who as it seemed meant nothing lesse.

(74) Queene Margaret in this fatall day of battell fled towards Worcester, and by the way tooke in a poore Religious House in that her present distresse: but three dayes after she was apprehended and brought unto Worcester to King Edward, who committed her to sure and strait keeping, in which City she a while remained. But fodain news brought him, that the Northerne men were in Armes, and meant to adventure for her liberty, the Conquerour marched to Coventrey, and there made preparation further to proceed: which when these hot spirits perfectly understood, their courages grew colder, and their Weapons cast away, they came thronging to Edward to offer him subjection; yet the Lancastrians were not so minded, but rather intended once more to try whether fortune would afford them her smile.

(76) His enterprise desperate, and his name growne fearefull at Sea, hee meant to make it no lesse on the Land; for putting in at Dover, many misgoverned and loose persons daily drew to him, so as his power grew to be seventeene thousand strong: with these through Kent he made his way towards London, meaning to doe much, the land so molested with intestine warres; and lodging his hoast on the South-side of London, commanded the Citizens to give him accesse, that with King Henrie, (whom hee meant to release from the Tower) hee might passe through their streets, to meete and encounter the Vsurping Edward. But the Londoners knowing the rudenesse of these Rake-hels, kept their gates shut, and guarded the same with sufficient strengths: whence some Lords of the royall-blood therein residing, sent unto Edward of their prefent danger, who presently sent them fifteene hundred of his best Souldiers, after whom in person he warily marched, leading with him his prisoner Queene Margaret, whose bounds he well knew, gave him the full scope of liberty.

The Citizens withstood his entrance.

(77) Fawconbridge in the meane-while thirsting after spoyle with his Ships, secured the Thames above S^t. Katherines, purposing with his land-forces to passe the River at Kingstone: but hearing that Edward was on his March, and fearing to be cut off from the benefit of his Ships, he altered his minde; when to open his way into London, hee caused the Bridge to be fired, and three thousand of his men being set over Thames by his Ships, divided themselves into two Companies, the one assaying to enter at Algate, and the other at Bishops-Gate, both which they likewise set on fire, so that the Citie was in three places fired and assaulted at once, but with such evill successe to the assailants, that seaven hundred were slaine, and the bold Bastard driven to his Ships.

The place being thus charged with the presence of two Kings and their Queenes: the Crookebacke of Glocester intended to cleare by taking him away that stood in his brothers way, whose Successor as is thought hee then meant to be; and making his inward mind more deformed then were his outward Lineaments, without regard of bloud-defiled hands, stabbed the most innocent Henry to the heart with his Dagger, in which act at once began the ones happy rest, and the others foule guilt, which accompanied his conscience to the day of his death.

He was of stature very seemely, of body slender, of face beautifull, and by a naturall inclination abhorred all vice, farre from pride, given to prayer, well read in the Scriptures, using workes of Charity, and so chaste, as no suspition of incontinency could bee conceived in him: nay, so farre to the contrary, that when certaine Ladies presented themselves before him in a Maske with their Haire loose, and their Breasts uncovered (he then a Bachelour, and able of marriage) hee immediately rose up, and departed the presence, saying; Fie, fie, forsooth yee are too blame. Oath hee used none, but in weighty matters, his affirmation was forsooth, and forsooth; very mercifull to the poore, and so pittifull to Malefactors, as hee commanded the quarters of Traitors to be taken downe from the Gates, and buried, and so farre from revenge, that he willingly pardoned the greatest offences against him; for a Ruffian intending his death, wounded him in the side with his Sword, what time he lay prisoner in the Tower, and being restored to his Kingly estate, hee freely forgave the fact; and another like Ruffian striking him on the face, hee punished with this onely reprehension; Forsooth you are to blame to strike mee your annointed King: for these and his other patient vertues, King Henry the seventh affayed to have him canonized a Saint, but Pope Iulius the second demanding too-great a summe, the King went no further in the suite: notwithstanding, in the repute of the vulgar he was taken for no lesse, so as his red Hat which he had worne, healed the head-ach, when it was put on, as the simple beleeved.

blades of rebellion, and made great preparation to accomplish the same, wch the Bastard hearing (though strong in his Sea-men) durst not bandy against, but sent his submission, with proffer of service and loyall obedience, and indeed so temporized with the King, as besides his pardon obtained, the Sword of Knighthood was laid upon his shoulder, and he was presently made the Kings Vice-Admirall for the Seas. In which his office he so bare himself (either by his owne deserts, or the Kings Conceit) as he not long enjoyed the same, but was at Southampton beheaded, and other of King Henries old favourites likewise sought after, and daily indangered.

(84) In which times of feare, Jasper Earle of Pembrooke, with his Nephew young Henry Earle of Richmond, fled into Britaine, where, of that Duke they were most courteously entertained, with assurance made, that no wrong should be offered them, during their stay in his Dominions. And so these two Earles the Vncle and Nephew, there attended the day of their wished successe.

(85) But John Earle of Oxford, who had withdrawne himselfe from Barnet-field first into Wales, and thence into France, was farre more unpatient of those rough times, for having gotten store of provision by strong hand at Sea, with seventy-seven men onely surprized Saint Michaels Mount in Cornewell, and made that piece good against the King, which he kept and re-victualled, but whether by force or favour King Edward much suspected, and therefore the more willingly came to a composition with his Subject, who upon the pardon of his life delivered the Mount to the King: and as some say the rather, for that his minde was then troubled with many ominous signes. For certaine Boornes about this time burst out of the Earth, as Woe-meere at Market in the County of Bedford, whose name carried the quality of his nature. In Kent, at Canterbury, Leversham, and Langley-Parke, at Croyden in Surrey, and at Hungerwill neere Dudley-Castle, one running very foule: all of them predictions, as that credulous age beleeved, of great troubles to come: and therefore not trusting a new reconciled enemy, King Edward sent the said Earle prisoner unto the Castle of Hames in Normandy, where he remained the space of twelve yeares, unto the last of King Richard the third, most securely guarded, and so fitrailly kept, as Lady Margaret his Countesse could not be suffered to have accesse unto him, in all that time. Neither was shee allowed any thing out of his revenewes, or from the King, to maintaine her estate, but was forced to live upon the Charity of others, and by the workes that she made with her Needle; both of them very short to supply her great wants. This unmercifull and almost unhumane usage, was the more extremely followed, for that Oxford himselfe, his father and brother, had ever sided with the Lancastrians. And her selfe being sister unto Richard Earle of Warwicke, the Capitall obstacle against King Edwards proceedings, was held either dangerous, if her wealth ballanced her birth and estate, or else unworthy of his favour, whose good fortunes as was suggested, shee ever maligned.

(86) But much more miserable was the State of Lord Henry Holland, Duke of Exceter, and Earle of Huntington, who flourished so long as King Henries pillar stood crowned on his base, and the Lancastrians (of whose House himselfe was) over-swayed the times; he being the sonne of Lady Elizabeth, the second daughter of John of Gaunt, and having married the sister of Edward the then raigning King, was notwithstanding driven to such want, as hee may serve an example to all, how uncertaine Adams sons are of any continuing greatnesse. For (saith Philip Comines) I once saw the Duke of Exceter runne on foot bare-legged, after the Duke of Burgundies Traine, begging his bread for Gods sake, but hee uttered not his name, hee being the neerest of the house of Lancaster, and brother in Law unto King Edward, and being knowne what he was, Burgundy gave him a small pension to maintaine his estate.

(87) But when King Henry was againe restored, and the Title of the Crowne laid upon the successe of Barnet-field, this man, Lord Henry, bare himselfe most bravely against King Edward, and in fight was struck downe, and left for dead, where, in his bleeding wounds he lay most part of the day, but yet recovering, and got to Westminster, he there tooke Sanctuary to save his life, for which, hee became Suiter unto the King; but his wife, Lady Anne, sister unto King Edward, sued as earnestly for a divorce, which with great instancy she lastly obtained against him. How he released himselfe from the wrath of the King, is uncertaine, and how he came by his death no man can tell, for his body was found cast upon the shoare of Kent, as though he had perished by shipwracke upon the Sea.

(88) Now Edward, to finish all factions, thought best to lop off both bough and branch; that gave any shadow to the Lancastrians designes, to which end he rather picked, then found occasion of Treason, in George Nevill Arch-bishop of Yorke, whose goods, lands, and Lordships, hee seized upon, got possession of his rich Plate and Iewels, whereof one in his Miter was of such valew, as the King caused it to be set in his Imperiall Crowne, and the Archbishop to bee sent over sea to the Castle of Hames, where he remained a prisoner a long time after, with no such curteous intertainment as himselfe had used to Edward when he was his prisoner.

(89) But the escape of Pembrooke and of Earle Richmond troubled the King not a little, the onely men now left to bandy against him, and therefore were most followed with a suspicious eye. Insomuch as Edward wrote unto the Duke of Britaine their receiver, with promises of heapes of gold to have them sent backe and delivered unto his hands: but the Duke that had given them his safety before, answered the Englishs Ambassadors, that it stood not with honour, so to betray these distressed Princes, fled to him for reliefe, yet he faithfully undertook, that they should be so followed, as King Edward should sleepe quiet from their molestations, which being no better, Edward notwithstanding made the best of it.

(90) All now in quiet, and Edward raigning without any Competitor, or malignant disturber, caused a high Court of Parliament to be assembled at Westminster, wherein he re-established those Acts, which Henry had abrogated, and abrogated those that were made against his Favourites; at which season the Duke of Burgundy sent his Ambassadors unto Edward, craving his ayde against the French King, which was the more willingly heard and granted, as well for his favours received of the Duke, in time of his necessitie, as for spleene against Lewis, who had aided Warwick to dispossesse him of his Crown. And indeede this was a sparke, that was likely to set the hearts of the English on fire to recover France, lost by Henry the last King.

(91) All things in a readinesse, King Edward repaired to Dover, and there embarked himselfe for Calis, with the greatest Army that ever from England set sayles into France: for he had in his Company fifteene hundred Noble-men, and men at Armes, all of them mounted, and most of them barbed, who with the Archers on horse-backe also, made up the number of fifteene thousand, besides a great number of foot-men and others to pitch Tents, to attend the Artillery, and inclose their Campes. Before the Kings departure from England, hee had sent Gartar King at Armes unto King Lewis with a Letter of defiance: whose contents demaunded no lesse, then the whole Realme of France, which if he refused, hee threatned to invade his Dominions with fire and sword.

(92) The Letter received, and read in secret by Lewis himselfe, he privately sent for, and conferred with with the Herald, telling him that it was not Edward, but Burgundy that raked abroad these dying finders, who as a man discomfited and unfurnished for warre, would draw in the English, by his file dealings to their inestimable Charges, to supply his defects; that Burgundy being of the House of Lancaster, hated most deadly the Family of Yorke; and more for feare then love married Edwards sister. As touching the Constable he told him, though Edward had married his Neece, yet he would deceive him, as he had done his owne Master of France, who had heaped many and extraordinary benefits upon him. And lastly with the gift of three hundred Crownes, and the promise of a thousand more, he instigated the Herald to worke a Peace. Gartar very thankefully tooke the French Gold, and counselled Lewis to send a Herald unto his Master King Edward to demand a safe conduct for conference: and so openly rewarded with thirty Elles of Crimson-Velvet he departed.

(93) King Lewis nothing so pompous as other Princes are, nor attended with Heralds continually in his Court, was therefore inforced unto this present shift: he caused a servant of the Lord Hales to be arrayed like an Herald in a trumpets banner, and sent him in haste into King Edwards Campe; where having audience, he shewed the great desire the King his Master had of peace, whose amitie with England he had ever held, excusing his receit of Warwicke with the necessity of time, whom he aided not against Edward, but against Burgundy, who as he instantly alledged, had now drawn the English to this excessive charges, that hee might thereby conclude a better composition for himselfe, and to amend the broken state of his owne affaires; lastly, he desired that the King of England would grant a safe conduct unto the Ambassadors of the French King his Master, who should more fully informe his Majestie, and give his safe conduct for a further conference in these affaires: and so wisely this counterfeit worded his message, that the King and Nobles liked well the overture, and thereupon granting a safe conduct sent with him an English Herald, to receive the like and other assignements from the French King.

(94) But when the Duke of Burgundy understood that a peace was traversed betwixt Edward and Lewis, he stormed not a little, and with no small haste from Luxemburgh, accompanied with sixteene horse only, came to his brother King Edward, and in a great rage reproved him of breach of promise, and uncourteous requitall of his former kindnesse, that thus would enter amitie with his great foe, and in outward semblance more ready to bite then to bake, burst into these reproofes.

"Have you (quoth hee) Brother, passed the "Seas, entred France, and without killing of a poore "flie, or burning of a silly Sheep-coate taken a shame- "full truce? Oh S. George! Did Edward your noble "Ancestor ever make Army into France, and return- "ned without Battell or Conquest? That victo- "rious Prince King Henry the fifth, (as neere of kinne "unto you as mee) whose bloud you have either "rightfully or wrongfully (God knoweth) extin- "guished and destroyed, with a small puissance con- "quered Normandy, kept it, and never would come "to composition, till he had the whole Kingdome of "France offered him, and was made heire apparant "unto that Crowne. Contrariwise, you without a- "ny thing done, proffer of Battel, or gaine or honour, "have now condiscended unto a peace as profitable "for England as is a poore Peascod: have I (thinke "you) for my particular use drawne the English for- "ces into France (which am able of my selfe to de- "fend mine owne cause?) I tell you plainly no, but "rather to aid you, to recover your ancient Territo- "ries wrongfully with-holden: and that you shal wel "know I need not your aide, I will heare of no truce "with the French, till three moneths after your "arrivage in England at the least; And thereupon "furiously arising, hee threw downe the Chaire, "where he had sate, and offered to depart.

(95) "Nay stay Brother Charles (quoth King "Edward) sith I with patience have heard you speake "what you would, you shall now perforce heare "from me what you would not: First therefore for "my thus entrance into France, no man knoweth the "occasion better then your selfe: for, maugre your "owne great power you speake of, you doe remem- "ber I know, how the French King tooke from you "the faire Towne of Amiens, and the strong Pile Saint "Quintins, with divers other peeces which you nei- "ther durst, nor were able either to rescue or defend, "since which time he hath gotten from you, your best "bosome friends, and secret Counsellors, so as your "selfe stood in doubt (determining to besiege Nusse) "whether the losse would be greater in your absence "(the French King waiting as a Fox for his prey) or "gaine more in Germany by your power and pre- "sence: and to keepe this Wolfe from your Fold, "was the principall cause why you so earnestly prai- "ed me, and continually sollicited me to passe over "the Seas, promising mountaines, but performing "not a Mole-hill, bragging a supply both of horse "and foot, but never sent me a hoofe, nor a Lackie. "Thinke you (Brother) if we had entred this en- "terprize in our owne quarrell, we would have ex- "pected your ayde? I assure you nothing lesse; for "if we had intended any such Conquest, we would "with Souldiers, fire, and sword, have so infected the "ayre with the flames and flame of France, as should "have annoyed your Countreyes of Flaunders and "Brabant, and given you leisure to sit still and tell of "our ever-atchieved great victories, nothing doub- "ting but to have gotten and kept with like man- "hood, and in as great glory, as any of our Ance- "stors before us had done. But the occasion of "warre being yours, and you wilfully (I will not say "cowardly) neglecting the same, I meane not to "prosecute, for the French King never offended me "nor my Subjects, except in favouring Warwicke "against me; nay I may say against you, and now "offereth such honourable overtures of peace, which "I by Gods grace meane not to forsake, but will "observe and keepe. God send you joy thereof, "quoth the Duke, and so abruptly departed from "the King.

(96) The peace thus resolved upon, betwixt the two Kings of England and France, the place appointed for conference was neere unto Amiens, and the parties assigned for the French, were the Bastard of Bourbon, Admirall of France, the Lord S. Pierre, and the Bishop of Eureux. For the English, were the Lord Howard, Sir Thomas St. Leger, and Doctor Morton Lord Chancellor of England. These meeting, presently fell to a conclusion of peace: the conditions whereof were: That the French King should forthwith pay to the King of England seventie two thousand Crownes. That the Dolphin should marry Lady Elizabeth, King Edwards eldest daughter, and that she should have for her maintenance the Durchy of Guienne, or else fiftie thousand Crownes yearely to be paid in the Tower of London, for nine yeares space. This peace was so acceptable to King Lewis, as he sent sixteen thousand Crownes to be distributed amongst the Englishs Souldiers, with Plate and great Presents to men of any sort: and indeed gave them such entertainment in Amiens, as was most bounteous, wherof if any desire further to know, let him reade Comines upon the same text.

(97) To graft which peace with a loving beginning, the two Kings were desirous to see each others, for which end Commissioners were sent to affigne the place: and lastly agreed, that the Towne Picquigny, about three leagues from Amiens, seated in a bottome, through which the River Some ranne, was the fittest: over which a strong bridge was built, and in the midst thereof; agrate made over-thwart with barres, no wider asunder then a man might well thrust in his Arme, covered with boords over-head to avoide the raine, and the bridge so broad that twelve might stand in rancke on both sides.

(98) The day approached, and the two Kings come to the place, he of France came first to the Grate, accompanied with twelve personages, as was the appointment; whereof John Duke of Bourbon, and the Cardinall his Brother, were the chiefest: King Edward entring the Bridge on the other end, with his Brother the Duke of Clarence, the Earle of Northumberland, the Lord Hastings his Chamberlaine, and the Lord Chancellor, himselfe apparrelled all in cloth of Gold, with a rich Iewell of precious stones, in forme of a Flower de Luce: advanced forward, and within five foot of the Grate, put off his Cap, and bowed his knee within halfe a foot to the Ground. King Lewis as readily doing his likely reverence unto Edward. Where, after imbracements through the Grate, the Chancellour of England, who was Prelate and Bishop of Ely, made an eloquent and learned Oration; which done, he read the Articles of Peace, and demanded the Kings whether these were done with their full consents. Which granted by both: either of them laying their one hand upon the Misfall, and the other upon the Holy-Crosse, tooke their solemne Oathes to observe the same. And then falling into a more familiar and Courtly Complementall conference, King Lewis told King Edward, that he would one day invite him to Paris, there to Court his faire French Ladies, with whom if hee committed any sinne, hee merrily told him, that Cardinall Bourbon, should bee his Confessor, whose penance should be the easier, for that Bourbon used to busse faire Ladies himselfe; which no sooner was spoken, or howsoever meant, but Edward was as forward of thankes and acceptance, and indeed so ready, that King Lewis rounding Comines his bosome-servant in his eare, told him flatly he liked not Edwards forwardnesse to Paris, too many English Princes have beene there before: and thus the conference ended, and King Edwards businesse in France, hee returned into England, and into the Citie of London was received little lesse then in triumph-wise.

(99) But though Edwards fortunes thus outwardly flourished, yet inward feares nipped his still troubled mind, one branch having sap, whose growth he much feared would shadow his Crowne, which was Henry Earle of Richmond, alive, and at libertie in the Duke of Britains Court. To bring therefore his purpose to passe, he sent D. Stillington, and others, Ambassadors unto Francis Duke of Britaine, with store of Gold and good words, as that he meant to match his eldest daughter Lady Elizabeth unto the young Earle of Richmond, whereby all cause of dissentions might at once be cut off: the Duke thinking no danger where the water went smooth, easily consented to ship him thereon; but ere the prey was embarked, he had knowledge that the voyage should cost yong Henry his life, wherefore in all haste hee sent his Treasurer Peter Landoys to prevent it, who secretely told Richmond what marriage-bed Edward intended; whereat the distressed Earle amazed, was put to his shifts, and for want of better, tooke Sanctuary at Saint Malos, where the English his conductors lay for a wind.

(100) The Earle thus escaped, the Ambassadors complained to the Duke, imputing the fault as farre as they durst unto him, who had not dealt like a good Merchant to take their money, and to retaine the wares; his answer was, the delivery was good, but themselves negligent Factors, that made not the commoditie to their best advantage. And yet for the love he bare to their King, he undertooke that Richmond should be sure kept either in Sanctuary, or else in Prison, whence as he promised he should not escape: And so with a flea in their eare, they returned, having cleared Edward of his money, and care for sure keeping of Henry, who though he were sore displeased with Stillingtons simplicitie; yet the promises that the Duke of Britaine had made, much mitigated and eased his minde.

(101) And now the Realme quiet, no warre in hand, nor none towards (but such as no man looked should happen;) he framed himselfe so to the peoples affections, as held their hearts not in a constrained feare, but with as loving and ready obedience as any King attaining the Crowne by his Sword ever had done. Nor was ever any Prince more familiar with his Subjects then this King Edward was; for now having his tribute truly paide from France, and all things prospering as was desired, he set heart upon pleasure, which hitherto had beene afflicted with continuall turmoile: yea, and often laid from him the state of a Prince, and would accompany and converse with his meane subjects: a load-stone that doth naturally attract the English hearts; among many others we of London remember this to our grace: Vnto Windsore he sent for the Lord Major of London, the Aldermen and others, upon no other occasion, then to hunt in his company, and himselfe to be merry with them: As also at another time he did the like in Waltham, where he gave them most familiar entertainment, and sent to the Lady Mairesse and her sisters two Harts, five Buckes, and a Tunne of Wine, which wan more love then manifold their worthes.

(102) Somewhat he was given to Court and converse with faire Ladies, which fault was well noted and prevented by King Lewis, for his French Dames: but in England hee had libertie with very large scope, for, besides the Lady Lucy and others, by whom he had issue, three Concubines he kept, and those of three divers and severall disposition, as himselfe would often confesse; one the merriest, another the wiliest, and the third the holiest Harlot in his Realme, as one whom no man could get out of the Church, unlesse it were to his Bed; the merriest was Shores Wife, of whom hereafter we shall speake; the other two were greater Personages, but in their humilitie are content to be nameless, and to forbeare the praise of those properties.

(103) This fault of the King did not greatly offend the people: for one mans pleasure could not extend to the displeasures of many, it being done without violence, and in his latter dayes lessened and well left. But a farre more greater sinne and reproach he fell into, among his other Princely disports: For being on progresse in Warwickshire, and hunting in Arrow-Parke, belonging to Thomas Burdet Esquire, with the death of much Game he slew a White Bucke, greatly esteemed of the said Burdet, who understanding thereof, wished his hornes in his Belly, that mooved the King to kill the same Bucke; whereof he was accused and condemned of treason, his words being drawne, to wish the hornes in the Kings Belly: for which, beheaded he was at Tiburne, and buried in the Gray-Fryers Church at London.

(104) But a more lamentable tragedie happened unto the Land, by the death of George Duke of Clarence the Kings second brother, who being accused of high Treason, was committed to the Tower, where he soone after ended his life. His attainder was, that the said Duke had caused divers of his servants to enforme the people, that Thomas Burdet his servant likewise, was wrongfully put to death: and further laboured (through their reports) to make the World beleeve, that King Edward wrought by Nigromancie, and used to poyson such subjects as he hated: And also that the said Duke upon purpose to exalt himselfe and his heires to the Regall dignitie, most falsly and untruly published that the King was a Bastard, and therefore not capable of raigne. Moreover that he induced diverse of the Kings naturall subjects to be sworne upon the blessed Sacrament, unto him and his heires, without any other reservations of their allegiance: for which intent (as there was alledged) alledged) he had gotten an exemplification under the great Seale of King Henry the sixt, that if the said King and his sonne Prince Edward dyed without issue male, the said Duke and his heires should injoy the Crowne: For these, in a Parliament begun at Westminster the fifteenth of Ianuary, he was attainted of high treason: but whether guiltie or guiltlesse, to men (saith Grafton) that have made large enquisition, yea, and of such as were of no small authority in those dayes, the certaintie thereof was hid, and could not truely bee discloſed, but by conjectures, which as often deceive the imaginations of fantasticall folke, as declare truth to them in their conclusions.

(105) I am not ignorant that some have alledged the cause of this Noble-mans death to arise from a foolish prophecy (whereof saith Comines) the Englishmen are never unfurnished, and this as the Cabalists, who used to make an art of their Letters, gave forth forsooth that a G. should raigne after an E. which must needes be George Duke of Clarence, though Gloucester, more crafty, lay in the winde for the game. This indeed troubled the King not a little, but the Queene and her bloud much more, and therefore of both King and Queene Duke George was mistrusted, and greatly maligned in all that he did. Who now a Widdower (for Warwicks daughter was dead) sent unto his sister Margaret the Dutchesse of Burgundy, to worke a marriage for him with her Husbands daughter the Lady Marie. Against which the Queene most earnestly interposed her selfe, and sollicited the Lady in the behalfe of Lord Anthony Earle Rivers her brother, whereby great discontent was ministred to the Duke, and new jealousies daily bred in the Kings breast.

(106) John Serres, the French Historian, interlacing the life of King Lewis with the Acts of King Edward and his Brethren, saith confidently, that the English King so much affected the league and alliance with France, as that he caused his brother Clarence to bee put in prison, because hee intended to have past the Seas to succour the Dowager of Burgundy Lady Margaret his Sister, upon whose Territories King Lewis encroached, after the death of Duke Charles her husband, slaine at the battell of Mancy.

(107) But howsoever Clarence had offended, certaine it is, that hee was found guilty by the foresaid Parliament, and the eleaventh of March following, after he had offered his Masse penny in the Tower of London, was drowned in a Butt of Malmesey, whose body was buried at Tewkesbury in Glocestershire, by the body of his Dutchesse Lady Isabell Countesse of Warwicke, who being with Child, dyed of poyson a little before. And although the King had consented to his death, yet no sooner was it done, but that he wished it againe undone, and was so grieved at the remembrance, as when any made suite for the life of a condemned, he would openly say: Oh unfortunate brother, for whose life no man would make suite. This good Duke (for so was hee called) left issue behinde him, Edward Earle of Warwicke and Margaret afterwards Countesse of Salisbury, both of them Infants, and followers of their fathers fortunes: he a continuall Prisoner, at foure and twenty yeares of age, under Henry the seventh, was beheaded upon the Tower-hill; and shee at sixty two, lost hers within the Tower, and time of King Henry the eight.

(108) But how dainty soever King Edward was of the breach of amity betwixt him and the French King, in regard whereof he suffered Mary the young Dutchesse of Burgundy, the daughter of his owne sisters Husband to bee molested by intrusion of the French, and all in favour of the contract commenced between the Dauphin and Lady Elizabeth his daughter, yet did Lewis for his part but dally and drive out time: For Ambassadors imployed for the full accomplishing thereof, they of France came either without commission, or those re-called, the new were sent without instructions, while indeede Lewis was working for his sonne another way: First to match him with Mary Dutchesse of Burgundy, but that refused, with Margaret of Flanders, daughter to Duke Maximilian, sonne to Frederick the Emperour: and to hold the world from suspition, in the meane-while Lady Elizabeth the Infanta of England was in the French Court usually called Madame the Dauphin, and all things in France so foundly carried, as Edward suspected no leake in the Caske: for now growne fat and unable for paines, hee both glorved in his nine famous victories at home atchieved, and seemed sufficiently satisfied, that his yearely tribute from France was so truely paide.

(109) At the same time Iames the third of that name, King of Scotland, sent his Ambassadours unto Edward to obtaine the Lady Cicely, the Kings second daughter, to be joyned in marriage with his sonne Iames the young Prince, which was well listened unto by Edward and his Counsell, and least the motion should goe backe, a great summe of money lent to the Scottish King, with this condition, that at a certain time appointed, it should be at King Edwards choice, whether his daughter should match with that Prince or else to have the said summe againe re-paide. Against which alliance and league (as Lesly reporteth) Lewis of France much repined, and to annihilate the same, sent Dr. Ireland, a certaine Knight, and another religious man, to move King Iames to make warre against England.

(110) These no Peace-makers for Christ, but firebrands of Belial, blew the smothered sparkes of dissention into a flame of bloudy warre, which fell the more heavy upon Scotland, for that King Iames much wedded unto his owne will, and altogether ruled by men of meane worth, whom himselfe had advanced from nothing, had not onely neglected by their instigations the love of his Nobles, but also banished the Realme of Scotland, Alexander Duke of Albany his second brother; and had caused the veines of Iohn Earle of Marre, his other Brother, to bee opened, whereby hee bled to death, these and other discontents alienated his Subjects hearts from him, which laid the land more open unto the English Invaders: and yet to draw them more deadly against him, relying upon his owne valor, and the assistance of France, he sent word unto Edward, that hee should not ayde his owne sister of Burgundy against King Lewis, being the Scots Ally; as also with threats of warre commanded him to deliver to his Ambassadors, the Duke of Albany (then residing in the English Court) and lastly to make good and re-pay dammages done upon the Scottish Borders.

(111) King Edward not a little inraged at these double dealings, even in the winter season mustered his men, prepared his artillery, and rigged his ships, that nothing should be unready at the next Spring; which no sooner was come, but that hee ordained for his Lieutenant his brother Richard Duke of Glocester, who with Henry Earle of Northumberland, Thomas Lord Stanley, the Lord Lovell, Greistocke, and others, (the Duke of Albany marching under Glocesters Banner) with twenty thousand strong repaired into the North: and first besieged the strong Towne of Bernicke, then entering the chiefe City Edenburgh, urged King Iames to performe his covenants concerning the marriage betwixt Prince Iames his Sonne, with Lady Cicely, before agreed upon, threatning destruction if the match went not forward. The Scottish Nobility consid'ering the eminent danger, put to death the wicked Counsellers of their King, ordained the Duke of Albany the Vicegerent of Scotland, and promised to re-pay the money received according to Covenants; after which, with the delivery of the strong Towne Berwicke, which had beene out of the English possession the space of one and twenty yeares, a generall peace was concluded betwixt the two Realmes. Whereupon not long after, Gartar King at armes was sent into Scotland, with an Instrument in writing unto the Provost and Burgesses of Edenburgh

(who had undertaken to disburse the money) to signifie King Edwards minde touching the marriage intended, and to demand the said summe by a day assigned, which accordingly was re-paide.

(112) The marriage with Scotland thus broken off; that with Scotland for the Lady Cicely, by King Edward himselfe; that with France for the Princesse Elizabeth, both hee and his Queene greatly desired, and daily sought after: But Lewis the French King, finding the daughter of Austrich more fit for his sonne, dallyed out Edward with shewes of firme faith, till hee had effected the thing hee went about: which musicke sounded so harshly in the English Kings eare, when he heard it, as in no wise he would suffer that string to be touched, but ever beleeved that the French meant him faire play, and although the yeares of the parties themselves might beget some suspition, shee being much elder then the Dolphin, and the truth thereof confirmed by the Duke of Austriches Leger-Ambassadours residing to England, yet Edward would not so much as suppose a suspect against the French King, and therefore suffered Lewis to incroach upon those parts of Picardy that joyned to Callis, and to gaine time till it was past re-call: for then the Lord Howard returning from France, confidently told him that hee was present, and saw the Lady Margaret of Austrich, daughter to Duke Maximilian, sonne to the Emperour Fredericke, received unto France with great pompe and royalty: and at Ambois contracted and espoused to the Dolphin.

Phil. Comines lib. 6. cap. 2. and 9.

King Edward would not believe what was confidently told him.

(113) Edward mightily chafed to be thus worked by Lewis, made great preparation for France, but whether with anger, griefe, or melancholly, he fell into a dangerous and deadly sicknesse; some say, of a superfluous surfeit, whereunto he was much given: Comines saith, of a Catarrhe, which weake estate turned his mind another way: for calling his Lords into his sicke presence, and raising his faint body upon his Bed-Pillowes, these words unto them hee lastly spake:

(114) "My Lords, my deare Kinsmen, and Allies; "in what plight I lye, you see, and I feele; by which "the lesse while I looke to live with you, the more "deepely am I mooved to care in what case I leave "you; for such as I leave you, such be my children "like to finde you. Which if they should (that "God forbid) finde you at variance, might hap to "fall themselves at warre, ere their discretion would "serve to set you at peace. Yee see their youth, of "which I reckon the onely surety to rest in your con-"cord. For it sufficeth not that all you love them, "if each of you hate other. If they were men, your "faithfulnesse happely would suffice: but Child-"hood must bee maintained by mens authority, "and slippery youth under-propped with elder "counsell; which neither they can have, unlesse you "give it, nor you give it, if you agree not. For "where each laboureth to breake that which the "other maketh, and through hatred of each others "person impugneth each others counsell, there must "it needs bee long or any good conclusion goe for-"ward: And while either party striveth to bee "chiefe, flattery shall have more play then plaine "and faithfull advise, of which must needs insue the "evill bringing up of the Prince; whose minde in "tender youth infected, shall readily fall to riot and "mischiefe; and draw downe with him his noble "Realme unto ruine: but if grace turne him to "wisdome: which if God send, then they that by "evill meanes before pleased him best, shall after fall "furthest out of favour, so that ever at length evill "drifts draw to nought, and good plaine wayes pro-"sper. Our Lord forbid, that you love together the "worse for the felse cause, that you ought to love "the better. And yet that happeneth, and no where "finde we so deadly debate, as among them, which "by nature and law ought most to agree together. "Such a pestilent Serpent is ambition, and desire of "vaine-glory and Soveraignty, which among States "where it once entreth, creepeth forth so farre, till "with division and variance hee turneth all to mis-"chiefe, first longing to be next the best, afterward "equall with the best, and at last chiefe and above "the best. Of which immoderate appetite of wor-"ship, and thereby of debate and dissention, what "losse, what sorrow, what trouble, hath within these "few yeares growne in this Realme, I pray God as "well forget as we remember. Which things, if I "could aswell have fore-seene, as I have with my "more paine then pleasure proved, By Gods blessed "Lady (that was ever his oath) I would never have "wonne the curtesie of mens knees, with the losse of "so many heads. But fith things passed cannot bee "gaine-called, much ought we the more beware, by "what occasion wee have taken so great hurt afore, "that wee eft-soones fall not into the like againe. "Now be those griefes passed, and all is (God bee "thanked) quiet, and likely right-well to prosper in "wealthfull peace under your Cosins, my children, "if God send them life, and you love. Of which "two things the lesse losse were they, by whom "though God did his pleasure yet should the realme "alway find Kings, and peradventure as good Kings. "But if you among your selves in a childs raigne fall "at debate, many a good man shall perish, and hap-"ly hee too, and yee too, ere this Land find peace "againe. Wherefore in these last words that ever I "looke to speake with you, I exhort, and require you "all, for the love that you have ever borne unto me: "for the love that I have ever borne unto you, for "the love that our Lord beareth to us all, from this "time forward all griefes forgotten, each of you love "others, which I verily trust you will, if you any "thing regard, either God, or your King, affinity, "or kindred, this Realme, your owne Countrey, or "your owne surety.

(115) And therewithall the King no longer induring to sit up, laid him downe on his right side, his face towards them, who with weeping eies and words as fitted the time, recomfited the sicke dying King, joyning their hands, and outwardly forgiving that, which inwardly they meant not to forget. The King overjoyed to see their willing reconcilements spake not many words after, but commending his soule unto God, in their presence departed this life at his Pallace of Westminster, upon the ninth day of Aprill, and yeare of Christs appearance 1483. at the age of forty one, when hee had worne the royall Diademe, two and twenty yeares, one moneth and five dayes: and was buried at Windsore, in the new Chappell, whose foundation himselfe had laid.

King Edwards good counsell.

(116) Of personage hee was the goodliest Gentleman (saith Comines) that ever mine eyes beheld; faire of complexion, and of most princely presence, couragious of heart, politique in counsell; in adversity nothing abashed; in prosperity rather joyous then proud: in peace just and mercifull; in warre sharpe and fierce, and in field bold and venturous, yet no further then wisedome would, and is no lesse commended commended where he avoided, then is his manhood when he vanquished: eight or nine battels he wonne, wherein to his greater renowne he fought on foot, and was ever victor over his enemies: much given he was to the lusts of youth, and in his latter time growne somewhat corpulent, which rather adorned his graver yeares, then any wayes disliked the eyes of his beholders.

His Wife.

(117) Elizabeth the daughter of Richard Woodvill Earle Rivers by his wife Iaquelana Dutchesse of Bedford, (who was the daughter of Peter Earle of Saint Paul, and hee the sonne of Peter de Luxemburgh) was first married unto Sir John Grey, slaine at Saint Albans, where he was knighted the day before his death by King Henry the first, unto whom shee bare two sonnes and a daughter, after whose death shee was privately remarried unto King Edward the fourth, the first day of May, at his Manor of Grafton in Northamptonshire, Anno 1464. and in the next yeare following upon the five and twentieth of May, was crowned Queene at Westminster with all due solemnities. Shee was his Wife eighteene yeares, eleven moneths, and nine daies, no more fortunate in attaining to the height of all worldly dignitie, then unfortunate in the murther of her sonnes, and losse of her owne libertie: For in the beginning of King Edwards raigne, shee was forced to take Sanctuary at Westminster, wherein her first sonne Prince Edward was borne; and at his death did the like in feare of the Protector; and lastly, having all her lands and possessions seized upon by king Henry the seventh, lived in meane estate in the Monastery of Bermondsey in Southwarke, where not long after shee left the troubles of her life, and injoyed a quiet portion or burying-place by her last Husband King Edward at Windsore.

(118) Elianor Butler, as we finde it recorded upon the Parliament Role, was contracted unto King Edward: but how true considering the occasion, and time of the Act, we leave for others to judge, onely this is moft certaine that this Lady Elianor was the daughter of Iohn Talbot Earle of Shrewsbury, and the wife of Sir Thomas Butler Knight, sonne and heire to Ralph Butler Baron of Sudley; which Elianor died the thirtieth of June, the yeare of Christ Iesus 1466. and the eight of King Edward the fourth his raigne.

His Issues.

(119) Edward the eldest sonne of King Edward the fourth by Queene Elizabeth his wife, was borne in the Sanctuary at Westminster. the fourth of November, and yeare of grace 1471. being the tenth of his Fathers raigne, at that time expulsed the Realme by the powerfull Earle Warwicke; but fortune changed, and the Father restored; the sonne, the first of July and yeare of Christ 1473. was created Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earle of Chester; and had not the ambitious hand of his Vncle beene defiled in his innocent bloud, he might have worne the Diademe many yeares, whereas he bare the Title of King not many dayes.

An. Dom. 1478. Iohn Stow.

(120) Richard the second sonne of King Edward the fourth by Elizabeth his Queene, was borne at Shrewsbury, and in his infancy was created Duke of Yorke, hee was affianced unto Anne daughter and heire to Iohn Mowbray Duke of Norfolke, by which hee was intituled Duke of Norfolke, Earle Marshall, Warren, and Nottingham, but injoying neither Title, wife, or his owne life long, was with his Brother murthered in the Tower of London, and in the prison of that Tower, which upon that moft sinfull deed, is ever fince called the bloudy Tower, their bodies as yet unknowne where to have buriall.

(121) George the third sonne of King Edward the fourth, by Queene Elizabeth his wife, was also borne in Shrewsbury, and being a young Child was created Duke of Bedford, but lived not long after, and lyeth buried at Windsore.

(122) Elizabeth the first daughter of King Edward the fourth, by Elizabeth his Queene, was borne at Westminster the eleventh of February, and first of her Fathers raigne, being the yeare of Salvation 1466. She was promised in marriage to Charles Dolphin of France, wooed and Courted by her Vncle Crouchback, when he had murthered her brothers, and usurped the Crowne, but better destiny attending her, shee was reserved to joyne the union and marriage with the onely heire of Lancaster, which was Henry of Richmond, afterward King of England, from whom is branched the royall stemme that spreadeth his beautie in this North-west world, even Iames our dread Soveraigne, and great-Britaines Monarch.

(123) Cicelie, the second daughter of King Edward the fourth, by Queene Elizabeth his wife, was sought unto by Iames the third of that name, to be joyned in marriage with Iames his sonne Prince of Scotland, and Duke of Rothsay, which match was promised upon conditions and choise of King Edward, who lastly brake off from further proceeding, and the Lady married unto John Viscount Wels, whom shee outlived, and was againe re-married, but by neither Husband had any issue, and therefore lesse noted; her body lyeth buried at Quarrena in the Isle of Wight.

(124) Anne the third daughter of King Edward the fourth, by Queene Elizabeth his wife, was married unto Lord Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolke, Earle Marshall, and high Treasurer of England: unto whom shee bare two sonnes, both dying without issue, and her selfe without more fruit of wombe, left her life, and lieth buried at Framingham in Norfolke.

(125) Bridget the fourth daughter of King Edward the fourth, by his wife Queene Elizabeth, was borne at Eltham in Kent, the tenth of November, and yeare of Grace 1480. being the twentieth of her Fathers Raigne. She tooke the habite of Religion, and became a Nun in the Nunnery of Dartford, in the same Countie, founded by King Edward the third, where shee spent her life in contemplations unto the day of her death.

(126) Marie the fift daughter of King Edward the fourth, by Queene Elizabeth his Wife, was promised in marriage unto the King of Denmarke, but died (before it could be solemnized) in the Tower of Greenewich, the Sunday before Pentecost, the twentieth two of her Fathers Raigne, and yeare of Grace 1482. and was buried at Windsore.

(127) Margaret the sixt daughter of King Edward the fourth, by his wife Queene Elizabeth, died an Infant without other mention in our Authors.

(128) Katherine the seventh daughter of King Edward the fourth, by Queene Elizabeth his wife, and the last of them both, was married unto William Courtney Earle of Devonshire, and Lord of Ochampton, unto whom she bare Lord Henry after the death of his Father Earle of Devonshire, who by King Henry the eight was created Marquesse of Excester in Anno 1525.

His Concubines.

(129) Elizabeth Lucie is certainly knowne to have beene King Edwards Concubine, though nothing so certainly mentioned, whose Lady, or of what Parentage she was; that shee was conceived by him with-child is before declared, but who that child was, is as obscurely laid downe, therefore in these things we must be silent, and leave the doubts to be resolved by others. Three other Concubines this king had, whereof Shores Wife was not the least beloved, whose life falleth falleth further to be ſpoken of in the Raigne of the uſurper Richard, where her ſtorie ſhall be ſhewed more at large.

His naturall Iſſue.

(150) Arthur, ſurnamed Plantagenet, the naturall ſonne of King Edward the fourth, (whoſe mother as is ſuppoſed, was the Lady Elizabeth Lucie) was created Viſcount Liſle by King Henry the eight at Bridewell in London, the twentie ſixt of April, and yeare of Salvation 1533. which title was conferred upon him in right of his Wife Lady Elizabeth, ſiſter and heire unto John Gray Viſcount Liſle, and the late wife and then widdow of Edmund Dudley: who bare unto this Viſcount three daughters, which were Bridget, Frances, and Elizabeth, all of them afterward married. This Arthur Lord Liſle was made Lieutenant of Calis by the ſaid King Henry, which Towne ſome of his ſervants intended to have betrayed to the French, for which their fact himſelfe was ſent to the Tower of London: but his truth appearing after much ſearch, the King ſent him a rich Ring from his owne finger, with ſuch comfortable words, as at the hearing thereof a ſudden joy overcharged his heart, and was ſo immoderately received, that the ſame night it made an end of his life, whoſe body was honourably buried in the ſame Tower.

(151) Elizabeth the naturall daughter of King Edward the fourth, was married to Sir Thomas Lumley Knight, the Sonne of George Lord Lumley, who dyed before his Father: ſhee bare unto the ſaid Sir Thomas, Richard, afterward Lord Lumley, from whom the late Lord Lumley did deſcend.

EDWARD

Edward V.

EDVVARD THE FIFTH, KING OF ENGLAND AND FRANCE, AND LORD OF IRELAND, THE FIFTIE-FIFTH MONARCH OF THIS LAND, HIS RAIGNE, AND DEATH.

Monarch 55.

For the moſt part written by Sir Thomas Moore.

Chapter XVIII.

THE Father thus dying in the ſtrength of his yeares, and the Son left to rule before he was ripe, the Synders of diſſenſions which the ficke King had lately raked up, preſently brake forth into a more raging flame; for the King and Queenes bloud that ſhould have ſupported young Edwards eſtate, the one ſide being ſuſpicious, and the other provoked by the execrable deſire of ſoveraignty, left the tender King (a Prince of ſuch towardneſſe as his age could containe) deſtitute and un-armed, which if either kinde or kindred had holden place, muſt needs have beene the ſureſt pillars of his defence. The raigne of this King (if we may ſo call the ſhort time of his Soveraignety) began the ſame day that his Father dyed, though hee was never Crowned, nor yet commanded the affaires of the Kingdome as an abſolute Monarch, his young Brothers fortunes being ballanced with his.

King Edwards raigne unfortunate and ſhorte.

Aprill 9. Ann. Dom. 1483. Richard Duke of Yorke.

(2) For Richard Duke of Glocester, by nature their Vncle, by office their Protector, to their Father beholden, to themſelves by Oath and Alleagiance bounden, all bands broken that holdeth man and man together, without any reſpect of God or the World, unnaturally contrived to bereave them, not onely of their dignity, but alſo their lives. But forſomuch as the Dukes demeanour miniſtreth in effect all the whole matter whereof the raigne of this young and fift Edward muſt intreat, it is therefore convenient ſomewhat somewhat to shew you ere wee goe further, what man this was, and from whom hee descended that could find in his heart so much mischiefe to conceive.

Richard Duke of Yorke was the father of Richard Duke of Glocester.

(3) Know first then that Richard Duke of Yorke, a Noble-man and a mighty, began not by warre, but by law to challenge the Crowne; putting his claime into the Parliament; where his cause was (either for right or favour) so farre forth advanced, that King Henries blould (albeit hee had a goodly Prince) was utterly rejected, the Crowne by the authority of that high Court intailed to the Duke of Yorke, and his issue male in remainder, immediately after the death of King Henry. But the Duke not enduring so long to tarry, (intending under pretext of dissention and debate arising in the Realme, to prevent his time, and to take upon him the rule in King Henries life,) was with many other Nobles slaine at Wakefield, leaving three sonnes, Edward, George, and Richard; all of them as they were great states of birth, so were they great and stately of stomacke, greedy and ambitious of authority, and impatient of partners.

(4) For Edward revenging his fathers death, deprived King Henry, and attained the Crowne. The second, George Duke of Clarence, was a goodly Noble Prince, and in all things fortunate, if either his owne ambition had not set him against his brother, or the envy of his enemies, his brother against him. For were it by the Queene and Lords of her bloud, which highly maligned the Kings kindred (as women commonly, not of malice but of nature hate them whom their husbands love) or were it a proud appetite of the Duke himselfe, intending to be King: at least wise haynous treason was laid to his charge; and finally were he faulty, were he faultlesse, attainted he was by Parliament, and judged to death, as we have said.

Women commonly maligne their husbands kindred.

The decription of Richard Duke of Glocester.

(5) Richard the third sonne, of whom wee now entreat, was in wit and courage equall with either of them, in body and prowesse farre under them both, little of stature, ill-limmed, and crooke-backed, his left shoulder much higher then his right, very hard favoured of visage, and such as in States is called warly, in other men otherwise: he was malicious, wrathfull, and envious, yea, and from afore his birth ever froward. For it is for truth reported, that the Dutchesse his Mother had so much adoe in her travaile, that she could not be delivered of him uncut, and that he came into the world with his feet forward, as men be borne outward, and (as the fame runneth) also not untoothed; Whether men of hatred report above the truth, or else that nature changed her course in his beginning, which in the course of his life many things unnaturally committed.

(6) No evill Captaine was he in the warre, as to which his disposition was more inclined then for peace; sundry victories he had, and sometimes overthrowes, but never in default as for his owne person, either of hardinesse, or politicke order; free was he of his dispence, and somewhat above his power liberall: with large gifts he gat him unstedfast friendship, for which hee was forced to pill and pole in other places, which gat him stedfast hatred. He was close and secret, a deepe dissembler, lowly of countenance, arrogant of heart, outwardly familiar where even now hee hated, and not letting to kisse whom hee thought to kill: despitefull and cruell he was, not for evill-will alwayes, but oftner for ambition, and either for the surety or increase of his estate. Friend and foe was much-what indifferent; where his advantage grew, he spared no mans death, whose life withstood his purpose. Hee slew with his owne hands, King Henry the sixth, being Prisoner in the Tower, as men constantly said, and that without commandement or knowledge of the King, who undoubtedly if he had intended his death, would have appointed that butcherly office to some other then his owne brother.

(7) Some wise men also judge, that his drift covertly conveyed, lacked not in helping forth his brother Clarence to his death; which he resisted openly, howbeit somewhat (as men deemed) more faintly, then he that was hartily minded to his wealth: And they that thus judge, thinke that long time in King Edwards life, he fore-cast to be King, in case that his brother (whose life he looked that evill dyet should shorten) should happen to decease (as indeed he did) while his children were young. And they deeme that for this intent hee was glad of the Duke of Clarence death, whose life must needes have hindered him so intending, (being his elder brother) whether the same Duke had kept him true to his Nephew the young King, or enterprized to be King himselfe. But of all this point there is no certainty, and who so divineth upon conjectures, may aswell shoote too farre as too short. Howbeit this have I by credible information learned, that in the same night in which King Edward dyed, one Mistlebroke (long ere morning) came in great haste to the house of one Pottier dwelling in Red-Crosse street without Creeple-gate in London: and when he with hasty rapping, quickly was let in, he shewed unto Pottier that King Edward was departed. By my troth man quoth Pottier, then will my master the Duke of Glocester be King: What cause he had so to thinke, hard it is to say, whether being toward him hee knew any such thing intended, or otherwise had any inkling thereof, for it was not likely that he spake it of no ground.

He was the cause of Clarences death.

Richard of Glocester intended to bee King seven moneths K. Edward liv'd.

The Queenes kinred onely about the Prince.

The speech of Pottier at King Edwards death.

(8) But now to returne to the course of this History; were it that the Duke of Glocester had of old forre-minded this conclusion, and was now thereunto moved, and put in hope by the occasion of the tender age of the yong Princes his Nephewes (as opportunity & likelyhood of speed putteth a man in courage of that hee never intended) certaine it is, that hee contrived their destruction, with the usurpation of the regall dignity upon himselfe, and forasmuch as hee well wist, and holpe to maintaine a long continued grudge and heart-burning betweene the Queenes kindred, and the Kings bloud, either part envying others authority; hee now thought their divisions should be (as it was indeed) a forward beginning to the pursuit of his intent, and a sure ground for the foundation of all his building: if he might first, under the pretext of revenging old displeasure, abuse the anger and ignorance of the one party, to the destruction of the other; and then winne to his purpose as many as he could, and those that could not be wonne, might be lost before they were aware; for of one thing was he certaine, that if his intent were perceived, he should soon have made peace betweene both the parties with his owne bloud.

The Uncle contriveth the destruction of his Nephewes.

(9) King Edward in his life, albeit that this dissention betweene his friends somewhat grieved him, yet in his good health he somewhat lesse regarded it, because hee thought whatsoever businesse should fall betweene them, himselfe should alwayes be able to rule both the parties. But in his last sickenesse, when hee perceived his naturall strength so sore infeebled, that he dispaired all recovery; then considering the youth of his Children, albeit he nothing lesse mistrusted then that that happened, yet well fore-seeing how many harmes might grow by their debate, while the youth of his Children should lacke discretion of themselves, and good Counsell of their friends, of which either party should counsell for their owne commodity, and the rather by pleasant advise to winne themselves favour, then by profitable advertisements to doe his Children good: hee called some of them before him that were at variance, and in speciall the Lord Marquesse Dorset, the Queenes Sonne by her first Husband, and William Lord Hastings a Nobleman, then Lord Chamberlain against whom the Queene especially grudged, for the great favour the King bare him: and also for that shee thought him secretly familiar with the King in wanton company. Her kindred also bare him sore, aswell for that the King had made him Captaine of Calis, which office the Lord Rivers, brother to the Queene

Richards deepe pollicy.

King Edwards care to fit peace betwixt the Queenes kindred and his.

The crafty complaints of Edward Duke of Glocester.

The Queenes jealousie against the Lord Chamberlain.

Queene claimed of the Kings former promise, as for divers other great gifts which hee received, that they looked for. These were the grudges which the King on his death-bed sought to remove, and they in shew seemed to cancell, as we have said, though the sparks of these displeasures burst afterward into a dangerous flame, which consumed most of them, as afterward shall appeare.

King Edward repaireth towards London.

(10) For assoone as the King was departed this life, his Sonne Prince Edward drew towards London from Ludlow in Wales, which Countrey being farre off from the law, and recourse to justice, was become to be farre out of Order, and growne wilde; Robbers, Rovers, walking at liberty uncorrected: for which cause this Prince in the life time of his Father was sent thither, to the end that the authority of his presence should refraine evill-disposed persons, from the boldnesse of their former outrages. To the governance and ordering of this young Prince at his sending thither, was there appointed Sir Anthony Woodvill Lord Rivers, brother unto the Queene, a right honourable man, as valiant of hand as politick in Counsell; adjoyned were there unto him others of the same party, and in effect every one as he was neerest of kin unto the Queene, so was he planted next about the Prince.

The Queenes kinred onely about the Prince.

(11) That drift of the Queene, not unwisely devised, whereby her bloud might of youth be rooted in the Princes favour, the Duke of Glocester turned unto their destruction, and upon that ground set the foundation of all his unhappy fabricke. For whomsoever hee perceived either at variance with them, or bearing himselfe, their favour, he brake unto them; some by mouth, some by writing and secret messengers, that it was neither reason, nor in any wise to be suffered, that the young King their Master and kinseman, should be in the hands and Custody of his mothers kindred, sequestred in manner from their Company and attendance, of which every one ought him as faithfull service as they, and many of them farre more honourable part of kin then his mothers side: whose bloud (quoth he) saving the Kings pleasure, was farre unmeet to bee matched with his, which now to be as who say removed from the king, and the lesse noble to be left about him, is (quoth hee) neither honourable to his Majestie nor unto us, and also to his Grace no surety, to have the mightiest of his friends from him, and unto us no little jeopardy, to suffer our well-proved evill-willers to grow in over-great authoritie with the Prince in youth, who is light of beliefe and soone perswaded. Ye remember I trow, K. Edward himselfe, albeit he was a man of age and discretion, yet was he in many things ruled by the bend, more then stood either with his honour, or our profit, or with the commodity of any man else, except onely the immoderate advancement of themselves. Which whether they sorer thirsted after their owne weale, or our woe, it were hard I weene to gesse, and if some folkes friendship had not held better place with the King, then any respect of kindred, they might perhaps easily have intrapped and brought some of us to confusion ere this; why not as easily as they have done some other already, as neere of his royall bloud as we? But our Lord hath wrought his will, and thankes be to his grace, that peril is past: howbeit as great is growing, if we suffer this young King in our enemies hand; which without his knowledge might abuse the name of his commandement, to any of our undoing, which thing God and good provision forbid.

The effect that his policy tooke.

(12) Of which good provision none of us hath any thing the lesse neede, for the late made attonement, in which the Kings pleasure had more place then the parties wils: nor none of us, I beleeve, is so unwise over-soone to trust a new friend made of an old foe, or to thinke that an hourely kindnes, sodainly contracted in one houre, continued yet scarce a fortnight, should be deeper setled in their stomackes, then a long accustomed malice many yeares rooted.

The conclusion of his deffignes.

With these words and writings and such other, the Duke of Glocester soone set a fire them that were of themselves apt enough to kindle, especially two, Edward Duke of Buckingham, and William Lord Hastings Chamberlaine, both men of honor, and of great power. The one by long succession from his Auncestry: the other by his office, and the Kings favour. These two not bearing each to other so much love, as both of them hatred unto the Queenes part, in this point accorded together, with the Duke of Glocester, that they would utterly remove from the Kings Company all his mothers friends under the name of their enemies.

Another crafty policy of Duke Richard.

(13) Vpon this conclusion the Duke of Glocester understanding that the Lords, which at that time were about the King, intended to bring him to London to his Coronation, accompanied with such power of their friends, that it should be hard for him to bring his purpose to passe, without the gathering a great assembly of people, and in manner of open warre, whereof the end he wist well was doubtfull, and in which the King being on their side, his part should have the face and name of a Rebellion; he secretly therefore, by divers meanes, caused the Queene to be perswaded and brought in mind, that it neither were need, and also should be jeopardous, the King to come up strong.

The Queene yeelden to the Dukes perswasion.

(14) For whereas now every Lord loved other, and no other thing studied upon but about the Coronation and honour of the King: if the Lords of her kindred should assemble in the Kings name much people, they should give the Lords of the contrary faction cause to feare and suspect, lest they should gather this people, not for the Kings safegard, whom no man impugned, but for their destruction, having more regard to their olde variance, then their new attonement: for which cause they should assemble on the other party much people againe for their defence, whose power she wist well stretched farre: and thus should all the Realme fall on an uproare: and of all the hurt that thereof should ensue, which was likely not to be a little, and the most harme like to fall where she least would, all the world would put her and her kindred in the blame, and say that they had unwisely and untruely also broken the amity and peace which the King her husband so prudently made betwixt his kin and hers on his death-bed, and which the other party faithfully observed.

The Lords meet at Northampton.

(15) The Queene in this wise perswaded, sent such word unto her sonne; and unto her brother, being about the King: besides, the Duke of Glocester himselfe, and other Lords, the chiefe of his bend, wrote unto the King so reverently, and to the Queenes friends there so lovingly, that they nothing earthly mistrusting, brought up the King in great hast, but not in good speed, with a sober company. Now was the King in his way to London, gone from Northampton, when the Dukes of Glocester and Buckingham came thither, where remained behinde, the Lord Rivers the Kings uncle, intending on the morrow to follow the King, and be with him at Stony-Stratford, twelve miles thence, earely ere he departed. So was there made that night much friendly cheare betwixt these two Dukes and the Lord Rivers a great while: but incontinent after that they were openly with great curtesie departed, and the Lord Rivers lodged, the Dukes secretly with a few of their most privy friends, set them downe in Councell, wherein they spent a great part of the night: and at their rising, in the dawning of the day, they sent our privily to their servants in their Innes and lodgings about, giving command to make themselves shortly ready, for their Lords were to horse-ward: upon which messages, many of their folke were attendant, when many of the L. Rivers servants were unready.

The Keyes of Inne kept by Richard Duke of Glocester.

(16) Now had these Dukes taken into their custodies the keyes of the Inne, that none should passe forth without their license: and besides this, in the high somewhat to shew you ere wee goe further, what man this was, and from whom hee descended that could find in his heart so much mischiefe to conceive.

Richard Duke of Yorke was the father of Richard Duke of Glocester.

(3) Know first then that Richard Duke of Yorke, a Noble-man and a mighty, began not by warre, but by law to challenge the Crowne; putting his claime into the Parliament; where his cause was (either for right or favour) so farre forth advanced, that King Henries blood (albeit hee had a goodly Prince) was utterly rejected, the Crowne by the authority of that high Court intailed to the Duke of Yorke, and his issue male in remainder, immediately after the death of King Henry. But the Duke not enduring so long to tarry, (intending under pretext of dissention and debate arising in the Realme, to prevent his time, and to take upon him the rule in King Henries life,) was with many other Nobles slaine at Wakefield, leaving three sonnes, Edward, George, and Richard; all of them as they were great states of birth, so were they great and stately of stomacke, greedy and ambitious of authority, and impatient of partners.

(4) For Edward revenging his fathers death, deprived King Henry, and attained the Crowne. The second, George Duke of Clarence, was a goodly Noble Prince, and in all things fortunate, if either his owne ambition had not set him against his brother, or the envy of his enemies, his brother against him. For were it by the Queene and Lords of her bloud, which highly maligned the Kings kindred (as women commonly, not of malice but of nature hate them whom their husbands love) or were it a proud appetite of the Duke himselfe, intending to be King: at least wise haynous treason was laid to his charge; and finally were he faulty, were he faultlesse, attainted he was by Parliament, and judged to death, as we have said.

Women commonly maligne their husbands kindred.

The discription of Richard Duke of Glocester.

(5) Richard the third sonne, of whom wee now entreat, was in wit and courage equall with either of them, in body and prowesse farre under them both, little of stature, ill-limmed, and crooke-backed, his left shoulder much higher then his right, very hard favoured of visage, and such as in States is called warily, in other men otherwise: he was malicious, wrathfull, and envious, yea, and from afore his birth ever froward. For it is for truth reported, that the Dutchesse his Mother had so much adoe in her travaile, that she could not be delivered of him uncut, and that he came into the world with his feet forward, as men be borne outward, and (as the same runneth) also not untoothed; Whether men of hatred report above the truth, or else that nature changed her course in his beginning, which in the course of his life many things unnaturally committed.

Richard Crooke-backed a good Souldier.

(6) No evill Captaine was he in the warre, as to which his disposition was more inclined then for peace; sundry victories he had, and sometimes overthrowes, but never in default as for his owne person, either of hardinesse, or politicke order; free was he of his dispence, and somewhat above his power liberall: with large gifts he gat him unstedfast friendship, for which hee was forced to pill and pole in other places, which gat him stedfast hatred. He was close and secret, a deepe dissembler, lowly of countenance, arrogant of heart, outwardly familiar where even now hee hated, and not letting to kisse whom hee thought to kill: despitefull and cruell he was, not for evill-will alwayes, but oftner for ambition, and either for the surety or increase of his estate. Friend and foe was much-what indifferent; where his advantage grew, he spared no mans death, whose life withstood his purpose. Hee slew with his owne hands, King Henry the sixth, being Prisoner in the Tower, as men constantly said, and that without commandement or knowledge of the King, who undoubtedly if he had intended his death, would have appointed that butcherly office to some other then his owne brother.
